Mutual Sacrifice.

Similarly the French desire reparation mainly in the form of payment by Germany. The British also ardently desire to repair the devastation of the war by restoring ruined markets and remedying unemployment. Before this problem can be discussed, however, the reports of the Expert Committees must be awaited. Mr. MacDonald hopes that they will draw Britain and France together.

He does not see any reason why this problem, if approached from its widest aspect and considered in conjunction with the cognate problem of inter-Allied debts, should not soon be solved so as to give England hope of economic stability in Europe and France assurance that her just requirements will be met.

Here again, if France and England can but agree, the cooperation of the other European countries will be assured and it will be possible for them to approach the United States as United Europe, anxious by mutual sacrifice and arrangement to cure the ills of the people.

France's Debt to Britain.

Mr. MacDonald says that the people of Britain regard with anxiety what appears to them to be the determination of France to ruin Germany and dominate the continent without consideration for Britain's reasonable interests and for the future consequences to a European settlement. They are apprehensive of the large military and aerial establishments, maintained not only in Eastern, but also in Western France. They are disturbed by the interest shown by the French Government in the military organization of the new States of Central Europe. Finally, they question why all these activities should be financed by the French Government, disregarding the fact that the British taxpayer has to find over £30,000,000 a year for the interest on the loans raised in America and also to find large sums to pay the interest on the debt of France to Britain, to meet which France has not yet made nor propounded, as far as they can see, any sacrifice equivalent to their own. "Such popular sentiments are erroneous, though they may be, and are factors which both you and I are bound to take into consideration."

The British Prime Minister refers to the friendliness of M. Poincaré's reply to his letter of January 26. He says that he desires at present to prepare the way for a complete, mutual understanding by reciting unreservedly his difficulties and the manner in which he envisages the situation. He emphasizes his opinion that the differences in most cases have not been wholly unavoidable. He is ready in the future to re-examine the whole problem in its larger outlines and more essential elements.

Mr. MacDonald dwells on the importance of public opinion in France and England. He has endeavoured not merely to interpret the views and desires of his own countrymen, but sympathetically to realize the opinion and needs of France. It is widely felt in England that, contrary to the Treaty of Versailles, France is endeavouring to create a situation which gains for it what it failed to get during the Allied peace negotiations. The view of this section of his countrymen is that that policy can only perpetuate the war, and in the end will destroy whatever temporary security France may gain.

The British Prime Minister admits that the German menace to France is real and the French have some justification for seeking more tangible safeguards instead of the lapsed Anglo-American joint guarantee. The French are also disappointed with regard to reparations.

Neither the virtually unlimited expectations, aroused at the moment of victory, nor the more specific assessment of 1921 bear any real relation to the economic situation to-day. British security is not menaced, but her economic existence is gravely endangered owing to the acute and persistent dislocation of the markets of Europe, which is mainly due to the uncertainty of Franco-German relations, the economic chaos in Germany and the ultimate uncertainty of Anglo-French relations.

After alluding to British apprehensions with regard to French activities mentioned above, Mr. MacDonald expresses the opinion that these states of opinion have vitiated Anglo-French relation in the past and have often induced the two Governments to indulge in altercations with regard to the symptoms of the malady without endeavouring with clarity and good sense to investigate the causes. It is a thoroughly unhealthy condition, which gives him much concern and, he believes, disturbs M. Poincaré too. He is heartily anxious that they, together, shall try to give both these sections of French and British opinion some sense of confidence that the basis of their fears and resentments are being removed.

Joint Action Necessary.

Nobody who has to observe British opinion to-day can afford to overlook the urgent necessity of reaching arrangements with regard to the Ruhr, the Rhineland and the Palatinate without delay.

After dealing with security and reparations, as mentioned above, Mr. MacDonald concludes that, if he and M. Poincaré can achieve agreement on the main principles which inspire them and if these principles can be explained to their respective peoples and public opinion, there would then be little doubt that many subsidiary problems, intricate and thorny though they have become, will not prove impossible of solution, but, if they allow themselves to be entangled in a mass of detail, they will relapse into the old, wearisome round of controversy on points not fundamental. He again emphasizes that the condition of Europe can only be remedied by joint Anglo-French action, undertaken with full sympathy for their respective requirements and wise regard for the interests of the world at large. He is fully prepared for such cooperation.—Reuter.

M. Poincaré's Reply.

M. Poincaré expresses keen pleasure at Mr. MacDonald's frank and friendly letter. He says that he is ready to begin with him examination of the great outstanding problems; the interests and desires of the two countries are altogether in harmony and both can only be satisfied by the same means. He declares that, if France does not mean that the recovery of Germany shall develop into a hegemony, she herself has no ulterior motive of continental supremacy. No reasonable Frenchman has ever dreamt of annexing a particle of German territory, nor of turning a single German into a French citizen.

Apart from Alsace France has never claimed the Rhine as a frontier. She has only asked that Germany should no longer be in a position to use the Rhine as a military base for fresh attacks on France. Whatever disappointments she has experienced she has never sought anything not recognized as hers by the Treaty.

Aerial Defences.

If France's military and aerial establishments are scattered throughout the country, it is because administrative organization requirements do not allow of their concentration in the East. "But our Army and Air Force are no more a sign of defiance to England than the aerial and maritime fleets of Britain are, in your view, a threat to France."

Referring to French relations with the Little Entente, M. Poincaré intimates that France would welcome England's adherence to this group of friendships to the best guarantee of peace.

He hopes that the progress of the League of Nations and the development of international arbitration will soon justify the Associated Nations in proceeding to co-ordinated limitation of armaments, which will not expose the most peace-loving to the enterprises of the most warlike.

In conclusion, the French Premier says: "No more than you am I able to imagine England and France separated from each other or even indifferent to each other. We owe it to civilization to remain united. Since our two Governments are conscious of this duty, it is impossible that we should not act together to carry it out."

Favourable French Comment.

Paris, Mar. 2.

Commenting in advance on the correspondence between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Poincaré, which will be published to-night, a semi-official statement pays a tribute to Mr. MacDonald's friendly efforts and intentions, which are bound to find favourable echo in France. It says that French security and also peace in Europe must be assured, for example, by neutralization or demilitarization of certain territories or by limited control by the League of Nations.

The statement declares that France awaits with confidence the result of the Committee of Experts with regard to reparations. Then, perhaps, it will be possible in raising the question of inter-Allied debts to secure the participation of the United States in the final liquidation of the War.

A New Angle of Vision.

Later.

That professions of good intentions alone will not succeed in bridging the gulf between Britain and France is a fact which nobody endeavours to conceal in commenting on the evolution of the "new diplomacy." Several London newspapers mourn the absence of any essential change in M. Poincaré's oft-repeated policy and lay stress of the continued fundamental divergence of the peace policies of the two Premiers, namely, sectional alliances versus universal agreement. The Liberal papers welcome M. Poincaré's reference to the League of Nations as suggesting a new angle of vision. General satisfaction prevails that the correspondence is usefully proceeding from generalities to concrete issues, while unanimous praise is accorded to Mr. MacDonald's efforts to create an improved atmosphere as the most weighty factor in the ultimate settlement.—Reuter.

Glowing Paris Press Tribute

London, Mar. 3.

Great satisfaction is felt in British official circles in regard to M. Poincaré's reply to the Prime Minister's letter.

It is considered that the correspondence marks a very definite advance in relations between Britain and France and clears the air for an Anglo-French conference.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 3.

The newspapers comment at length on the correspondence between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Poincaré.

The "Matin" declares that the letters are absolutely sincere. An important fact is that there is now a determination to reach an understanding. Furthermore the fundamental ideas are admitted on both sides.

The "Petit Journal" says that the cessation of recriminations is a great step forward, but there is still a long way to go before an agreement is reached.

The "Petit Parisien" asserts that Germany will now realize that any attempt to play off Britain against France is foredoomed to failure.

The "Figaro" declares that M. Poincaré's reply shows that France's demands are preliminary conditions for the realization of British aims.

The "Echo de Paris" says that while Mr. MacDonald regards positive guarantees as of secondary importance, M. Poincaré attaches a greater importance to them.

The "Journal" asserts that the correspondence almost gives the impression that for three years we have been victims of a nightmare and all that is needed to make the two countries fall into each other's arms is to wake them up.

The "Gaulois" says that it looks as though negotiations might now be opened in exceptionally encouraging conditions.

The Socialist journal, the "Populaire," says that M. Poincaré's reply is a paltry defence of his policy and heralds difficult negotiations in the near future.

The Radical paper, "Quotidien," affirms that the Premier's reply is a courteous but definite refusal.

The Communist organ "Humanité," calls M. Poincaré's letter hypocritical.

The Leftist newspaper, the "Oeuvre," declares that Mr. MacDonald's is the letter of an honest man desirous of a settlement: M. Poincaré's is the letter of a pseudo Machiavelli who loves quibbling. Reuter.

Berlin's Tribute.

Berlin, Mar. 3.

The newspapers give prominence to the correspondence between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Poincaré.

The "Montagspost" says that Mr. MacDonald's letter is an historical document. For the first time a leading Entente statesman thoroughly and frankly investigates all the political questions hanging over Europe like a cloud of poison. Undeniably, the paper declares, Mr. MacDonald's personality has wholesomely influenced M. Poincaré, and this will not be without effect on the French people.—Reuter.

HOUSE OF LORDS AND AIR DEFENCE

Motion for Maintenance of Home Defence Force Passed Without Division: Interesting Questions in the Commons

London, Mar. 4.

The House of Lords to-day passed without a division, but against the Government's advice, a motion by the Marquess of Londonderry laying stress on the necessity of maintaining for home defence an air force sufficiently strong for adequate protection against attacks by the strongest air force within striking distance.

The Secretary for Air, Brig.-General Thomson (created Peer but title not yet announced), and the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Haldane, for the Government, deprecated the motion as likely unfavourably to affect the Government's foreign policy, but General Thomson assured the House that the Government were continuing their predecessors' scheme for expanding the air defences, though they were ready to take advantage of any disarmament conference decisions. The policy of the country, until general disarmament was possible, should be to make such preparations as would show the world that Britain did not mean to be caught napping, but the Government's policy was to prepare for peace.

Repatriation of Destitute British Seamen.

In the House of Commons today at question-time Mr. Sidney Webb, the President of the Board of Trade, stated that legislation would probably be necessary to deal comprehensively with the question of the repatriation of destitute seamen who were natives of British tropical dependencies. The matter was being considered. He would gladly confer with Mr. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in that connexion, and try to expedite the matter, but it was impossible to hold out any hope of legislation this session.

Betting Bill Discarded.

In reply to questions Mr. Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated that the Government had carefully considered the report of the Betting Committee and after reviewing the whole question had concluded that it would be against the public interest to make the changes in the law which would be involved.

World's Sugar Production.

In the House of Commons today, at question time, the President of the Board of Trade, Mr. Sydney Webb, stated that no official statistics were available, but those compiled by a New York firm showed that sugar production outside the British Empire in 1923/24 was estimated at 14,867,000 tons, or 78.8 per cent. of the world's production.

Minimum Living Wage.

March 5.

In the House of Commons last night a private Member's motion was carried without a division affirming that a minimum living wage for all workers should be the first charge on industry and calling a special commission of inquiry.—Reuter.

Young Turkey's Attack on Religion: Proscription Demanded by People's Party

Constantinople, Mar. 2.

An important session of the People's Party is being held today to discuss three Bills for firstly, the suppression of the Caliphate; secondly, the suppression of the Ministry of Pious Foundations; and thirdly, the abolition of theological schools.

The Bill concerning the Caliphate provides for the deposition of the Caliph, the abolition of the Caliphate, the perpetual expulsion of all members of the Caliphal family from Turkey within ten days, the forfeiture of their Turkish citizenship, the payment of a lump sum which is said not to exceed Liras 300,000

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Volunteer Corps.

General Alarm.—The Commandant of Volunteers calls attention to the advisability of effecting a change in the method of sounding the General Alarm. The existing method of giving the alarm by firing the Customs Gun at Pootung is open to the serious objection that the sound cannot be heard in the main portion of the Settlement. The experiment has been tried of employing the ordinary Ship's "Distress" Signal, but this has been found to be neither loud enough nor sufficiently distinct to serve the purpose. With the object of surmounting the difficulty the Commandant advocates the introduction of "Maroons" such as were used in England during Air Raids and proved to be effective warning signals. The suggested substitution of the "Maroon" will, it is hoped, supply a solution of the problem and afford the desired improvement in the method of disseminating the General Alarm.

Tramways.

Correspondence.—Correspondence in continuation of that published in the Gazette of November 29, 1923:—

Shanghai, January 23, 1924.

SIR,—As requested by you at our meeting yesterday, I now give you in writing the Tramway Company's proposals on the question of overcrowding and the present position concerning Traffic Regulation 36 B.

The present position is that the Company's Appeal to the Full Court and the 53 charges against the Company in the Police Court are still pending, while the Company has fitted to a number of cars and trailers now running gates which it is believed will be satisfactory. As to the latter, as long as they are kept in working order and manipulated as the Company proposes, they must effectively prevent anyone travelling on the steps or mounting or leaving a vehicle whilst in motion.

The Company is willing to withdraw its Appeal if the Council will withdraw the further charges pending and give the Company time to fit gates on all its cars in service. The time can be limited, and in this connexion you will remember that we are still awaiting the Council's approval of these gates before taking steps to have the necessary number made locally; the Company intends to call for tenders as soon as it receives the Council's approval, and push on the work as fast as possible.

Moreover, the Company is prepared to admit the Council's power under Bye-Law 36 to make any reasonable traffic regulation and thereunder to specify the maximum number of passengers to be carried in any car. On the other hand, the Company does suggest that Traffic Regulation 36 B is unjust to the Company, in that it does not provide for any prosecution or even removal of a passenger infringing it; and the Company also asks that the figures which have been laid down under that Regulation should be the subject of further consideration. I think you agree that if the Regulation is to remain in force, it should be amended to deal with offending passengers.

If pending the fitting of gates to all cars, no steps are to be taken to enforce the Regulation, it would seem more convenient from the view of both sides that it should be withdrawn; also if the Council should consider it necessary to lay down a maximum number of passengers to be carried and the Council is prepared to discuss this matter with the Company, that will take a certain amount of time and experience gained from cars running with gates fitted should help us considerably.

For these reasons I suggest that Regulation 36 B should be withdrawn because some amendment of it seems necessary, such amendment would be more easy later on, and by reason of the admissions above stated, which the Company is prepared to make, the Council could make a similar Regulation at any time in the future. To put it shortly, I do not ask for a withdrawal for all time, but only of this present Regulation which is not completely satisfactory.

Having regard to the foregoing, I have to suggest further that if the Council does not approve the wording of Clause 12 of the Extension Agreement with the Company's suggested amendment, it would be more satisfactory to omit the clause altogether. The Council's powers under Bye-Law 36 should not and could not be affected by agreement in any case, and the Council has certain other powers under Clause 9 of the Concession Agreement. Again, in view of the admissions which the Company is prepared to make, I cannot see that this clause is really necessary.

With regard to the word "reasonable," I can only say that it seems plain that the Council must have some latitude, but that it also seems to me that it cannot fairly claim the power to dictate absolutely as to the number of people to be carried without the Company having any say in the matter at all.

I think this covers all the points that were raised yesterday, and I hope it will help you to explain to your colleagues the Company's attitude, and the difficulties we are all trying to solve.

Yours faithfully,
R. N. MACLEOD.

S. FESSENDEN, Esq.,
Chairman,
Shanghai Municipal Council.

Council Chamber,
Shanghai, February 13, 1924.

GENTLEMEN,—I am directed to allude to the letter addressed by Mr. R. N. Macleod to Mr. S. Fessenden, dated January 23, on the subject of the Tramway Company's proposals, and to deal with the points therein raised as follows:—

The Council appreciates the point of view of the Company in regard to Traffic Regulations, but cannot agree to withdraw Regulation No. 36B. However, the Council will consent not to enforce the Regulation in the Courts so long as the Company makes a bona fide effort to prevent overcrowding and proceeds without undue delay to equip all its passenger rolling stock with gates.

The Council approves the present type of gates, but would call the attention of the Tramway Company to the opinion of the Commissioner of Police that the type of construction is none too strong and that the height may be insufficient. It is the opinion of the Council that the question of the strength of the gates as also their height is a responsibility which the Tramway Company must take upon itself, having regard to the primary requirement that the onus of preventing overcrowding lies upon the Company.

With regard to the prosecutions pending against the Company for offences against the Bye-law, the Council will withdraw these concurrently with the withdrawal of the appeal against the conviction recently entered against the Company.

The Council will be pleased to to give consideration to any proposed amendments to the Traffic Regulations which the Company may see fit to suggest.

With respect to your suggestion to omit Clause 12 altogether the Council quite agree.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
E. S. B. ROWE,
Acting Secretary

THE PAPER HUNT CLUB RACE MEETING

Mr. Springfield's Surprise Win of the Club Challenge Cup With Harry M.: Letchfield Well Beaten by Red Pepper

OFFICIALS.

Stewards:—Messrs. G. Grayrigge (Master), C. Noel Davis, M.D., H. W. Lester, E. S. Benbow Rowe, N. L. Sparke, M. O. Springfield, A. W. Olsen (Secretary).

Judge:—Mr. A. W. Burkill.

Assistant Judge:—Mr. S. W. Pratt.

Time Keeper:—Mr. W. G. Pirie.

Starter:—Mr. D. W. Crawford.

Assistant Starter:—Mr. S. A. Sleap.

The annual race meeting of the Paper Hunt Club on Saturday afternoon was run off with the usual good sport attending such events. It is the invariable luck of the Paper Hunt Club to meet with bad weather about this time of the year and very frequently the races have had to be postponed. Such seemed to be the probability this year, but the weather cleared on Friday and Saturday was a glorious day, if a trifle cold. The course had dried up and though not fast the going was quite good.

St. Blaise stood out from all the other runners for the Tunsin Plate, and though Mr. Brand gave his many supporters a shock by postponing the last dash until very late, he managed to get home by a short head from the outsider, White Satin. In the first steeplechase, for the Jorrocks Cup, the speedy Niccolite gave Mr. Maitland an easy ride and a win by many lengths. The two miles race for the Tally Ho Cup brought out the gallant old Seebird once more for his special race, but this time with Mr. Hill in the saddle, and the public accordingly counted him more of a certainty than ever. The fine stayer fully justified the support, for he defeated The Magpie and The Hawfinch by a distance.

The Club Challenge Cup steeplechase produced a surprise. Very few really good ponies had qualified and the race seemed to be a gift for Wild Chance, for Harry M. did not flatter at Kiangwan, Spark Plug is only a second rater despite his succession of placing, Wiltshire has not done well lately in racing, and nothing else appeared to be in the picture. Wild Chance, however, when apparently running easily in the second round, stumbled badly in front of the grand stand and a less experienced rider than his owner certainly would not have stayed in the saddle. Mr. Sparke gathered and steadied the pony and kept him in the running, but from there to the finish there was nothing convincing about the favourite and Harry M., who had been making all the pace, ran away from him to win by five lengths, with Wee Jimmie beaten into third by another four lengths.

Wyvlesfield had a close call in the steeplechase for the Pleasant Quarter's Cup, an outsider in Tara running him to a neck, whilst Aintree, re-named Battletree, was only another length away. The Hungjao Plate went to Zoulou, who won quite comfortably from Dash and Coquelicot. Then came another surprise in the steeplechase for the Stewards' Cup, supposed to be so easy for Letchfield. Mr. Sparke gained a considerable amount of consolation, for Red Pepper carried him as Wild Chance should have done, finishing two lengths ahead of Letchfield, though he had to battle hard to beat off the challenge of Exchequer Bill. Despite the fact that Sweetheart had been very widely tipped to beat both The King and Right Royal for the Beef Stakes, the pony was neglected and when he did justify the opinion of the knowing ones by beating The King by a neck and Royal by another two lengths, the pari-mutuel paid out the big dividend of $277. Del Monte, now Dalmeny, brought off another coup for the Hark Forrard Stakes, beating a lot of highly fancied ponies and coming in a 10 1 winner.

Government Said to Be Inclining in Its Favour

London, Mar. 1.

It is understood that the Cabinet has appointed a special committee under the chairmanship of Mr. J. R. Clynes, the Lord Privy Seal and the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, to consider the whole question of the Singapore base.

The "Daily News," which opposes the base, learns that the opinion of the prominent members of the Cabinet is in no way so hostile as formerly, and believes that the Government will ultimately approve the scheme.—Reuter.

Australia's Keen Demand.

Perth, Mar. 1.

The Acting Premier, Dr. Earle Page, made speeches at a dinner yesterday evening and at a luncheon to-day on the occasion of the visit of the British Naval Squadron, in the course of both of which he laid stress on the importance of the construction of a naval base at Singapore or elsewhere. He said that, if this were accomplished, Australia could receive periodical visits from the main British Fleet and men would be stimulated to join the Australian Navy.

Rear-Admiral Sir Frederick Field, replying on both occasions, said that Singapore represented a gateway which must be defended. It was an absolutely key position, but Australia would require other bases where Australian ships could be repaired.—Reuter.

Comparison Between Britain's Shipbuilding Programme and That of Japan

London, Mar. 5.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to a question, Mr. Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, stated that no decision had yet been made with regard to the Singapore base. The matter was at present being considered.

In reply to Commander Kenworthy, Liberal Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, Mr. Ammon gave particulars of the reduction in the Japanese naval estimates since the earthquake, which would retard Japan's building programme for approximately a year. Commander Kenworthy asked whether this would affect the British building programme. Mr. Ammon replied that the British programme would be built up regardless of anyone else (Liberal cries of "Oh!").

Project Dropped?

London, Mar. 6.

Notwithstanding Mr. Ammon's statement in the House of Commons yesterday, the "Daily Mail" understands that a Cabinet meeting yesterday received a report from the Clynes sub-committee on the Singapore base proposal. The journal says that there is good reason to state that the Government has decided not to proceed with the project and expresses the opinion that resignations from the Board of Admiralty are to be expected unless the Government announces that it has over-ridden the advice of the naval staff.—Reuter.

THE OILFIELDS OF SARAWAK

A Question of Protection: Important Bearing on the Singapore Base

London, Mar. 5.

Presiding at a lecture by the Hon. Mr. T. G. Cochrane to the Royal Society of Arts on the oilfields of Sarawak last night, Lord Bearsted pointed out that the Sarawak field was only 630 miles from Singapore. Development of the field had a very important bearing on the Singapore base. The question of protection of Sarawak was most important because it was inconceivable that we would ever allow that wonderful field to fall into enemy hands.

Lord Bearsted very strongly protested against Governments attempting to develop oil in the British Empire. He was dismayed to see the association of the Australian and British Governments for the purpose of developing oil in Papua and New Guinea. Hundreds of thousands of pounds had been spent without result. The future of the British Empire rested on the efforts and ability of individuals.—Reuter.

THE INDIAN BUDGET

General Improvement Visible: Balance of Trade Well in India's Favour

Delhi, Feb. 29.

In the Legislative Assembly today, Sir Basil Blackett, Finance Member of the Executive Council, produced a balanced budget for part of the year.

He said that the financial position was more satisfactory than in the previous twelve-month, and estimated, on the existing taxation, for a surplus of nearly three and a half crores next year. Practically the only important tariff change was a reduction in the excise duty on motor-spirit by one and a half annas a gallon. The salt tax had yielded three crores less than expected. The question of reduction would be left to the Assembly to decide.

Military expenditure next year would show a considerable reduction. Trade conditions were steady but difficult. There was a prospect that the visible balance of trade in favour of India might reach a record.—Reuter.

AKALI OUTRAGES IN INDIA

Frontier Situation Now Quiet but More Trouble Expected

London, Mar. 3.

The India Office announces that the casualties in the Nabha affray, which took place on February 21, between the troops and a force of armed Akali fanatics, who raided the State, number 21 dead, 33 wounded. Seven hundred persons have been detained.

The situation in Jaito has since been quiet but a second jatha of 500 men has started out and is expected to arrive in Jaito on March 14.—Reuter.

SOVIETISM IN EGYPT

Communist Activities of Cotton Factory Workers Suppressed by Police

Alexandria, Mar. 4.

Another attempt to establish a works Soviet has failed. The workmen employed by the Abouchanab Cotton Oil Factory forcibly took possession of the premises yesterday. Three policemen were injured in the course of the fight.

Zaghlul Pasha sent a message ordering the workmen to evacuate the building or be treated as outlaws. Preparations were made to eject them, whereupon the workmen to-day evacuated the building, which is now strongly held by the police pending conclusion of wage negotiations.

The police seized a quantity of documents at the Communist Headquarters.—Reuter.

MILITARY CONTROL IN GERMANY

British Proposals Adopted by Ambassadors' Conference: Text of Note Drafted

Paris, Mar. 5.

The Conference of Ambassadors to-day agreed on the text of the Note to Germany on the subject of resumption of military control. Marshal Foch was present at the meeting. The British proposals to revive the Inter-Allied plan of September, 1922, substituting a Committee of Guarantees with limited functions for the present Control Commission, were adopted on their main lines.

The Note claims the right of the Inter-Allied Commission to verify throughout Germany whether during 1923, when control ceased, Germany had engaged in new military preparations and whether disarmament can to-day be considered finally completed. If the German Government agrees to an inquiry and the results are satisfactory, then the Allies will appoint a Committee of Guarantees or a similar effective organization.

The German Government must, as a preliminary, reply satisfactorily to the five demands of the 1922 Note dealing with amendments to the laws concerning export of arms, demilitarization of the police, and other matters of military control.—Reuter.

GEN. WRANGEL AGAIN

To Confer with Grand Duke Nicolas: Secret Arrival in Paris

Paris, Mar. 3.

Gen. Wrangel has arrived in Paris from Yugo-Slavia to confer with Grand Nicholas. His whereabout is a secret.

He even refused to receive his ex-officers, but it is understood that the object of the visit is to discuss with the Grand Duke not a possible anti-Bolshevik offensive, of which there is at present no question, but the situation arising from the forthcoming recognition of Soviet Russia by Yugo-Slavia, which would necessitate finding a new home for his (Gen. Wrangel's) army now living on the land in Yugo-Slavia.—Reuter.

U. S. IMMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS

Shipping Companies' Protests Against Quarantine Detentions

New York, Mar. 4.

The Commissioner of Immigration has notified the steamship companies that beginning on March 5 all aliens arriving by second class must go to Ellis Island instead of landing at the piers as hitherto. Also no aliens travelling first class will be examined at the quarantine station after 7.30 in the evening, thus necessitating detention of vessels in quarantine until the morning after arrival.

Representatives of the companies announce that they will appeal against enforcement of the order which, they say, would cause diversion to Canada of many second-class passengers. They add that 80 per cent. of the incoming tourists arrive in "one cabin" steamers, which Ellis Island lists as second class.

Concession by Commissioner.

Later.

At a meeting this afternoon with representatives of the passenger conference lines, the Commissioner of Immigration agreed that second-class passengers should in future be examined in the first-class cabins instead of at Ellis Island.

The Commission also modified the hours of inspection for first class passengers, but declined to agree to the inspection of vessels arriving an appreciable time after sunset.—Reuter's American Service.

Aliens' Wives and Minor Children Abroad Now Barred

New York, Mar. 5.

Federal High Court Judge Hand has ruled that wives and minor children of resident aliens are not admissible to the United States in excess of the immigration quotas, unless it is shown that the resident alien was married while on a temporary visit abroad.

Assistant United States Attorney Thomas states that the decision will have immediate restrictive effects.—Reuter's American Service.

CHINESE LABOUAR ON NAUARU ISLAND

Allegations as to Differing Agreements: Provision for Workmen's Wives

London, Mar. 4.

The House of Commons to-day agreed to vote £106,000 for the Nauru phosphate undertaking after a discussion in which Mr. J. W. Black, Liberal Member for Harborough, called attention to the conditions of Chinese labourers in the islands and the terms of the agreement under which they were brought from China. He said that they had to sign two agreements, one before leaving China, in which a week's work was given as 52 hours, and the other on arrival at the Island, in which a week's work was given as 57 hours. The rate of pay was not stated in the copy of the agreement supplied to him. No reasonable provision was made whereby the labourers could take their wives with them.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, replying, said that he could not accept strictures against Australia, but the statements would be communicated to the Australian Government. He stated that provision had been made for their wives, but the Chinese labourers, for their own reasons, did not desire to bring them (loud laughter).—Reuter.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY BY-ELECTION

Mr. Winston Churchill as an Independent Caindidate: A Triangular Contest

London, Mar. 4.

It was announced to-day that Mr. Winston Churchill has decided to stand for the Abbey division of Westminster as an Independent.

This makes a piquant situation, as Mr. Otho Nicholson, Mayor of Finsbury, nephew of the late Member and official Conservative candidate, and Lieut.-Colonel George Parkinson, the well-known builder and Independent Democratic Conservative, are already in the field. The Liberal, Mr. Scott Duckers, has been threatening to stand if Mr. Churchill is a candidate, while Mr. Havelock Wilson is considering candidature as a "Sane Trade-Unionist."

Later.

Lieut.-Colonel Parkinson has withdrawn his candidature and will support Mr. Churchill.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 2.

Mr. Winston Churchill announces his willingness to stand as Independent Constitutional candidate in the by-election for the Westminster Abbey Division. He declares that he does not intend to change his position on the main questions of public policy but wishes to co-operate with the Conservative Party in opposing the Socialist Party and its allies, whoever they may be.

He adds that there must be hundreds of thousands of Liberals who conscientiously feel similarly and see at this juncture no reason why they should not co-operate with the Conservatives on lines of the late Government's King's Speech and Mr. Baldwin's recent fiscal declaration.—Reuter.

Sympathy with Anti-Socialism

London, Mar. 5.

Mr. Winston Churchill, in a statement in regard to his candidature for Westminister Abbey, declares that he is in no way hostile to the Conservative Party, which he now recognizes to be the rallying ground for the opponents of Socialism.

Mr. Nicholson, the Conservative candidate, says that he is naturally anti-Socialist and asks what will guarantee that Mr. Churchill, in view of his previous record, will not join the Labour Party within a year.

A number of prominent Conservatives have promised to support Mr. Churchill.—Reuter.

FATAL EXPLOSION IN NEW JERSEY

New York, March 1.

Eight persons were killed, 12 are missing and 100 injured as a result of an exlosion at the Nixon Nitration Works on the Raritan River, which shook Northern Jersey and was felt in New York City. Windows within a mile radius of the explosion were shattered and doors unhinged.

Later.

It is now believed that 30 persons perished as a result of the explosion at the Nixon Nitrate Works on the Raritan River. All neighbouring buildings, including 100 workmen's quarters, were wrecked and are now on fire.

The Ammonite Company, which was using the building for storage, is engaged in the manufacture of fertilizers from war-time high explosives and unused shells. The buildings which were blown up contained 1,000,000 gallons of ammonia niterate and 15 tank cars each containing 90,000 gallons of ammonia nitrate in process of crystallization.—Reuter's American Service.

THE RECENT AVIATION FATALITIES

Thrilling Story of Survivor: A Fatal Side-slip Followed by Fire

London, Mar. 5.

A thrilling story was told today at the inquest at Biggin Hill on Flying Officer Smith and Sergeant Lister, of the Air Force, who were killed in aeroplane accidents on Monday.

A survivor, Pilot Meech, said that the Vickers-Vimy F-9181 ascended in the morning for a flight for the Air Ministry. Films were being taken from another machine, the operations being intended to illustrate an aeroplane shot down and on fire. At 3,500 feet he received the prearranged signal and ignited a flare. Flying Officer Smith commenced stalling at a speed of 100 miles an hour and dropped to 600 feet. In the last stall the machine rose-dived and partially flattened out near a group of trees, but side-slipped, hitting the trees. Witness jumped 20 feet to the ground just before the machine crashed. It caught fire and the bodies of Flying Officer Smith and Sergeant Lister were burned to ashes.

A verdict of death from misadventure was returned.—Reuter.

THREE MILE LIMIT

Religion to be Purged from Political Influences

Constantinople, March 4.

On the occasion of the fateful debate crowds of people surrounded the Assembly, building, which was packed. A speech by Mustapha Kemal Pasha dwelling on the necessity of purging religion from political influences, unifying the system of education and purifying the judiciary was received with acclamation, except by the clerical and Conservative minority, who raised slight opposition and suggested that the Caliphate should be vested in the President or in the Assembly, but the proposal was rejected. Then the Assembly approved without discussion the bills suppressing the Commissariats of Pious Foundations and Religious Affairs and the Chief of the General Staff, after which the bill abolishing the Caliphate was voted integrally after a lively debate, in which Mustapha Kemal Pasha's proposal to exempt the ladies of the Caliphal family from expulsion was rejected.

It is reported that the Caliph intends to proceed to Egypt.

The ladies of the harem are greatly perturbed. The principal wife is prostrated with grief. The chief eunuch has refused food for three days.

The Deposition Ceremony.

Later.

At two o'clock this morning the Vali of Constantinople and the Director-General of Public Security, accompanied by the Police, proceeded to the Dolma Baghche Palace where they ordered the Caliph to seat himself upon the Throne. The decree ordering his deposition was then read, after which the Caliph was ordered to descend from the throne and to make arrangements for an immediate departure. An hour later, accompanied by two wives and his son, he was motored to Chatalja on the frontier, where a special train awaited his departure.

LUDENDORFF AND NATIONALISM

Fiery Declamation at Bavarian Sedition Trial: An Appeal to the Chauvinists

Munich, Feb. 29.

The evidence of General von Ludendorff, in the form of a three-hour political propagandist speech, was read this afternoon before a crowded court. The witness was wearing horn-rimmed spectacles. He occasionally almost shouted his declarations. He dealt with his ambitions to separate Bavaria from the Reich and described his share in the November revolt. He declared that he was an old man, but his heart was young and beat with longing for the freedom of the people and with love of the people.

General Ludendorff denounced Marxism and Communism. He declared that he was against Jews, who should not be allowed to obtain authoritative influence in Germany any more than the English or French. He admitted that he was a monarchist, but he considered that the monarchical question could not be solved at present.

The speaker bitterly accused the ex-Dictator of Bavaria, Dr. von Kahr, and General von Lossow of acting dishonourably and of having "lied with their handshake." He declared with raised fist that the action of the police and troops in firing on the Nationalist bands with himself at the head was murder and disgraceful.

Nationalism Saved.

He concluded almost lyrically: "In spite of treachery, murder and broken promises, the Nationalist movement has been saved. We do not want a Rhine Confederation by the grace of France: we do not want a State under the influence of Marxist, Jewish or ultramontane figures, but a Germany which only belongs to Germans. The destruction of the Nationalist movement was the price paid for the reconciliation of General von Lossow and General von Seeckt, between Berlin and Munich. The hopes of the enemies of Bismarckian Germany are dashed to the ground. The Nationalist movement stands erect. May it, through the blood of the martyrs of November 9, become so strong that it firmly welds the German people and so that the Reich arises, freed from the fetters of Federalism or Separatism, a Reich strong and free." General von Ludendorff sat down amid a suppressed hum of applause.

The proceedings terminated with compliments from the Public Prosecutor, who said that the prosecution had never had the idea of calling into question the General's personal courage.

Asked by the Chief Justice how he thought things would have gone if Dr. von Kahr and General von Lossow had carried out their original intentions, General Ludendorff replied: "The movement, supported by the Nationalist organizations of the North, would have become such a mighty demonstration in the Reich that the affair would have been carried out without any act of violence."—Reuter.

Gen. von Ludendorff's Counsel Demands Arrest of other Generals

Munich, Mar. 3.

At the trial of Gen. von Ludendorff, the request of counsel for the defence for the arrest of Dr. von Kahr, Gen. von Lossow and Gen. von Seisser, as being responsible for the November bloodshed, was refused.

A lieutenent of the Infantry School testified that the school supplied guns to participants in the November rising. The public was excluded by request of the Prosecutor when the lieutenant made this statement.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 3.

The German Cabinet has freed Dr. von Kahr from his bond of professional secrecy in order to permit him to reply to Gen. von Ludendorff's attacks. Catholic circles are excited by General Lundendorff's attacks on the Vatican. He attributes to Benedict XV phrases which tend to prove he was hostile to the Central States. In Vatican circles it is affirmed that the Holy See will make démarches to the German Government if the latter does not express rgret—French Wireless through Reuter.

Witnesses Said to Have Been Influenced by Circulation of Pamphlets

Munich, March 4.

On the resumption of the trial of Gen. von Ludendorff and Herr Hitler, counsel for the defence asserted that the witnesses and even the Public Prosecutor had been influenced by Gen. von Lossow and Gen. von Seisser circulating pamphlets stating their own case. He also declared that Dr. von Kahr and Generals von Lossow and von Seisser had made a joint statement to the examining judge after reading the statements of other witnesses, and that Gen. von Lossow's statement had been distributed to all the military witnesses.

The Court then decided to exclude the public, including the representatives of the Reichswehr Ministry, during the examination of officers of the Infantry School, in view of the fact that many questions with regard to concealed arms would be asked.—Reuter.

AMERICAN OIL LEASES INVESTIGATION

Income Tax Returns of Men Implicated Scrutinized

Washington, Feb. 29.

The Senate to-day adopted a resolution for an investigation of the income-tax returns of ex-Secretary Fall, Mr. Doheny, Mr. Sinclair and the others concerned in the oil leases inquiry. The Senate then considered a resolution for an examination of Mr. Daugherty's administration as Attorney-General.

It is understood that President Coolidge will shortly appoint a special committee to enquire into the validity of the title-deed held by the Standard Oil Company of California to sections of the naval oil reserves in California.

Mar. 1.

The Senate has passed a resolution authorizing an investigation into Mr. Daugherty's administration of the Department of Justice.

The resolution was carried by 66 votes to 1, the only negative vote being that of Senator Elkins, who recently announced that he had purchased oil stocks and was willing to disclose all about it. The insurgent Republican, Senator Brooker, will preside over the investigation committee.—Reuter's American Service.

Telegrams to Palm Beach in Government Code

Washington, Mar. 3.

The inquiry of the Senate oil committee has disclosed a new trail.

It is declared that some telegrams from Washington to Palm Beach were in the old code of the Department of Justice written by Mrs. Mary Duchstein, a former secretary, to Mr. Burns, the Chief of the Investigation Bureau of the Department of Justice, to her husband, an employee of Mr. McLean, the publisher of the "Washington Post."

In the Senate to-day, where the resolution was discussed, demanding an investigation into Mr. Daugherty's administration of the Department of Justice, the Democrat, Senator Caraway, declared that he held the Attorney-General responsible for the use of the Department code in the messages to Palm Beach.

He added that he would like to ask the President himself whether he had been communicating with Florida.—Reuter's American Service.

Mr. Heflin's Definition of the "Principal"

Washington, Mar. 5.

The Democratic Senator, J. T. Heflin, caused a sensation in the Senate to-day when in the course of a debate he referred to the telegram sent to Mr. McLean, the publisher of the "Washington Post," at Palm Beach by Mr. Bennett, editorial writer of the same newspaper, informing him that he had seen the "principal," who assured him that there would be "no rocking of the boat and no resignations."

Senator Heflin expressed the opinion that the "principal" was no less a person than President Coolidge. He stated that the telegram was sent when the Senate was discussing the necessity for the resignation of Secretary of the Navy Denby and suggestions were made that Attorney-General Daugherty should resign. He asked that the Oil Committee should call Mr. Bennett to question him as to what he meant when he telegraphed that he had seen the principal who "expected a reaction from the unwarranted political attacks."—Reuter's American Service.

Coded Telegrams to Palm Beach Explained by Mrs. Duckstein

Washington, Mar. 4.

Mr. Burns, the Chief of the Investigation Bureau of the Department of Justice, and Mrs. Mary Duckstein gave evidence to-day before the Senate Oil Committee with regard to the telegrams to Mrs. Duckstein's husband at Palm Beach, which were alleged to be in the old Department of Justice code.

Mrs. Duckstein said that they were garbled in transmission. Mr. Burns said that they were merely intended to suggest that Mr. McLean should resign his position as special agent of the Department of Justice at $1 a year, because continuance might embarrass Mr. Daugherty. — Reuter's American Service.

AN ANGLO-ITALIAN CONTROVERSY

Jubaland Claimed by Italy as Promised Under War Agreement

[The following message gives the Italian official view. We have not yet heard the British side of the question.]

Italian Wireless Service.

Rome, Feb. 26.

Premier Mussolini has addressed a forceful Note to the British Foreign Office giving Italy's point of view on the question of the cession to Italy of British Jubaland. It is understood that this Note has taken the place of another far more sharply worded one, which had been prepared after the statement of Mr. Ponsonby, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in the House of Commons on February 20, when he declared that no settlement of the Jubaland question was possible until the question with which it was linked, the return by Italy of the Dodecanese Islands to Greece, had been solved. Later on, however, the British Foreign Office made a communication to Italy to the effect that Mr. Ponsonby's statement was to be considered as expressing the point to which the negotiations had been brought by Lord Curzon when he retired from the Foreign Office, and that the new Government, not having had time to go into the matter thoroughly, had not definitely settled its policy on the question. In view of this explanation, Signor Mussolini in his Note has not protested against Mr. Ponsonby's statement but has limited himself to a review of the Jubaland question in all its phases.

The London Pact.

Jubaland is first mentioned in the London Pact, which contains the conditions under which Italy consented to join the side of the Allies. It is stated in this treaty that, if the Allies won the war and annexed German colonies, the British would cede Jubaland to Italy. In this same treaty Italy's sovereignty over the Dodecanese Islands is fully recognized. According to the Treaty of London, therefore, Italy has just claims to both Jubaland and the Dodecanese Islands.

The question first became complicated at the time of the enactment of the Treaty of Sèvres and of the Bonin-Venizelos Agreement. M. Venizelos refused to sign this agreement until the British Foreign Office undertook to use its influence on Italy to obtain the return of the Dodecanese Islands to Greece. Italy at the same time was granted an extensive zone of influence in Asia Minor.

Since then Britain had made the cession of Jubaland to Italy conditional upon the return of the Dodecanese Islands to Greece. Italy, however, contends that the above mentioned treaty and agreement have been repudiated by subsequent international agreements, which have deprived her of the zone of influence, and that these questions have reverted to the original terms of the London Pact, the only treaty dealing with the matter which now has any value.

Alleged Compromise Suggested.

In previous negotiations an attempt was made to induce Italy to accept rectification of the frontier of her Tripoli colony with Egypt instead of with Jubaland, but, since the latter country secured its independence, this attempt utterly failed. Britain then offered to cede Italy Jubaland but keep the wells for herself. Italy refused this offer, on the ground that the territory would be of no value without the wells. Subsequently Britain offered to waive the question of the Dodecanese Islands if Italy would accept a compromise regarding Jubaland, but this was refused because Italy mainatined that the Dodecanese Islands had nothing whatever to do with Jubaland.

Premier Mussolini's Note ends by exhorting the British Government not to embitter Italian public opinion by refusing to cede a piece of territory which she can very well do without and which is of very limited use to Briatin. He again expresses the opinion that the cession of Jubaland is a debt of honour, which Britain cannot repudiate without breaking her word, and energetically reaffirms that he will not consent to the question of the Dodecanese Islands being used as a weapon against him to arrest the concession of Jubaland. Whether or not the Dodecanese Islands shall be returned to Greece is a matter which must be setted by direct negotiation between Italy and Greece, adds Premier Mussolini.

Jubaland is a long narrow strip dividing Kenya Colony in East Africa from Italian Somaliland and running back to Abyssinia.

MORE VOTING POWER FOR WOMEN

Bill to Enfranchise All from 21 Years Up and Widen Residential Conditions

London, Feb. 29.

The House of Commons to-day passed the second reading of a bill moved by Mr. W. M. Adamson, Labour Member for Cannock, Staffordshire, to amend the Representation of the People Act of 1918 with the object of enfranchising women of 21 years of age and upwards both in local government and in Parliamentary elections and placing the whole franchise for both sexes, other than University electors, on a similar basis of residence.

Miss Jewson, Labour Member for Norwich, in her maiden speech seconding the bill, spoke confidently and made her points clearly and was frequently cheered. She claimed that the experiment in the enfranchisement of women in 1918 had been amply justified. Women voted wisely and well. She ridiculed the fears of "petticoat government" by women combining to outvote the men.

The Duchess of Atholl, Conservative Member for Perth and Kinross, moved an amendment in favour of a conference of all parties to decide what further alteration in franchise was desirable. She expressed the opinion that prior to a great extension of the franchise they ought to wait until women had gained ex-

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

OUR PARIS LETTER

France on the Brink of Financial Ruin: Panic Measures to Cope with Situation

From Our Own Correspondent.

Paris, Jan. 18.

The Government has become thoroughly alive to the danger of the financial situation. It is asking Parliament to vote a series of measures of an emergency character. They include an automatic increase of 20 per cent. in all direct taxes, reductions in public expenditure to the amount of Frs. 1,000,000,000, and several minor measures, the details of which are not yet announced, tending to restrict speculation in currencies and prevent fiscal frauds—a delightfully vague expression which can cover anything from searching passengers' baggage at the Customs stations to unearthing the unpatriotic citizens who conceal the full amount of their incomes.

The Government also asks to be given power to stop imports of any goods which it does not consider necessary. This last proposal, which involves arbitrary interference with the ordinary flow of trade and will have consequences such as no one can foresee, is in itself sufficient to show how alarmed are the men in authority, and how suddenly they have fallen from official optimism to something like pessimism.

This abruptness is just what the country may fail to understand. "On Tuesday January 5," writes M. Pierre Bertrand, editor of the "Quotidien," "the Government suddenly became enlightened because the franc had dropped sharply the day before and discovered that the country is in a serious position and that heroic remedies are indispensable. Up to this memorable date everything, we were told, was going on nicely. Not only was the Budget balanced, but there was a surplus. The Treasury was so well off that we were able to lend hundreds of millions of francs to the Poles, Serbians and Rumanians. In short, the consequences of the Ruhr victory were developing, and, by merely waiting quietly, we should be able to reap the fruits.

20 P.C. INCREASED TAXATION.

"A single day sufficed to change everything. As the result of an unusually sharp attack on our currency, the Government discovered all at once that the position of our finances is lamentable, that existing taxes must be increased, that there is a deficit of at least Frs. 8,000,000,000 and that this hole must be filled up even if a lot of poor people have to go hungry. The Budget, of course, was balanced, but that was simply the ordinary Budget, and there was the other one to think about—the Budget of Recoverable Expenditure, which is all outlay and no revenue. This would have to be tacked on to the ordinary Budget and paid for by the 20 per cent. increase in taxes. Very good. Let us, for the sake of argument, admit that these proposals are meant seriously. What is incomprehensible to the taxpayer is why the same men who were telling us yesterday that all was well are alarming us to-day, and why we have all at once ceased to be prosperous and find ourselves on the brink of a precipice. How will the taxpayer take it?" That, indeed, is the question. In the preliminary debate which took place yesterday in the Chamber, M. Poincaré's supporters remained faithful to him even when he said that the Government would oppose any legislation involving fresh expenditure, but his majority was distinctly less than he has had on questions of foreign policy, and, for the first time, some of the "old Parliamentary hands" are beginning to doubt whether he will be in power when the general election takes place.

WHERE ARE THE PATRIOTS?

To ask deputies, three months before they come before their constituents for re-election, to vote a large increase in taxation and reject the pensions and insurance schemes which would have given the deputies who voted them a distinct claim on the gratitude of a great many electors, is to expect something like political heroism. One may be excused for doubting whether the Government's proposals will be adopted in their entirety. They will make living dearer than ever, and this will be quite enough to rouse great opposition, especially in view of the general tendency in France to make the Government responsible for everything.

As an instance I may quote some remarks by M. André Billy, the writer of a short daily article in the "Petit Journal." He says: "Because I advised those who complained of the dearness of living not to expect relief from the Government but to go through their expenses with a small toothcomb so as to make both ends meet, I have received quite a number of letters containing nasty remarks addressed to myself. I recommended housewives to eat ordinary instead of fancy bread and to buy chilled instead of fresh meat. The general effect of these letters is: 'And so you expect us to give up fresh meat and light bread because the Government cannot do its duty and make living cheaper? You must be a nice sort of fellow!' I don't know whether the Government has or has not done its duty towards the cost of living, but I have a very strong impression that the Government cannot do much in a country where no one will sacrifice any interest, where no check is placed on egotism, and where no housewife will give up fancy bread, the pretext being that it is the Government's fault if fancy bread is dear."

BUSINESS NOT COUNTRY FIRST.

The whole question of saving French currency from a severe fall is one of self-interest. It is useless to urge the public not to buy foreign goods when everybody knows that French speculators are as ready as any others to sell francs if they see a chance of profits, and when French exporters are keeping part of their money abroad instead of bringing it home. The latest instance of the "business first" principle is supplied by a statement made at the offices of the Under-Secretary for Mercantile Marine, to the effect that representations have been made to the Shipowners' Committee concerning the action of certain French shipping companies in requiring their customers to pay freights in dollars. The reply was that most of the French shipping companies have to pay pounds or dollars for their coal and oil, and they have considered this to be a sufficient reason for requesting freight payments to be made in those currencies. The department has no power to stop the practice.

CHICKEN OR BILLIARDS.

An Englishwoman who knows her Paris and has penetrated the great secret that one can generally find excellent food at the small restaurants frequented by cabdrivers and other toilers, was about to lunch with a woman friend at one of these democratic establishments the other day when she saw a notice announcing a "poule au gibier." Believing that she had discovered a characteristically French dish previously unknown to her, she summoned the proprietor and ordered two "poules au gibier." The worthy man was somewhat taken aback, and, having made sure that his ears did not deceive him, he said: "I am afraid, madame, you will have to come this evening, as that is when the 'poule au gibier' is played." "I don't want to play anything" was the retort; "I want two portions of your 'poule au gibier' which I take to be a fowl dished up with one of your wonderful French sauces that will make it taste like game." Light then dawned upon the proprietor, and he explained that a "poule au gibier" is a billiard sweepstakes for which the prize is a pheasant or a hare or some other head of game purchased out of the entrance fees and carried off by the winner. Having thus enriched their knowledge of the French language, the two ladies lunched off beefsteaks. One wonders if they are acquainted with yet another meaning of the word "poule."

ENGLISH AS SHE IS WROTE

By a London University Professor.

My official capacity brings me at this time of the year frequently into inquisitorial contact with the aspiring young. They may be seeking scholarships, or to pass a university qualifying examination, or, more dully, to satisfy me with their progress during the past term. Here is one of their offerings. I copy it in its perfection, adding not one comma, not one iota:

> To have a good diet one should have vitimin a, which consists of green vegetables and fruit especially uncooked cabage and in oranges and lemons, it is at unknown substance which is found in these and in any vegetable that is not cooked very well, if they are cooked a great deal it kills this germ and all the good in it is lost, the lack of this causes scurvy, and a lack of vitiminis altogether causes rickets, constipation, you get full of spots, and a very bad colour.

Really to enjoy the lustre of this gem take a deep breath and then say it as fast as you can. Better, perhaps, intone it. You will know that you are in the presence of a masterpiece.

But what, I ask, am I, a man with some shreds of conscience left, even after 20 years of marking examination papers, to do about a candidate who writes thus? I can say to myself: "A bare moiety of the facts are there. Who am I to censor the King's English? I am an examiner in science, not in the writing of English." On the other hand, the remnants of my conscience say: A candidate who is guilty of the muddled thinking which such rottenness of expression betokens should not be let loose on the cure of souls or of bodies." It is a case between my kindness of heart and my conscience.

If my candidates were elementary school children, coming from poor class homes, and thrust on the world at the age of fourteen, I could understand it. My candidates are not even children of the New Rich. They have a fine, crusted flavour of aristocracy about them. They are over nineteen years of age, and have been expensively brought up. The names of their schools will make my son green with envy. The result of all the care and money spent on their education is. . . . that they cannot even write their own language! So I explode, thus:

> These are the people who are to fill Government offices—who, by the weight of the family influence, can impose themselves upon us as our rulers. No wonder that the Battle of Jutland, won on the water, was lost in a dispatch.

In my more Minor Prophet moments I cry down destruction upon them; but, after all, it is not entirely their fault. If the public schools tolerate such a thing, why should I punish their victims?

THE FLUCTUATING YEN

[The rate of exchange for the yen is fluctuating heavily.]

Dear Reader, I take up my pen
(As you'll notice I do now and then)
On behalf of those women and men
Who'll possibly never again
Get back to a stabilized "yen."
(A properly stabilized "yen.")
Who thinks of them? Not one in ten!
Could they tell you who work near Big Ben
What it means to a housekeeper when
She is buying the eggs of a hen
When there isn't a stabilized "yen"?
(A properly stabilized "yen.")
To the franc and the mark our attention is called, and our pound now and then Goes wandering out of our ken,
But surely it's worse for the women and men
Who'll possibly never—no never—again
Get back to a stabilized "yen"!

DIPLOMACY IN ANCIENT GREECE

"Stupidity" and Strategy

In a paper on "Ancient Diplomacy," read to the Classical Association Mr. F. E. Adcock said the verdict of the ancient world was that when you wanted a diplomatist you employed a Greek. At Sparta diplomacy was a career. It was fashionable to call the Spartans stupid; the Greeks called them wily. They were, it seemed to him, persistently and intelligently dishonest, and this, of course, led to stupidity when they deceived themselves as well as others. In the war between Persia and Sparta at the beginning of the fourth century they used diplomacy as a part of strategy; and the Persians went one better at the same game. But when they had a clearly conceived policy they were able to pursue it with adroit persistence. And sometimes their diplomacy had a note of constructive cunning.

The Spartan diplomatists seemed like the successful Spanish Ambassadors of the 16th and 17th centuries, with their grave, discreet impressiveness, which masked a vast deal of finesse. Here, perhaps, they had the advantage over the Athenians, whose native eloquence and love of intellectual display made them bad listeners. He doubted if any amount of practice in suppressio veri could have made Demosthenes discreet.

What was perhaps more characteristic of Greek diplomacy was what he called a kind of logic. It was possible that had there been a little less logic at Athens Greece would have been spared the impoverishment of the Peloponesian War. The weak side of Greek diplomacy seemed to him to be its unwillingness to compromise.

Professor Postgate was elected President of the Association in succession to Lord Crewe.

INTERESTING CHINESE CULT

Lecture by Mrs. F. Ayscough

A paper entitled "The Cult of the Spiritual Magistrate of the City Walls and City Moats" was delivered by Mrs. Ayscough on January 15, before the Royal Asiatic Society, and was illustrated by a number of very fine lantern slides. Dr. W. Percival Yetts, who presided, said the lecturer needed no introduction. She had been described by Prof. Giles as "that rara avis in Sinology, a woman, Mrs. Florence Ayscough." She was the sole Western woman to reach eminence in Chinese studies.

Mrs. Ayscough said this cult was one of the most popular in China to-day. After death the spirit of some famous man was often appointed to the post, which varies in rank according to the size of the city. Thus the Magistrate of the Capital is a Royal Prince, that of the Provincial Capitals a Duke of the Prefectural Cities a Marquis, and of the District Cities an Earl. His special duty is to keep a record of men's actions in this world, so that he can make an accurate report to the Ruler of the World of Shades, who decides what rewards and what punishments shall be meted out to the spirits of the dead. A death is at once reported to the local tutelary deity, who is supposed in his turn to report it to the nearest Spiritual Magistrate, who then informs the Ruler of Hades that he may expect such and such a person to arrive in spirit form. Since the days of the highest antiquity the Chinese have been convinced that men's souls survive this life in some more tenuous form, and that their wants in the other world did not differ greatly from those they had felt here. This being so, they consider it perfectly reasonable to imagine a spiritual hierarchy corresponding with the hierarchy of this world. Republicanism did not seem as yet, to have invaded the Dark regions, as the Spiritual Magistrates when making their tours of inspection are still preceded by the scarlet beards of authority, which show that they have received an Imperial command to go forth and "examine clearly" the state of the city. These progresses, when the figure of the Magistrate is carried through the streets, take place three times in the year. The temples of the Magistrate are built on the exact model of an official residence. Highly educated Chinese naturally look upon the superstitious practices connected with the cult as being fit only for the ignorant, but belief in the survival of the soul is universal among them.

The origin of the cult was rooted in the highest antiquity, as it had sprung from a sacrifice instituted by King Yao about 2357 B.C. to the rivers and mud walls, and developed as an outcome of the belief in the yin and the yang. The lecturer then described particularly the temple of the Spiritual Magistrate in the District City of Shanghai, showing pictures of the figures representing the Magistrate and his household with its various accoutrements, and spoke of the rites connected with him. The temple was of the Ming period, and was erected on the site of an earlier temple to Ho Kuang, erected about A.D. 270.

Dr. Giles and Mr. Hopkins contributed to the discussion, and both expressed the opinion that it was very doubtful if the cult sprang from the very early sacrificial rites in China, as Mrs. Ayscough thought, and Dr. Giles said he thought the cult was essentially Buddhist in character. The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the lecturer for her interesting paper.

BARONET AS SON OF ALLAH

Sir Archibald Hamilton Becomes a Moslem: Woking Ceremony

"It is perfectly true that I have embraced the faith of Islam, and that I made formal profession of my faith at the Mosque at Woking on December 20," said Sir Archibald Hamilton, Bart., of Selsey, Sussex, to the "Evening Standard."

"I consider that the faith of Islam is the only true religion, and that it is the religion of the future. It contains all that is best in other religions, and emphasies the duty of man to God and to his brother men.

"This decision was not arrived at without much thought and study; which study, I may say, was very excellently guided by Lord Headley, who has made the pilgrimage to Mecca—a pilgrimage which I hope to make some day. I do not know when, but it certainly will be some day not very far distant.

"Islam requires that its adherents should carry their religion about with them seven days of the week. One reason which made me turn to Islam was that I found that the average Christian, particularly of the Anglican sect, took his Christianity with him to church on Sunday, and then completely, and apparently willingly, forgot it during the remaining six days of the week.

ALL SONS OF ALLAH.

Christians generally are the most intolerant people in the world, whereas we believe that all teaching of a religious nature is divinely inspired.

"All men to us are brothers. They may be black, white, or yellow, but they are all sons of Allah the All Powerful.

"The faith of Islam is the only kind of Socialism which can be of any practical good. Under the ordinary workaday Socialism of the Labour Party the genius of the individual is stultified, but in Islam it is preserved.

"The ceremony at Woking was very simple. I simply made my declaration, and was admitted a member."

Sir Archibald Hamilton, who is 48, holds two baronetcies, one dating from 1776 and the other from 1819. He succeeded to both on the death of his father in 1915.

WRONGFUL DETENTION ON PLEA OF LUNACY

Farmer Awarded £25,000 Against Two Doctors

London, Feb 29

A proposal will be made that the Government should appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the Lunacy Laws as a result of a lawsuit in which a farmer named Harnett has been awarded a total of £25,000 damages against two doctors, Dr. Bond, Commissioner in Lunacy, and Dr. Adam, who has a home for mental cases.

Mr. Harnett was detained at asylums for over eight years but escaped in 1921, when specialists certified him to be sane.

The jury found that Mr. Harnett was sane when he was detained in 1912 and that reasonable care had not been exercised.

A stay of execution was granted pending an appeal.—Reuter.

MISTAKES OF THE LABOUR GOVERNMENT

Mr. George All for Forbearance

London, Mar. 1.

Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at Hartlepool to-day, urged, in view of the serious situation at home and abroad, forbearance, toleration and sympathy for the Labour Government, whose mistakes hitherto, he said, had been largely mistakes of inexperience. "I am all for leaving them for some time between the handles of the plough," he declared. "They will soon have aching backs and weary hearts but very much wiser heads."

The former Premier expressed the opinion that a coalition was not now a practical alternative. It was more vital than ever to Britain's well-being that Liberal sentiment should be strengthened and mobilized to impress on the members of the Labour Party the folly of alienating Liberal support by adventures in socialism. — Reuter.

THE GERMAN ATTITUDE TO REPARATIONS

Distrust in French Press

Paris, Feb. 29.

Commenting on Dr. Stresemann's speech in the Reichstag yesterday, in which he declared that Germany was prepared to discuss the question of reparations and did not want to disturb the present negotiations of the Committee of Experts, but that it was the duty of the German Government to undertake anything designed to render an attempt at settlement successful, the "Petit Parisien" characterizes the speech as a perfidious and astute invitation to the Experts to espouse Germany's cause. If the speech is to be taken as a new orientation of German policy, the Reich must prove it by acts.

The "Echo de Paris" disclaims Dr. Stresemann's interpretation of France's waiting attitude. The journal says that France is ready to agree to big sacrifices for a general settlement, but she is in no way prepared to break the instrument she has armed herself with unless she is assured that there will not be any necessity to use it in future.—Reuter.

U. S. INCOME TAX

Lower Surtax and Reduction on Small Incomes

Washington, Feb. 28.

The House of Representatives, after rejecting by 261 votes to 153 the Republican proposal to restore the so-called Mellon Tax Bill instead of the Garner Democratic Tax Reduction Bill, adopted by 216 votes to 199 a compromise measure proposed by Mr. Nicholas Longworth, Republican (Ohio), making the maximum surtax 37½ per cent. (as compared with the Garner proposal of 44 per cent. and the Mellon proposal of 25).

The Longworth Bill will reduce the nominal tax on small incomes from 4 to 2 per cent.—Reuter's American Service.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

THE NAVAL BASE AT SINGAPORE

Government's Decision Not to Proceed with the Scheme for the Present: A Project Not Abandoned But Shelved: No Definite Decision

London, March 6.

The newspaper report that the Cabinet had decided not to proceed with the Singapore base has not been confirmed officially. The Cabinet Committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. J. R. Clynes, considering the scheme, has not yet submitted a report.

An official, interviewed by Reuter's representative to-day, said that the question was so important that the decision would probably first be announced in Parliament. "The report may or may not be correct, but it is premature."

It is hoped that the Committee will report to the Cabinet next week.

Later.

The Press Association understands that the Government have decided not to proceed with the Singapore scheme. The decision has been communicated to the Dominions and the Government will await their replies before making an announcement in the House of Commons.

March 7.

The belief is now general that the Government will not proceed with the Singapore Naval base scheme though there is a tendency in some quarters to believe that the project is not so much abandoned as shelved.

The political correspondent of the "Daily Chronicle" says that the Cabinet's attitude is that no active support will be given to the scheme at present on the ground that decisive measures are not called for and that the position has resolved itself into a negative attitude of marking time.

In any case public announcement of the Cabinet's decision is expected early next week when exchanges of opinion with the Dominions will be concluded. Meanwhile the Liberal and Labour opponents of the scheme, who regard it as as good as dead, are expressing deep satisfaction. It is understood that Viscount Chelmsford favours the project and stipulated before going into the Cabinet that it should be thoroughly examined on its merits apart from Labour pledges against it.

Later.

In the House of Commons to-day, Major Sir Arthur Morrison-Bell, Unionist Member for Honiton, gave notice that he would ask the Prime Minister whether since the Government assumed office there had been any further exchange of views with the Dominions concerned with regard to the construction of the Singapore dock and whether he proposes to submit those communications to the House of Commons.—Reuter.

AMERICAN OIL LEASE INVESTIGATION

Allegations against High Officials: President's Telegram to Florida

New York, Mar. 6.

The question of the retirement of Attorney-General Daugherty is again being given serious attention. It is even stated that the White House is considering selection of a successor.

One of the reasons for the recrudescence of the demand for his resignation is the alleged disclosures resulting from a grand jury investigation of the Chicago Bureau, in which connexion the jury reported that Government funds had been used in speculation and that sums had been paid to two members of Congress. The disclosures are stated to relate to matters over which Mr. Daugherty had technical jurisdiction as head of the Department of Justice.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Mar. 6.

The following telegram from President Coolidge to Mr. McLean in Florida, dated January 12, was placed on record by the Oil Committee to-day: "Prescott is away. Advise Slemp with whom I shall confer." Mr. Slemp, the President's secretary, was then in Florida. Members of the Committee were unaware who Mr. Prescott was. The President telegraphed to Mr. McLean at Palm Beach on February 12, "Thank you for your message. You always have been very considerate. Mrs. Coolidge joins me in sending kindest regards to Mrs. McLean."

President Coolidge immediately issued a statement from the White House saying that the matters mentioned in his message related to questions of local government in the District of Columbia in which Washington is located. The President explained that he desired to confer with Mr. Prescott, who was Republican City Chairman, regarding District matters.

President Coolidge declared that the second telegram was a [illegible] telegram from Mr. McLean congratulating the President on his Lincoln's Day speech and amounted merely to an exchange of amenities.

Examination of Tax Returns.

[illegible] submit to the Oil Committee the tax returns of individuals or corporations prominently mentioned in the oil investigation, stating that the Acting Attorney-General advises that the President is without authority to comply with such a request. President Coolidge, however, offers to co-operate in the effort to secure an amendment to the regulations which would permit the Committee to inspect the returns.

The Cancellation of Leases.

It was announced to-day that the Government will begin next week a suit for the cancellation of the oil leases granted to the Doheny and Sinclair interests on the ground of "fraud illegality." An injunction has also been asked to restrain the lessees from making further drillings. The Court has been requested to appoint receivers to control the Government properties pending litigation.

A Heated Scene.

It was later announced that Mr. McLean's congratulations related to the President's reply to the Senate's demand for the resignation of Secretary of the Navy Denby.

Speaking in the Senate Senator Lodge warmly defended President Coolidge in connexion with the telegrams to the McLeans, declaring that they were perfectly trivial and easily explained and that there should be a rule to protect the President against such attacks on the part of Senators.

Replying to Senator Lodge, Senator Harrison denied that he had attacked President Coolidge. An altercation then ensued between them, terminating in Senator Harrison expressing hope that the President would make an explanation and that the country would accept Senator Lodge's statement.

At this stage Messrs. Heflin, Carraway and McKellar intervened, recalling that Senator Lodge had formerly been one of President Wilson's most bitter attackers. Mr. Walsh charged Mr. Lodge with trying to utilize the people's just respect and reverence for the President in order to "minimize the effects of the oil disclosure."

The debate gradually became more heated and Senator Carraway again bitterly assailed Senator Lodge, declaring: "Everybody knows that Wilson sleeps in his grave as a result of the abuse and unjustified attacks levelled against him when President."—Reuter's American Service.

ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS

British Ambassador's Conveyance of King's Message of Good Will

Washington, Mar. 6.

In an interview with President Coolidge, Sir Esme Howard, the new British Ambassador, expressed on behalf of the King and the Prime Minister cordial and sincere goodwill and friendship towards the United States. Sir Esme gave an assurance that he would always endeavour to maintain and promote in every way the cordial relations between Britain and the United States so much desired by every member of the British Empire.

President Coolidge cordially reciprocated the greetings and declared that happily no clouds shadowed the relations between the two countries. The President believed that the conscious identity of the general aims which the two nations were cherishing and similar ideals of disciplined liberty and truth and love of justice would be a mighty force in bringing the world to a just and lasting peace.—Reuter's American Service.

DIRECT ACTION AT SOUTHAMPTON

Shipbuilders Unconstitutional Strike During Wage Negotiations

London, Mar. 7.

A serious situation has developed in the shipbuilding industry arising from an unofficial strike at Southampton after negotiations had opened between the men's Federation and the employers for a rational increase of 10 shillings per week.

The Southampton men struck for an increase of 1s. 5d. per day. The masters declared that this was an unconstitutional action, declined to meet the Federation's executive and threatened a general lock-out.

The Federation yesterday was unsuccessful in an effort to induce the Southampton men to end the strike, whereupon the executives of the unions, after a protracted conference, appointed a deputation to proceed to Carlisle immediately with the object of persuading the masters to postpone the lockout.—Reuter.

THE BY-ELECTION AT WESTMINSTER

Mr. Churchill's Declaration of Policy: No Resentment Against Conservatives

London, Mar. 6.

Mr. Scott Duckers, the Liberal candidate for the Abbey division of Westminster, has written to Mr. Baldwin asking him to state whether he in any way supports Mr. Winston Churchill's candidature.

Mr. Churchill, interviewed to-day, emphasized that his political position was unchanged as compared with the last 20 years, when he always fought both Protection and Socialism. Even if the whole weight of the Conservative Party machine were opposed to him he would not feel resentment and would not return the attack, but would rejoice in the opportunity of co-operating with the Conservatives since they had returned to a progressive platform.

A 'Labour Candidate.

Mr. Fenner Brockway, the Secretary of the Labour Party, has been adopted as the Labour candidate for the Abbey division of Westminster. Mr. Havelock Wilson has abandoned his intention of standing as a Trade Unionist. —Reuter.

SPECULATION IN FRANCS

New York, Mar. 6.

An increase of nearly one billion francs in French note circulation to-day has brought a plunge of selling orders from foreign capitals, which precipitated the franc to 3.97 cents.—Reuter's American Service.

MINERS' DEMANDS

Wage Concession Offered by Coalowners for Increased Output

London, Mar. 7.

Delicate negotiations have opened between the miners' representatives and coalowners on the miners' notices to terminate the National Coal Agreement on April 17.

A meeting lasting three hours yesterday had no definite result, but the conference will be resumed to-day. The coalowners are offering concessions as regards minimum wages and alteration of the ratio of division of wages to profits, but the extent of that remains to be settled between the parties. It is understood that the employers require greater output by the men.—Reuter.

GERMANY AND ALLIES

The New Gold Notes: Rhineland as Buffer State: Disarming Under the Treaty

Berlin, Mar .6.

In the course of a speech in the Reichstag to-day Herr Stresemann, the Foreign Minister, announced that the bill for the establishment of a gold note bank would be submitted to the House.

He rejected the idea of neutralizing the Rhineland by making it a buffer State and did not believe that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald had made such a proposal.

He declared that the disarmament of Germany had been almost completed in the spring of 1922. Germany could not agree to the replacing of the Inter-Allied Military Control Commission by a Commission of Guarantees.—Reuter.

THE LUDENDORIF TRIAL

Munich, Mar. 6.

The treason trial was suddenly interrupted to-day, the chief Prosecutor refusing to continue owing to the humiliating attacks by counsel for the defence. The second prosecutor requested an adjournment while he consulted his superiors.

The action of the two prosecutors in indignantly leaving the Court followed a remark by one of defendants' counsel that a regular mania for arrests prevailed on the side of the Prosecution, but that they had not arrested those guilty of the blood-bath of November 9, meaning Dr. von Kahr, General von Lossow and General von Seisser.

The audience applauded, whereupon the Chief Prosecutor left, banging the door violently behind him. The Court later reassembled when the Counsel for the defendants apologized, but it is not yet certain whether the Prosecutor will return.—Reuter.

Trial Resumed.

Munich, Mar. 7.

When the Public Prosecutor reappeared in Court to-day, counsel for the defence apologized for his language yesterday. The apology was accepted and the trial resumed.—Reuter.

SEVERE EARTHQUAKE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

San Juan del Sur, Nicaragua, Mar. 4.

Three earthquake shocks occurred here this morning. A telegram from San José, Costa Rica, states that an earthquake occurred there which destroyed many buildings and resulted in a number of casualties. Part of the American Legation was destroyed, but the Minister and his family escaped uninjured. — Reuter's American Service.

Mar. 6.

Damage to Government buildings and churches by earthquakes in the past 10 days is estimated at $15,000,000. Private losses are heavy, but the total has not yet been assessed.

Four hundred and eleven shocks occurred within 12 hours, but few warning shock gave the people time to reach safety.—Reuter's American Service.

THE NEW RUSSIAN POLICY IN CHINA

Imperialist as Ever Was the Tsar's Regime: Combined Bullying and Cajolery: Playing Off China Against Japan

By Rodney Gilbert

Peking, Feb. 24

Since it first became clearly apparent that the Labour Government in Great Britain would recognize Soviet Russia there has naturally been endless speculation here upon the effect which such recognition would have upon diplomatic affairs in the Far East. Guessing has been very cautious from the outset and no one is yet prepared to predict what the ultimate result of recognition by Great Britain and Italy will be. In Club circles there is much more interest expressed in the possible position which the Russian envoy will take in the Legation Quarter than in any other phase of the question. If China falls in line with Great Britain and Italy and recognizes the Soviet Government, and if Russia gives her envoy the rank of Ambassador, will he not be Doyen of the Corps in the sight of China and two European powers? And if so what will be his position relative to the other Ministers and so forth? The position of the local Russians, the tenancy of the Russian Legation and similar questions of course, interest a host of persons. The French, the Chinese and the "white" Russians think largely of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The Japanese are concerned about their fisheries off the Siberian coast. There are a hundred problems to speculate upon to which there is no clear solution, but in a larger way the majority of people, both foreign and Chinese, who have no personal interest at stake are watching for Russian, Chinese and Japanese changes of policy as a result of Great Britain's recognition of the Soviet Union.

At the moment, the Chinese and Japanese are most concerned with demonstrating to othe world that they take an independent stand and that their attitude towards the Russian Government is in no wise altered by Russia's improved position in Europe. Mr. Karakhan, on the other hand, is trying to make it clear through both official correspondence and press interviews that Russia's position in the East has been made materially stronger through the change in her status in the West and that the Oriental nations with whom she has been trying to negotiate will now delay meeting her terms at their own cost and not at Russia's cost.

CHINESE WATCHING THE WEST.

Under the surface, the Chinese diplomats are of course watching developments in the West with considerable solicitude. They are naturally watching conditions in Russia. Many persons supposed that Trotsky's removal from control of the Red Army, followed by Lenin's death, would lead to fresh domestic convulsions in Russia and would greatly weaken Russia's diplomatic position. The world at large thought such developments possible and has not given up looking for them; so China naturally is still watching the political arena in Moscow. Like many foreigners here who are watching the situation from afar, the Chinese are also persuaded that Great Britain's recognition of Russia is so conditional that it scarcely amounts to recognition at all. They believe that genuine recognition is conditional not only upon Russia's re-assumption of many repudiated obligations and upon a display of good faith in their discharge, but also upon the life and success of the Labour Government in Great Britain. They feel that if the Labour Government were to fail and collapse before Russia had signed pledges which met the approval of the British people at large, the conditional recognition extended by the Labour Government would be repudiated by their successors as a domestic political gesture if for no other purpose. The Chinese are also watching to see what effect Great Britain's recognition of the Soviet Republic has upon Japanese and American policy. They naturally do not want to be left to the last and put themselves in a position where Russia can impose her terms, with or without diplomatic relations, but they are determined not to be "bluffed" into full and unconditional recognition of Russia, with none of the many disputes settled, while there is time and opportunity to bargain. They believe that there are still possibilities of Russia suffering severe diplomatic reverses in the Occident and that if these come, Mr. Karakhan will hastily descend from his high horse and condescend to talk business. This, after all, is sane and shrewd diplomacy.

BRITAIN'S CONDITIONAL RECOGNITION.

Concerning Great Britain's "conditional" recognition of Russia, a well informed Chinese recently said to the writer: "It amounts to no more than China would be willing to extend tomorrow as a basis for negotiations. We are willing to admit that there is at this moment an administration in Moscow which rules all of Russia and can exact obedience from the Russian officials and people in the greater part of what we used to recognize as the Russian Empire. We are willing to admit that Mr. Karakhan is a representative of that central administration with full powers to negotiate with us and to believe that he has documents which prove it. Great Britain's recognition amounts to no more than such an admission. It is simply an essential preliminary to negotiations which will eventually determine whether Russia is to be fully recognized as a power capable and willing in the discharge of conventional international relations or not, whether she is to be admitted to the society of nations as a member who will, in good faih, abide by the rules which govern this society or not. We cannot have any assurance of these things until we have closed certain essential preliminary negotiations with Russia's envoy any more than Great Britain can. When we have entered upon these negotiations we shall have extended recognition in precisely the same degree that Great Britain has and Russia has agreed to go through with these negotiations with Great Britain, thus accepting what you might call limited recognition, but Mr. Karakhan will enter into no such arrangement with us. He wants full and unconditional recognition, only pledging himself to settle our dispute later. He has broken earlier pledges and repudiated old promises; so why not this one?"

LABOUR'S CHANCES.

The question of the life of the Labour Government in England and the survival of its policies is certainly one which no one in the Orient is fully capable of discussing. Yet under present conditions the Chinese and many others who view Russia's attitude with concern, are forced to discuss these matters whether out of blank ignorance, or out of piece-meal information, or on the basis of what might be called political intuition, with which some Chinese seem to be particularly well endowed. At all events the Chinese seem to feel that the Labour Government in England will be short-lived and that Russia's status will fall with it. Peking seems to feel that the wiser the policy of the present administration in England the more certain its down fall. The more sanely it administers imperial affairs, the more surely will organized labour in Great Britain disown it. The deeper Labour representatives go into the business of government the more pledges to labour will they repudiate and the less sympathy will there be between the nominal representative and the alleged constituency, until a frank rejection of responsibility on both sides brings a new election and many new policies. The Chinese believe that these developments may come in Britain before any complete Anglo-Russian understanding has been reached and that it therefore behooves China to wait and watch as several deeply concerned major Powers are waiting and watching.

America's attitude towards Soviet Russia, once very sympathetic with the revolution, is profoundly suspicious because the Russian Red Communism of late memory threatened for a time to backfire in America. The big financial interests are not yet ready to believe that Russia will resume her obligations and big employers of labour still fear communist propaganda, so they unite to support the American Government in its contention that Russia has not yet evolved a Government with which the United States can enter upon relations of mutual trust and respect. There can be no doubt, however, that if Russia deals fairly with Great Britain and if full recognition brings England material commercial benefits, these same big financial and industrial folk in America will change their position over night and will be the very first to urge their Government to enter into some bargain with Moscow which will make trade relations possible. America cannot possibly stand aloof if Great Britain profits from her coming negotiations with Russia, and America will probably know better how things are going than China; so the Chinese diplomatists will naturally watch America's movements with the most intense interest.

RUSSIA EVOLVING.

So far as Russia's domestic affairs bear upon China's position they do not, at the moment, promise to bring much relief from diplomatic pressure from the North. Stories of feuds within the Red inner circle and accounts of big reactionary movements in the army are not substantiated and are not likely to be. A few years ago when Russia was really dominated by a small clique of ardent communists who were bent upon applying their unworkable theories at all costs and were riding their country to abject ruin, the elimination of both Trotsky and Lenin would certainly have thrown Russia into unspeakable confusion. The old Red theories are now dead, however, and their ghosts are only made to walk from time to time to soothe the unconverted Bolsheviks who still wield some influence in the new state. These persons will be slowly but inevitably eliminated, and just as surely will a spirit of intense nationalism take the place of communistic internationalism. One by one every policy of the old Imperial regime is being taken up by the present Government both in Europe and the East. Whatever the communists, in a burst of liberality, gave up while communism still governed policy in Russia, the new state is struggling to recover and whatever Russia of 1920 promised to give up, the new Russia is determined to hold.

The Chinese realize that they are again face to face with Russian imperialism under a new guise. They understand that if they recognize the new Russia unconditionally they will be recognizing her as the heir to old Imperial Russia and will be recognizing her legal claim to all the properties and rights which Imperial Russia enjoyed within the Chinese Republic. Once this is done the Chinese have nothing to bargain with. China will no longer be a negotiator but a petitioner. She can only beg Mr. Karakham to abide by the pledges which he and his predecessor have made from time to time and if his Government cares to repudiate every last one of these pledges China has no redress because the new Government's position as the fully recognized heir of the old would be perfectly legal. The Boxer Indemnity would still be a binding obligation and would be at Russia's disposition. Mongolia would be an autonomous state under the terms of the Kiakhta agreement. The Chinese Eastern Railway would revert to its old status and the zone would be a political base on Chinese territory governed by a Soviet viceroy. Russia could reassert her authority in her concessions and reimpose extraterritorial jurisdiction upon all Russians in China. The only possible way in which China can be sure that Russia will lay claim to any or all of these properties and rights is to pin Mr. Karakhan down to sealed contracts before his Government is fully recognized as the heir to the realm of the Czars.

NEW RUSSIA STILL IMPERIALIST.

The fact that Mr. Karakhan is unwilling to enter upon any sort of settlement of questions of Russia's rights in China until his Government is fully recognized, is evidence enough in itself that the new Russia's imperial policy is fairly well developed and that he intends to retain for Russia a much larger share of old Russia's rights than were claimed for the Soviet by its spokesman a few years ago. It is naturally his policy now to hurry China into full recognition before the imperialistic tendency of the new Russia becomes too obvious to the Chinese diplomats and to the masses of intelligent Chinese whose opinion might influence diplomacy. It does not suit his purpose to have China watchful of England, Japan and America. He does not want a cool and observant China but a panicky China, so fearful of being left out in the cold that she will sign any bargain just to fall in line with Great Britain. To this end he and all other Soviet agents are trying to prove that they do not care whether or not they ever enter into any sort of relations with Japan.

They are taking the initiative in breaking off such relations as have hitherto existed. The offer to help in relief work in Japan is withdrawn. The Japanese consul in Vladivostok is handed his papers. Japanese journalists are threatened with a loss of their right to reside in Russia, and now even Japanese mails are refused. America is denounced as a capitalistic and imperialistic tyrant with control over Japan's policies through the money market, and Russia on her new high horse refuses to traffic with such sordid folk. If China will hurry up and come under Russia's wing, Russia will be her benevolent patron and will protect her against these hideous ogres of the Pacific. Karakhan is playing upon China's traditional hostility to Japan and, in associating America with Japan in his propaganda, he is trying to break down China's traditional feeling of friendship for the United States. These are all very thin and transparent devices but they may have the desired effect upon China. If the Soviet diplomats can persuade China that the new Russia will be her supporter against Japan and the Occident and will perhaps help her to repudiate some of her obligations they will probably get full recognition without preliminary bargaining.

PATIENCE LOSES NOTHING.

This is an extremely interesting game, but the foreign onlooker will find it difficult to be a very ardent partizan of either contestant. From the Chinese point of view, it would be folly to extend full recognition to a Russia which will make no preliminary pledges, until the outcome of Great Britain's negotiations with the Soviet is fairly clear and until America's position, contingent as it must be upon these negotiations, is known. China cannot lose anything by waiting. Russia wants as much now from China as she will want three or six months hence; and if her diplomatic position in Europe should happen to weaken she might be willing to compromise on her wants six months hence. If China were playing the game in her relations with all the rest of us, we should all share and support this point of view enthusiastically. Unfortunately, however, we know that the Chinese point of view is now an irrationally anti-foreign, nationalistic point of view. China wants through negotiation to bring Russia in China down to as low a level as possible before she is forced to recognize her as a full fledged nation. She wants to do this to establish a bottom level to which she hopes to reduce all the rest of us in due course and she wants Russia's help in this patriotic effort. Those of us who live in China are so used to working with and for China in her difficulties that it is hard in this case not to share her point of view fully. If China were playing the game with the rest of us it would be easier to cheer her on; but in advising China against Russia at this juncture we cannot help feeling that we may be teaching her how to dig pits in our own paths.

RUSSIA NOT YET RESPECTABLE.

It is no easier, on the other hand, to cheer for Mr. Karakhan and the Government behind him. It would undoubtedly be an excellent thing for all of us if a respectable Russian Government were to reassert Russia's ancient rights in China and pull Russian prestige out of the mire with a strong hand. A respectable Russia could do more than any other country to bring China to her senses and to instil a little discipline into Chinese officialdom. The hitch comes when we realize that Russia has still to prove her respectability. The British Labour Government would not have extended conditional recognition if Russia's good faith were beyond cavil. The American State Department, which is liberal to the point of sentimentality in extending "the glad hand," would not have taken such a decided stand against recognition if the new Russia's respectability were established. Mr. Karakhan would not have to buy publicity in the Far East for his job of reestablishing Russian prestige in China if in his efforts to establish himself here and to reestablish his country's standing it had not been his and his predecessors' consistent policy to curry favour by undermining the prestige of all the rest of us in China. Yet he and his predecessors have merely got vitriolic and have called us capitalists and imperialists when, in the past, we have called attention to these tactics.

There are very few foreigners in China who would not like to see a responsible Russian Government bring China to account in some way for the orgy of outrages which have been perpetrated against Russians in this country for several years past. We should all like to see a respectable Russia come back and spank an intolerably impertinent Chinese official caste but we cannot be expected to cheer a form of Russian diplomacy which depends for its progress upon the humiliation of all those from whom it elsewhere querulously demands sympathy and consideration. It is inevitable that foreign partisanship in the Sino-Russian struggle will be influenced in the future by China's good or bad behaviour and by Russia's good or bad behaviour. If China were to pull herself together and show some inclination towards evolving a real Government, foreign sympathy would undoubtedly be with China. If Russia shows a tendency in the East and West to play the game and China continues to follow a madder and madder course, China can only expect that international sympathy will be with Russia and that the more imperialistic the policy of the new Russia the louder will be the cheers.

Do all your deeds by good advice,
Cast in your mind always the end –
Wit bought is of too dear a price –
The tried, trust and take as friend;
For friends I find there be but two:
Of countenance, and of effect –
Of these sort first there are enow:
But few are of the other sect.
Beware also the venom sweet,
Of crafty words and flattery.
For to deceive they be most meet,
That best can play hypocrisy.
Let wisdom rule your deed and thought:
So shall your works be wisely wrought.

THE HARDENING OF PHARAOH'S HEART

A Sermon Preached by the Rev. A. N. Rowland in Union Church, Shanghai on Feb. 24, 1924

"The Lord said unto Moses, When thou goest back into Egypt, see that thou do before Pharaoh [illegible] in thine hand: but I shall harden his heart and he will not let the people [illegible]."

The world has been interested during the last year in the embalming of a Pharaoh's body, but in every generation it has been interested in the hardening of another Pharaoh's heart. Although the subject is focussed in this old story of Egypt, it may be found more or less fully all over the Bible, and furnishes the key no doubt to the tragedies of King Saul and Judas Iscariot. The menace of such a process even to the people of God may be gauged from the prayer in Isaiah 63. 17, "O Lord why dost thou make us to err from thy ways and hardenest our heart from Thy fear?" And our Lord's reference to the principle in Matt. 13. 10 cannot be forgotten.

His mental process, however, is almost identified with the collapse of the proud Pharaoh in his collision with the will of the Almighty. God wanted an obscure people to enjoy their liberty and His service, but Pharaoh wanted to oppress and exploit them. God began the duel by appeal and summons enforced by judgment. Pharaoh answered with resistance, built himself into a fortress of fear and hate, greed and pride towards God's people. Then God himself took a hand in the stiffening process until the very gates of the fortress were sealed and its chance of rescue gone. We are not surprised that God conquered Pharaoh, but we are perplexed by the manner of the siege. Did the Almighty lure Pharaoh to his doom? Did He hasten his footsteps thither? Did He make it hard for him to find his way back. These are questions not to be answered off hand, but only in the remembrance that they concern a mystery where we can only see "in a riddle, darkly."

HARDENING ONE'S HEART.

(1) One or two considerations, however, may help to guide our judgment and first: God only continued what Pharaoh began. Ten trials of strength are recorded between the Almighty and the autocrat and in the first five of them the report is, not that God hardened himself. In the various motions of our mind and will it is difficult to say where God's spirit begins and the spirit of man ends, but this we know, that in evil God only ends what man has begun (James I: 13). You know what it is to harden the heart? Who can deny his personal responsibility? Truth comes along and asks for a decision, Justice appears with a claim for reparation. Right demands repentance, Duty calls for obedience, Need makes a plea for compassion. And by way of response you summon your reasons and marshal your excuses for not saying "Yes." You think you justify yourself thereby, but you are certainly hardening yourself. There is nothing else to do unless you yield.

See how it worked out in the case of King Saul. He was charged with the duty of obedience at a critical moment in the national fortunes. But with various excuses he justified his disobedience, and we are shown the consequence.

Before long he is insensible to the claims of the throne and finally he is incapable of intercourse with God (1 Sam 15. 22, 23).

The same process threatens every man. Here is one who, with his Bible or at Church, gets a premonition, a persuasion, to leave a certain habit, to take a certain path. But it will mean the loss of pleasant things, so he ignores the Bible and then goes on to question its authority or he neglects the Church and then goes on to criticize its members. Thus he proceeds to thicken the crust about his soul, and it becomes easy to repel the suggestions that were at first so searching and disturbing.

"GOSPEL HARDENED"

The invariableness of this situation is depicted by the poet of India, Rabindranath Tagore in these gloomy words:

I am ever building this wall all around;
And as this wall goes up into the sky day by day
I lose sight of my true being in its dark shadow.
I take pride in this great wall, and I plaster it
With dust and mud lest a least hole should be left
But for all the care I take I lose sight of my true being therein."

It is the confession of one who dulled his sensibilities and made his heart impervious. The phase of it that is to be feared above all is described as "gospel-hardened," which means protecting oneself with a profession of the gospel against its true meaning and its real claims.

We can watch the same process at work on the grand scale of politics as long ago in Egypt. There are Pharaohs running the world to-day, who will not "wait for God" or learn righteousness, although His judgments in the earth are evident. Protesting voices like those of Nitti and of Smuts echo the ancient pleas of Moses and of Aaron. We have had our plagues a tenfold visitation—war's burden, fever, waste, havoc, hatred, demoralization, teeth of the dragon and poison of hell. But more armies than ever are abroad as the sign of a hardening heart in spite of consequences, damning the consequences. Unless repentance comes it will be the ruin of civilization. God carries on what man has begun. As an old writer put it when recording the demoralization of the later Crusades, "God did not forsake the Crusaders until they had already forsaken Him."

GOD'S LAW.

(2) There is, however, a further consideration and that is that God's law is transcended by love. The methods of law are in obeyance if the results can be obtained otherwise. This is the message of the New Testament, but its doctrine must not be misunderstood. It is an announcement of love freely given, but love is the consummation of law, not its contradiction. And we cannot dispense with the old Testament which focusses God's reality, but we can throw light upon it.

We must take for granted then that God has a share in every process that concerns us. It is He that hath made us and not we ourselves. It is He that is making us still with the materials we supply, making us happy or hard according to our own choice. By the output and intake of every day, by the decisions that we hourly control, our lives are being fashioned, and we can by no means leave out God from the development of our nature.

Yet we cannot define His relation to us directly after the manner of the Old Testament. What the Bible refers to His intention we refer to the working of His law. Pharaoh hardening himself, God hardening Pharaoh, are in our view two aspects of moral deterioration, traceable in laws of psychology. No matter what the name so long as we take account of the fact. The law is that if we refuse justice, generosity, compassion to God's people we grow hard, unable to discern values, whether human or divine. What begins in human choice is linked up to divine law with its consequences. But there is another way, just as a parent has two ways with his child—the ways of the household and the word of his heart. In the Old Testament we learn the ways of God's household—God as law, as the principle of moral cause and consequence.

Many refuse this standpoint of the Bible. Some refuse to see God in any sort of law: their standpoint is sentimental. Others refuse to recognize God except in law: their attitude is scientific. But the Christian standpoint is that God is law fired and consumed by Love, and if the love-way is available He takes it. I once went over Lingfield Farm Colony in the English county of Surrey, and the Warden, a big man every way, told me this incident. In this colony of unfortunates there was a large school for poor epileptic girls. One of them proved to be refractory and disobedient, and her case was reported to Mr. Brooks, the Warden. He walked round the grounds with her and resting his hand on her shoulder said in the kindest tones, "What shall I do to punish girls that are disobedient?" In a low voice she gave the Warden her answer "Punish me like you're doing now." Love was the punishment; transcending law it did the work of law, for the girl never needed to be punished again. God wants to deal with us and us to get to Him by love, but if we do not take His hand in a way that softens the heart we must feel it by way of hardening. It comes to this that we may choose the way of our contact with Him but we cannot be quit of it. Let us greatly fear the hardening process, which is at work upon us now in so far as we are hard to others. Then all our contact with our circumstances or our fellows thickens the crust about our heart.

"But let me choose my highest part
And turn my face to Thee;
O let me stir my inmost heart
And worship fervently.
Within my heart Lord, speak, speak on,
My heart alive to keep,
Till the night comes and labour done
In Thee I fall asleep."

THE FIELD

Recurring suns that rise and blaze and die;
Grass-rufflng winds or tempests that trees tear;
And that eternal arch of changing sky
At which I do for ever stare and stare—
The wash of winter rains, the chill of dew,
White warnrth of snow or tingle of black frost—
Such I do know and such I ever knew
Far in my mind where count of time is lost!
Back there where there is naught of conscious me
Save as vague part of one huge entity—
One boundless stretching, undulating skin
Informed with dark primordial life within.
So through the barren years, barren I lay,
While the world weathered and stars burnt away—
[illegible]
Conscious of naught but sun, and wind, and sky,
And that old mystery of quickening
[illegible]
I do not known when first there woke in me
Dim premonitions of identity:
When first my contours seemed no things of chance
But held a sudden deep significance:
[illegible]
Each rod of soil, each yard of crankt hedgerow.
When seed-time and grave harvest came to be
[illegible]
Until it was, I know not why or how,
[illegible]
And with that knowledge revelation came
[illegible]

VENUS INCREASING IN BRILLIANCY AND SETTING LATER.

Venus is an inner planet, and twice as far away from the sun as Mercury, the mean distance being 69,000,000 miles, which varies at aphelion and perihelion about 1,000,000 miles, a contrast to Mercury, which varies 15,000,000 miles. Venus is now moving towards its greatest eastern elongation, and hence becoming more and more brilliant. It is also very high in the southwestern sky, and hence sets later and later than at other parts of its orbit. In the early part of the month the planet may be observed for 3 hours after sunset, and towards the close for over 3½ hours.

ASCENDING AND DESCENDING NODES OF PLANETS.

All the planets of our system move in the same direction around the sun, their course as viewed from the northern side of the ecliptic being contrary to the motion of the hands of a watch. They describe around the parent star elliptical orbits, more or less inclined to the ecliptic, and each orbit intersecting it in 2 points—the nodes—one half of the orbit lying north, and the other south of the earth's path. When the planet rises above the level of the ecliptic, this point is called the ascending node, and the opposite point of intersection is termed the descending node. The longitude of the node is its distance from the first point of Aries, measured eastwards on the ecliptic. The annexed diagram will illustrate the nodes.

THE SIDEREAL AND TROPICAL YEAR.

The sidereal year is the interval of a complete revolution of the earth around the sun, measured by a fixed star. It comprises 365 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, and 9 seconds of mean solar time.

A tropical or equinoctial year is the interval between 2 successive passages of the sun through the Vernal equinox, or first point of Aries. It comprises 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and 46 seconds. If the equinoxes were stationary, the sidereal and tropical year would be equal, but as the equinoxes retrograde along the ecliptic 50¼" annually, the sidereal year is 20 minutes 23 seconds longer.

WELLS FROM TOR HILL

Backward I turn, and see the phantom towers
Emerging through a rift
Of swathing fog that fitful winds uplift;
A touch of tender rose
Thrown like a smile, before the vapours close:
Around me wildered berries, ragged flowers,
Bracken and grasses withering, sere and wet;
And in my heart a voice of bygone hours,
Of hushed regret,
Speaking of things estranged—
The never-changing pleading with the changed.
And there in mystic light
Quivers the tender vision rosy-white,
Intangible, remote,
Like images that float
In failing eyes ere sleep hath brought the night.
A moment, and the curtain-folds are drawn
Like clouds that kill a dawn;
The casements that revealed
Are blindly sealed:
I see no longer walls or town or field.
Yet in the mist abides
That which hath been;
I have seen what I have seen.
I have known the eternal that the transient hides—
Beauty and love and hope, and man's desire
Lighted at moments with transmuting fire.—Arthur L. Salmon in the "Observer."

THE BETTING COMMISSION'S REPORT

By CANON PETER GREEN in the "CHALLENGE"

Canon Green writes admittedly as an opponent of the proposed tax on betting, but his criticisms will be none the less interesting to many readers and do not seem without point.

The Report of the Commission on a Duty on Betting, a bulky volume of 672 pages, contains, in addition to a full report of the evidence, some valuable appendices and a full index, no less than three reports, namely, the final official report, the draft report proposed by Mr. H. S. Cautley, K.C., Chairman of the Committee, and the draft minority report proposed by Mr. Isaac Foot. The first, after a really valuable review of the legal position of gambling and a useful explanation of the various methods of betting, comes to a sudden end, the dissolution of Parliament having prevented the Commission from further considering the draft report. Only one "finding" is recorded, to the effect that a tax on betting is "practicable." But (a) such practicability is admittedly dependent on the possibility of suppressing street betting altogether; (b) all the evidence laid before the Commission, and all experience, go to prove that the police are powerless to effect this; (c) it is not likely that it will prove any easier to suppress street betting when the existence of a tax has supplied an additional incentive to evasion; and (4) the experience of countries where the pari mutuel is in use, or where betting is in any other way legalized, shows that illicit betting has not merely not been suppressed but has actually increased. So the single finding of the official report would seem to be valueless.

Mr. Foot's draft report, on the other hand, is a really masterly piece of work. It is plain, unadorned, practical and to the point. It recognizes to the full the moral and social damage caused by gambling, and recommends just those methods of combating the evil which experience in other fields of social reform has proved most efficacious. Specially good are the brief paragraphs on "educational" and "social" methods of combating the evil.

CONTRADICTORY AND ARBITRARY.

Of the draft reform proposed by Mr. Cautley the exact opposite may be said. It is long, rhetorical, contradictory and curiously arbitrary in its treatment of the evidence laid before the Commission. Its worst features are the author's obiter dicta on the moral issue and its really preposterous findings on the subject of the amount of money spent on betting and the rate of profit enjoyed by bookmakers. Both these points call for brief notice.

The report declares that it has been proved before the Commission that "millions of persons who bet and large numbers of others incapable of estimation (the writer of the report does not really mean that the people referred to were incapable of estimation; he means that their exact numbers cannot be estimated) regard betting in no sense as either immoral or sinful." This, the report declares, is the view that will appeal to the vast majority of the people of this country and to the large majority of truly Christian men. It also says that the Committee did not go too minutely into consideration of morals. On this we may remark:

(a) That they did not go into the consideration of morals at all. Mr. Cecil Wilson raised the question immediately before my own examination, on the ground that it was impossible to discuss questions of morality unless we knew on what moral grounds any action was approved or discussed. The Chairman declared that he should rule out of order "abstruse questions of theological belief or moral code of that nature." Mr. Morgan Jones protested, and had the room cleared, but the Commission upheld the Chairman's ruling. So the Commission, having declined to discuss the moral question, had no competence to report upon it.

(b) The statement is directly contradicted by the one on the previous page to the effect that members of the Free Churches regard betting as immoral in itself, a sin and an offence against the law of God; unless, that is to say, we deny that Nonconformists can be regarded as "truly Christian men."

(c) Opinion in the Church of England is declared to be divided. But two of the three witnesses called, the two first selected, were apparently chosen because they had already declared in favour of a tax.

(d) If the contention of the Commission were true it would be unimportant. Public opinion saw nothing "immoral or sinful" in the days of Walpole in statesmen drunk daily after two in the afternoon, or in the days of Wellington in duelling, or in the days of Clarkson and Wilberforce in negro slavery.

Equally indefensible is the obiter dictum that State regulation or taxation would no more imply encouragement of betting or an invitation to bet than licensing of public-houses implies encouragement or invitation to "drinking." If by drinking the use of alcohol is meant it clearly does imply such invitation. If by drinking we are to understand drunkenness, it is inexcusable that the report should equate betting to drunkenness and yet deny that it is morally wrong. What makes the matter worse is that the ambiguity of the phrase "drinking" was repeatedly pointed out to Mr. Cautley during the sittings of the Commission. But the whole report shows a complete inability to discuss ethical questions.

ARITHMETIC ALL WRONG.

But if the report is morally unsatisfactory it is arithmetically absurd. The Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue admitted that only 164 bookmakers doing nothing but street betting paid income tax, and that even if the numbers of those who combined street with other types of betting were added the number fell below 400 in all. The Assistant Commissioner from Scotland Yard estimated the street bookmakers of London alone at 950. Hence it is clear that the Inland Revenue returns are no guide at all to the takings of ready money bookmakers. Yet the income tax figure, with a trifling addion for those below the taxable line, is taken as the basis of a quite futile calculation which lands its author in the conclusion that the average profits of all bookmakers average £200 per annum, which even he sees to be absurd. The results would be yet more ridiculous if it were not stated that the credit bookmaker works on a profit of half per cent., and the course bookmaker on one, if not more than two, per cent. These startling conclusions are apparently based on statements submitted by bookmakers in camera. It is not likely that these gentlemen are more modest or more careful about their figures in camera than when writing to the public Press, and I have dealt, in the "Manchester Guardian," with some of the figures of the Secretary of the Turf Guardian Society, and of the Secretary of the National Sporting League, and had no difficulty in proving them to be absurd. Also I offered figures, fully substantiated to the Commission which would effectually have prevented so absurd an estimate but for the Chairman's curious and apparently invincible objection to what he called individual cases. As if any actual cases could be anything but individual. The estimates of the amount actually spent on betting are declared to be guesses and are dismissed as "almost valueless." Yet my own estimate (£160,000,000 for horse-race betting alone with probably another 80 to 100 million for other forms of betting) is supported by the income tax returns, the estimate of the Board's expert, and, as regards horse racing alone, the first published estimate of the Turf Guardian Society, and that of the Chairman. And my figures for profits have stood the test of long continued controversy in newspapers.

WHAT WILL LABOUR DO?

Of the report as a whole it may be said that the evidence, and some of the appendices, supply a mass of valuable information to those capable of using it, and that Mr. Foot's draft report is a model of what such a report should be. For the rest the actual report is quite negligible and the main draft report such that the general election, which stifled it at birth, must be regarded as a real blessing. It is much to be hoped that the proposal to tax betting will be heard no more of, and that men of goodwill may devote themselves to the one thing needed, namely the creation of a healthy public opinion on the anti-social nature of all gambling.

MY MORNING TEA

Phantasmagoria

By W. Bruce Lockhart.

Feb. 27.

In common with so many other readers of the "N.-C. Daily News" the first thing I do every morning on awakening from my slumbers is to look at page 11 for the foreign telegrams and special articles. This morning my attention was immediately directed to an account of the miseries of a Shanghai boy, Mr. Elly Widler, which are succinctly summarized in the captions of the special article dealing with his case:—

"A Swiss citizen in durance."

"Mr. Elly Widler still held as prisoner by Chinese in Szechuen:"

"Threats of Torture and Death."

Mr. Widler, a resident of Chungking, was arrested by order of Gen. Yang Sen as far back as September 10, and a ransom of $200,000 was asked, otherwise he was informed that he would be shot.

The account goes on:—

"Then came the advance of the Southern Generals and Yang Sen prepared for retreat. All things looted and taken from the Cosmos Club, including more than $3,000 in money, hundreds of clocks and watches, curious and merchandise were handed over to Gen. Yang Sen."

"On November 16, after spending weeks in a dirty military gaol he was forced out, cruelly bound, and made to march with Yang Sen's retreating army all the way from Chungking to Wanhsien—a 10 days' tramp. At Wanhsien he was put into a filthy public gaol, and there he still remains."

So much for that item of news, and I mildly wondered who Gen. Yang Sen was.

Following my custom I then turned to page 6, the Leader page, and lo, at the top of column seven my mild curiosity is instantly satisfied, for I read that Gen. Yang Sen is a lieutenant of Marshal Wu Pei-fu who is the War Lord of Loyang, up Hankow way, I believe.

The illuminating leading article gives further information for I find that Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang is on the same side of the political hedge as Marshal Wu Pei-fu, so I assume that these three eminent commanders are all friends, with one thought in common.

OFF TO THE IRONSIDES.

Turning to the opposite page the first article that any reader must see is captioned:—

"Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang's Ironsides."

"Soldiers whom the People Welcome: Military Efficiency and Religious Zeal."

"From a Correspondent in Chihli."

Far be it from me to offer any comment or criticism on famous men, be they Christian Generals or otherwise, so I will confine myself strictly to giving readers some excerpts from my matutinal reading in the form of precise quotations.

Thus saith the "Correspondent in Chihli."

"One finds in certain quarters, and among superficial observers of the kaleidoscopic changes and regroupings of Chinese political factions at the present time, a tendency to doubt the sincerity of this powerful military chief, who after a short tenure of the Tuchunate of Honan, was transferred a little over a year ago to the important post he now occupies."

The Correspondent goes on:—

"After a shake-down in Gen. Chang's private quarters, where I occupied a room stacked high with enormous quantities of educational literature for the troops, I was awakened soon after six on Sunday morning, and found that the camp was astir with unmistakeable signs of soldiers in neighbouring buildings at their devotional exercises. Subsequently I learned that groups of men were meeting for Bible study all over the camp, a strange phenomenon in any country in the world."

NOT STRANGE IN CHINA.

I digress here to put forward a mild reflexion of my own in reference to Mr. Elly Widler, that it would be a strange phenomenon in any other country in the world, except China, for a General commanding an army to arrest a peaceable merchant, hold him to ransom for an enormous amount, loot the whole of his private property, and then carry him away captive when circumstances force him to flee before the troops of another eminent military enthusiast!

This all in a time of profound peace between the Swiss Republic and the Republic, or Republics, or whatever any one prefers to call it or them, which may be shortly summed up in the one word—"China."

Gen. Yang Sen is friend and ally of "the famous Christian General Feng Yu-hsiang," so without wasting any more precious time with my own foolish reflexions let us get hot foot on the track of these soldiers whom we left at Bible study.

"Soon after the General led the way to a large hall at the east end of the camp, where a Christian service was to be held. On arrival there we found a packed audience of some 600 officers and N.C.O.'s, all seated on serried ranks of benches. They sprang to attention as the General entered. He accompanied the speaker and the chaplain on the platform, and with military promptness gave out the opening hymn. It was Onward Christian Soldiers, and though one has heard the famous hymn sung by crowded congregations in Christian lands far away, it had surely never been sung with such sincerity and thrilling effect as by these Chinese soldiers.

"One thought instinctively of the great Protector's doughty heroes singing their psalms in the early dawn and striking terror into the hearts of their Cavalier foes at the outset of many desperate battles."

I digress again at this point in the narrative to remark that I was wrought up to a sublime state of spiritual emotion which was rudely interrupted by the boy bringing in my cup of tea. Moistening my parched tongue, cooling my fevered emotions with that refreshing product of China—that product of ancient China—I turned again to my paper in time to join in the last verse of "Onward Christian Soldiers."

"It was an extraordinary experience to look into the faces of these hundreds of clean, alert, well set-up Chinese officers. Hard things have been said of recent years in the foreign Press of China and, in most cases, deservedly, of the make-believe soldiers, 'uniformed coolies,' who swagger and slouch in the public eye, bully their fellow-countrymen, and who have made their profession a by-word of contempt and loathing to all observers.

"But here was a miraculous transformation, a veritable apotheosis of the despised grey uniform, disciplined Chinese soldiers, and withal men of real soldierly bearing.

"After a passage dealing with the depressing condition of China to-day, and the need for strong men of moral courage to stem the tide of corruption which threatens to engulf the whole nation, the speaker asked if it were not the case that what China needed most was men of absolute faith in and allegiance to Jesus Christ as the Saviour of individuals and of society. A spontaneous and shattering response of 'Yes' came instantly from the packed congregation with such a volume of sound as to rattle the windows. This happened three times during the address.

"After a return to the camp for breakfast I was privileged two hours later to attend another service in the same hall, this time crammed to the doors with over 700 men, all of whom were to be baptized on the following Sunday. Nearly a thousand men, I was told, have been under instruction with a view to baptism during the past year, and the hall was too small to admit all those who wished to be present."

All this interested me immensely and reflecting on the modern method of baptism by battalions now prevalent in the Chinese army to the stirring strains of "Onward Christian Soldiers," I found myself wondering whether, when Mr. Elly Widler was having the whole of his private property looted by Gen. Yang Sen's portion of the Chinese army he was moved to burst into the strains of that other well known hymn beginning with—"All that I have I give to Thee."?

Howbeit, I perchance may never know.

A LEGATION EPISODE.

Then I turned from the laudable desires of the famous Christian General Feng Yu-hsiang's stern, strong, but evidently not-at-all-silent men, and took another glance at page 11, where the telegrams are, and, tucked away at the bottom of the fourth column much as the modest primrose hides itself, etc.,—(soft music here, ad lib.)—I read as follows.

"GEN. FENG'S FAUX PAS."

"LEGATION POLICE COMMENDED."

"Mr. H. H. Fox, Chairman of the Administrative Commission of the Diplomatic Body, to-day expressed to the policemen concerned the appreciation of the Diplomatic Body of their conduct last Friday evening, when they were suddenly confronted with a difficult situation, and informed the policemen that small rewards would be given to them in recognition of their devotion to duty."

I remembered then that that famous Christian warrior, Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang, whilst on his way to dine at the American quarters in the Peking Legation Quarter had encountered the professional attentions of the Legation police owing to his chauffeur scorching along with extra bright headlights in full blast—two things which the Peking foreign diplomats do not permit in their portion of the city. With military promptitude and Christian fortitude Gen. Feng had himself descended from his car, on his very own Christian feet, and "reasoned" with the policemen! One account says that he "beat them up" and took their batons, or batons, away from them to do it with—but that, doubtless, is but the vulgar jargon of the uninstructed who are blissfully unaware that Gen. Feng has a whole army of splendid fellows who, on waking at dawn, immediately say their prapers, and then spend a few hours in Bible study while awaiting their turn for Meeting. (Anglice—Church or Chapel)—to receive their meed of instruction for Baptism.

Who are we to say them Nay. I ask?

You and I, dear reader, on awaking at dawn employ these fresh early hours of "another day" to scanning page 11 of the "North-China Daily News," and then page 6, and so on—and there are even some more diligent than you or I who turn to page 4 to find out what Gordius has been doing the previous day, or when the next End of the World is due!

It would be well with us indeed if we emulated the bright example of that Christian man, Gen. Feng, No, no, I mean the example of his soldiers and said our prayers first thing in the morning like good boys. As for motorists, speed limits, bright headlights and so on, why, only the other day a French friend of mine fined himself 100 tinkling Mexicans for stopping his car—and Mr. King will undoubtedly invite me to part with at least five beans if Mr. McEuen's alert myrmidons catch me scorching on my way to eat some "pie" with my friend Mr. Fessenden.

And so the merry game goes on.

WANTED, AN ANSWER.

Meanwhile, I have a mild conundrum to propound; Is there any one sufficiently intimate with Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang, who would be so kind as to ask him to send a telegram to his friend, ally, and fellow brother-in-arms, Gen. Yang Sen, up at Wanhsien suggesting his trial of Mr. Elly Widler, or his immediate release from the hospitality he now forces upon him?

Lest Gen. Feng should think this an unreasonable request, as between two friends I think it would not be impolite to remind him that a profound state of peace now exists between the Swiss Republic and the "etcetera" of China?

If, of course, war has been declared between the Republic of Chungking and the Swiss Republic or, as the crow flies, Gen. Yang's new Republic at Wanhsien, then it may be another matter—but the "North China" has given no hint of the outbreak of Sino-Swiss hostilities, so far.

And, anyhow, would Gen. Yang return one of Mr. Elly Widler's watches or clocks to him—the cheapest one, of course, of the collection he has appropriated. Gen. Yang cannot possibly use them all!

A TRAVELLER IN MODERN AMERICA

Lively Interest in China but Little Accurate Knowledge: Domestic Prosperity: Vast Railway Schemes: Cities That Spring up During the Night

From a Correspondent.

Somewhere in America, Feb. 12.

About 15 years ago I remember writing for the "North-China" away far back in untravelled Western China. I had been held up by the rains and was scribbling on a rickety table in a tumbledown Chinese temple, with mountains rising all around me to 14,000ft. and more. I remember in my loneliness in that Switzerland of China, where nothing had altered very much the handiwork of the Great Beginning, dreaming of the next two decades, maybe three, when China would really be taken in hand by the Powers and her economic development really get under way.

But I had lived in China for many years, and was not then so painfully aware of the general ignorance in Western countries of the most elementary things Chinese.

That was, of course, before the Revolution which introduced most of the ills that you are now contending with in China, before the war, and much has happened since then to China's favour which would incline one to believe that foreign ignorance around the world of the real China has been considerably broken down. Whatever may have taken place in other countries, however, I fear that little progress can be recorded of America. During the past few months I have visited every city and town of any size on the Pacific Coast, and as far down as New Orleans. Prior to that, in a tour of investigation among many Eastern cities of the United States, an opportunity was afforded me of making a more or less careful examination of the mental attitude of the average American towards China and her problems. That was my mission. My conclusion, expressed in nutshell form—and it applies to the whole of America—is that (a) of the interest of the average American, no matter what his walk of life, there can be doubt, but (b) excepting among an infinitesimal percentage, the ignorance of the simplest things Chinese is colossal.

TREND OF TRADE PACIFICWARDS.

I found it to be agreed upon without dissent, in some strange fashion, among Americans of progressive thought who should be in a position to judge world movements, that the Pacific area is fast supplanting the Atlantic as the theatre of economic development and commercial progress. This is the favourite theme, and unquestionably a right one, of that wonder-Scot of these parts, Captain Robert Dollar, a man whose knowledge has been built on sound experience. People in this country, moreover, are now slow to agree that this quickening of trans-Pacific commerce will entail the opening up for closer relationships the nearly billion population of Asia, among which China is to become the object of lively competition; but no disposition is shown to devote time and study to any constructive programme. In whatever I have been, on both seaboards or far inland on the great industrial centres, I have been impressed with a general ignorance among otherwise well-enlightened people, which is positive short of appalling to the real China hand.

It is true that the principal magazines of the country devote much space to China's politics, her trade, her people and their ways of thought and life, and many of the libraries are well equipped with reliable reference matter, so that it is comparatively easy to secure data pertaining to China and the Far East. Pretty well everybody who is anybody coming from China, if he can make a show at all in public, is invited to give a talk and in the very much misinformation very often finds its way around. There is usual tragedians under this head are young China students, who, with the natural Chinese gift of oratory, will sway an American audience to tears or will so interweave sympathy I heard a speech from such a man in Chicago the other day that caused my grey hairs rapidly to multiply as I listened with fear and trembling to a long line of passionate half-truths being rammed down the throats of a fallaciously enthralled audience.

In commercial life, again, one is continually meeting with demeritorious "schemes" which are to be "put over," often by men who have made a flying trip to the Far East and returned with a front bold enough to delude the unwary investor.

LACK OF INFORMED PUBLIC OPINION.

So one fails to find in America a very deep current of informed opinion on actual conditions in China.

My opinion is that it is too much to expect any speedy change either, for the great bulk of the people are too busy for their interest to go deep enough to form a real public opinion on China and what America can do for her. If the average proletarian can play mahjongg, and happens to possess his own set, or if he can attend a popular lecture and absorb a few elementary ideas of the structure of the written Chinese language (as an example) well and good—he is sufficiently entertained; and the business-worn American needs much entertainment. But the fault, if it can be so termed, lies in the fact that America is so enormously prosperous domestically that she is not forced to look across the Pacific, and her interests consequently are focussed largely on home affairs. I suppose that I am not alone in deploring this lack of public opinion on Asiatic matters in general, and Chinese matters in particular. America is to play an increasingly important part in the affairs of this continent on the other side of the Pacific no matter what may be said to the contrary. If what she will do is done with an informed knowledge of the people of America, it will be infinitely better than the reverse operation. But Americans have not yet grasped the importance of China to the world. They probably think, as do the majorities of several other countries, that Chinese civilization is practically unchangeable or only changeable through influences operating slowly over long periods of time. All of us used to be of the some opinion, but we have been awakened to the fact that since 1911 more changes—many of them for the worse—have come with lightning rapidity in the thought of the Chinese. No one nation can stand aloof from a great human problem such as China presents. Things move rapidly nowadays, and we have to be prepared with full knowledge of conditions. What has the last decade taught the world? I suppose it may be said that mankind has been shown that civilizaation, writing the life of a single generation, can be made to undergo changes so profound, so permanent, that it would almost appear as if human nature itself had been completely altered in the interval.

I am sure that the American who has lived in China, say for 10 years, will agree with what I have written. I mean no sarcasm. As Sino-American interests must some day grow to great proportions, the more the pity that America at home is so destitute of a viewpoint on the real China even remotely approaching soundness in many respects.

DOMESTIC PROSPERITY—CITIES MADE TO ORDER.

I have referred to the prosperity of the United States. It is apparent everywhere. In the rural districts one is rarely out of sight or sound of the plasterer and plumber, and hears the carpenter's hammer day and night. In the towns and cities building goes on at a feverish rate and cities seem to spring up under one's very nose. This is a feature of American life that the Briton cannot understand. In the dear old borough of Dunheved just over the Tamar in England, where the family of the writer have lived for generations, the population has not changed probably one per cent. in the last 300 years this is what the average American cannot understand. He is used to seeing things created in a lifetime. As an instance: there is a new city up in the State of Washington that boasts of the name of Longview. A year ago it was a wilderness, hemmed in by gigantic forests. Clever advertising, however, proclaimed to all and sundry, and particularly to those who who were motoring over its site, that a modern city was to be built there. And it was true enough. A colossal lumber trust said that it had to be done, and it was accordingly done as fast as human industry and money could do it. I passed through again six months afterwards, and to my astonishment motored over a fine 40-feet cement road alongside a new railroad, was bewildered to find modern schools and many children in attendance, stayed in a modern hotel, saw stores of all kinds, a complete tramcar system, with building construction going along at top speed. The new residents, the workers, were "changing houses" from their tents in the open to up-to-date wooden and stucco bungalows. Such a sight almost frightens an Englishman.

Then the growth of Los Angeles is known all round the world. I believe it is true that they do not know even at the present moment what the huge population of that city is, so fast is it growing. I heard of a man recently who went to New York to raise I don't know how many million dollars for improvements in that city. His banker greeted him with the question, "Well, what is the population of Los Angeles now?" "Couldn't tell you," came the reply. "I haven't been home for 10 days."

But this is the atmosphere in which the American public lives. No wonder that there is little time to be given to the troubles over which China broods. Added to which there is, of course, that important factor in the lack of continuity of foreign policy which does not help at all.

U. S. RAILWAY EXPENDITURES.

To give your readers some definite idea of the prosperity of America I can do no better than quote what the railways are doing. After completing capital expenditures in excess of $1,075 million during 1923, United States railways have under consideration a plan for the spending of more than $1,000 million during the present year. This is certainly "some" spending! Congress is cited, however, as the one influence that is delaying the progress of the work in some cases. "Once the railroads have been assured that no adverse legislation will be enacted at this session of Congress," says an authority on the matter, "their expenditure will proceed at approximately the same rate they maintained last year in the opinion of the men who made the survey." Poor China, with her miserable 6,500 miles of lines, what has she to say for the following forecasts of expenditure by some of the principal U. S. companies this year: Atchison Topeka and Sante Fe 70 millions of dollars; Pennsylvania, more than 50, Illinois Central, 45; Southern Pacific, 40; Norfolk and Western, 15 and so on.

One comes after all to the conclusion, however, that the average American holds the average human point of view—wrong though it is. While he awaits the thrilling results of world movements, he is able to take refuge in the fact that business at home is doing very well, money is plentiful, employment is general and wages are high, consumption of goods is at least up to last year's records, building is increasing, prices are steady. As I heard a man express it an hour ago: "They may have a capital levy in England, taxes may go up another 20 per cent. in France, the winter may be a hard one in Moscow, and Germany may be in the familiar down-but-not-out, position. But we can see no reason for disatisfaction in our own bailiwick Be it ever so humble. . . ."

THE U. S. SHIPPING BOARD'S SALE OF ALL ITS VESSELS

1,335 Ships Involved: Effect on Ship Market Generally Not Expected to Be Appreciable: The Fight for the Pacific: Robert Dollar and Pacific Mail Rivalries

A Reuter's cable was received in Shanghai on Saturday stating that the United States Shipping Board had invited bids for the sale of its entire fleet of 1,335 vessels, the bids to close on March 14. Of this number 423 vessels are in operation for the Board by various agencies in all parts of the world; the rest are laid up.

The news came as no surprise to shipping circles the world over, for the Board has been notoriously unsuccessful in the management of its fleet ever since it was organized about 1918. This continued unsuccess has been largely due to the world-wide slump, but it came to a head a few weeks ago with the failure of the huge Leviathan, which is among the vessels to be sold.

It is the Shipping Board's intention to put all its ships in the hands of private owners if possible. It might be thought that the sale of such a fleet at one time would have some effect on freights and charges, but that is not the case. Owing to the state of the market and general shipping conditions the process of transferring these ships is bound to be a long one and so they will be absorbed slowly and imperceptibly almost, into the services on which they are put. Eastern shipping will be very little affected excepting that there will probably be a number of extra freighters put on the trans-Pacific trade.

In business circles hope had been expressed that private competition would have the effect of reducing freights, but such is extremely unlikely. Business from the shipping companies' point of view is improving year by year. There is no difficulty in getting cargoes and most companies are negotiating with the Government for the purchase of extra ships to deal with the trade. This being the case, it will not be in the interests of private owners to force down freights.

MANY SHIPS USELESS.

In Shanghai there is a tantalising lack of information as to what the American Government will do. The different agencies operating the Board's ships in the trans-Pacific trade have all commenced negotiations for the purchase of the ships they are running, but the principal difficulty up-to-date has been the heavy price asked. Inquiries were set afoot by the "North-China Daily News" and the sum total of the information gathered is "that everything depends on the Government, and there is no telling how the Government will act."

The Shipping Board has fixed no minimum price for the steamers offered, but simply gives forth that a minimum will be fixed after the valuation. When the vessels were offered for sale on previous occasions a minimum of $30 per ton was fixed, but few bidders were found at the price. Now, it is hoped, the Board will come down considerably in its demands.

Over 1,300 ships sounds a large fleet, but in this case numbers are apt to be deceptive. A large proportion are totally unfitted for general cargo trade, having been built during the war to carry war materials across the Atlantic and designed for no other purpose. This applies chiefly, of course, to that part of the fleet at present laid up. The 423 in operation are nearly all on established trades, and have been for the past four or five years. They may be regarded as permanent fixtures, since the agencies in each case will almost certainly negotiate for their purchase.

DOLLAR AND PACIFIC MAIL FIGHT.

One of the most interesting developments as far as the trans-Pacific trade is concerned lies in the fight between the Pacific Mail interests and the Dollar and Admiral Oriental Line interests for the purchase of the five steamers run by the Pacific Mail between Pacific ports, Shanghai, Hongkong and Manila. These liners, the Presidents Cleveland, Wilson, Lincoln, Pierce and Taft, are of the "535" class, and are well known in Shanghai, since they run in and out of this port every few days.

The Dollar interests are aiming to get possession of all ten "535" liners in operation in the trans-Pacific trade. Five they have already, the Presidents Maddison, Grant, Jackson, Jefferson and McKinley. On the other hand the Pacific Mail naturally wish to purchase the vessels they have been operating for themselves, and since they are the agents expect preference over their rivals, from the Board.

Mr. R. Stanley Dollar has been in Washington for some months negotiating with the Board, and news was received in Shanghai about three weeks ago that Mr. Dollar had made what he termed his "final offer" on February 1, and with that he expected either to close the deal or to drop it altogether. As far as can be gathered, however, these expectations have not been realized, for negotiations are still going forward, and according to later information a representative of the Dollar interests called on President Coolidge to obtain his assistance in getting the Board to come down in price, about a week ago. What the result of that interview was it is difficult to say.

BOARD'S PRICES HIGH.

Apart from the competition for these ships, however, the Admiral Oriental Line have been negotiating with the Shipping Board for the past twelve months for the purchase of all the vessels they have been operating. Here again the trouble is one of terms; the Board are asking considerably more than the Company like to give. At present the Admiral Oriental Line are running about 17 freighters, but they can find use for quite a few more and they are also negotiating for sufficient boats of this type adequately to balance their fleet. It is understood the Government's demands are not so heavy in this case, and there will not be many big difficulties to prevent the deal being put through.

The Barber Steamship Lines, for whom the Admiral Oriental Line also act as agents, are negotiating for the purchase of the United States Shipping Board vessels they operate on the Oriental-New York-European run.

The Pacific Mail, in addition to negotiating for the purchase of the vessels they already run, are asking for 10 more freighters, but how far the proceedings have gone it is difficult to say. The Tampa Inter-Ocean Steamship Company, for whom the Pacific Mail are also agents, will also ask for the purchase of their own vessels. They run a service of about two ships a month in and out of the Far Eastern ports.

The same story comes from Struthers & Barry. They, too, are negotiating for the purchase of the ships they run for the Board and Mr. Struthers himself is in, Washington for the purpose. There he will shortly be joined by Mr. Everett, who left Shanghai recently for San Francisco. Messrs. Struthers and Barry have nine ships on this service as well as several tankers which run straight between the Pacific coast and Manila. All these boats are owned by the Shipping Board and operated by Struthers & Barry.

Further developments will be awaited with interest.

Members of the British Chamber of Commerce are invited to attend the British Industries Fairs, to be held in London from April 28 to May 9, and in Birmingham from May 12-23. Any member who will be in England during these months, and who desires to visit the fairs, may obtain a letter of introduction from the secretary of the Shanghai Chambers.

For Shanghai people would be a surprise.

SONGS OF THE PEOPLE

Songs That Have Sung Themselves into the Hearts of Everyday People

By Elizabeth Pepys:

Mrs. Carrie Jacobs Bond, the well known composer who has just passed through Shanghai on the str. President Hayes on her way to Manila, is doubtless the most popular song-writer in America, no less than five million copies of "A Perfect Day" having been sold. Incorrigibly cheerful, caroling always of love and faith and courage, hers is not the cheap optimism of the life that has never known hardship or sorrow.

Left a widow with a son of eight years to support with but scant means she was obliged to rent some of the rooms in her house to students to cover expenses, but as she sympathized with ambitious youth and was always ready to give her last dollar to any one in need, this venture did not prove a financial success. She began to put some of her fancies into words and to set these words to music, as she told us. She found publishers readily and began to win recognition but the financial returns were unsatisfactory and it became apparent that she must be her own publisher.

The little "Bond Shop" was therefore started in a very small way but it has now developed into a big concern with the great music publishing house of Schirmer acting as its distributing agents. "This is all due to my son," said Mrs. Bond with natural motherly pride. "He has been my partner ever since he was 17 and he has a remarkable business ability. When we began I used to paint the covers for my songs myself, and I still give the ideas for them to the artist who works them up."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Bond, 'I'm still writing songs. I wrote one coming over on the boat, one day when I was missing my son. It expresses my own real emotion as all my songs do, just a bit of feeling that is common to us all. Last year we brought out five new songs, and a new edition of one which was written some time ago —"Still Unexpressed." The new ons are "My Homeland," "Little Lost Youth of Me." "Were I," "Evening, My Love, and You," and "The Lazy River."

"My attitude towards life and work is expressed in the song 'The Golden Key' which I wrote as the national song of the Professional and Business Women's Clubs of America. I regard work as the golden key unlocking the door that leads to God.
No idle life can happy be,

We all must do our part,
Must work a while and play a while
With all our soul and heart.

Mrs. Bond has gone on to Manila but will be returning to Manila but will be returning to America through Shanghai the first of April and it is hoped that her health which while improved still shows the effect of her recent nervous breakdown, will permit her to be present at some public meeting tendered by her friends and admirers of Shanghai. Many a lover has voiced his story through the medium of her swetly simple lyrics and millions have appreciated the wholesome, cheerful philosophy innate in every composition of this gracious, genial woman, whose smile is the essence of friendship.

THE CLUB WOMAN

And How Mrs. Lobingier Interprets Her Responsibilities

Busy, bustling Shanghai hurries along so fast that it has no time to stop to take account of stock, to realize what it is doing and whither it is tending. In the women's organizations the ceaseless activity is much the same and we are only "stabbed broad awake" when some one whose faithful and efficient service we have come to take for granted, to depend upon subsconsciously, goes on Home leave and we realize how great a gap is left.

So it is that the imminent departure of Mrs. Charles Sumner Lobingier for an extended visit in the United States sets the members of the American Women's Club to reminiscing about the many useful things this executive woman has done, not only for the local club but in the Philippine Islands and the United States as well. Mrs. Lobingier's first connexion with woman's club work was in Omaha, Nebraska, in an organization of over 800 members, where she was for two years in charge of the Social Science Department, which, in co-operation with other organizations of the city succeeded in having Juvenile Court legislation put through. While active in this club Mrs. Lobingier represented its interests in the federation of women's clubs and also served as corresponding secretary of the Nebraska state federation.

The next phase in club activities took place in Manila where Mrs. Lobingier was prominent in the "Fortnightly Club" which was established in the early days of the Americans' coming to the Islands and when Mrs. Taft, wife of the then Governor General was one of the members. This club resembled the present Literary section of the A.W.C. in its study of local geography, history and art. This institution still exists but another association has sprung up, an international body called the Woman's Club of Manila, its members drawn from the European, American and Filipino residents. Its first interest was to establish day nurseries for the babies of the working mothers and to co-operate with and supplement the work of the Board of Health. Endorsed by the legislature and the Municipal Board the club did much to advance the social welfare of the city.

Coming to Shanghai after this varied training Mrs. Lobingier threw herself with enthusiasm into the philanthropic work of the A.W.C. and for two years served as Chairman of that division which has now developed into the Civic Department. For the two years following that she served as President of the Club and during that time represented this organization at two of the biennial conventions of the Federation of Women's Clubs with which this local body is affiliated.

During Mrs. Lobingier's third term as President of the A.W.C. the scheme of departmental activities was put into effect to meet the needs of the rapidly growing membership. The invaluable service of the cup of tea and other social factors in promoting friendly acquaintanceship has never been lost sight of by Mrs. Lobingier and many a stranger to the city has found a warmer welcome at the club because of Mrs. Lobingier's cordial interest in the new comer.

As Mrs. Lobingier is leaving with her husband for a holiday in her old home in Omaha and their place in the Ozarks they are followed by many sincere wishes for a speedy return to their many close friends here. Mrs. Lobingier's mental poise and her charm of manner have made her an inspiring personality in the club and one which will not willingly be spared. At the reception tomorrow in the club rooms, 66 Szechuen Road at five o'clock, there will be an opportunity for all the club members to wish this loyal fellow worker bon voyage and it is hoped that all will avail themselves of this opportunity.

GYMNASIUM FOR GIRLS

Athletic Opportunities Offered by Y. W. C. A.

The Foreign Y. W. C. A. has many membership privileges but few more eagerly seized than the chance of gymnastic training and swimming classes. Every Monday afternoon at 5.30 a gymnasium class under the direction of Miss Norah Jervis, the principal of the Y. W. C. A. Normal School of Physical Education and Training meets in the gymnasium of the Navy Y. M. C. A. which has been kindly made available to them during the "off season for sailors."

The enrollment of the class is 50 and the average attendance close upon 40. The work offered consists of setting up drills and country dances with occasional games and the girls taking the course report not only great enjoyment of the drills but a noticeable improvement in health. Miss Jervis has enjoyed the best English training available and has taught with Cecil Sharp, the authority on Folk Dancing so Shanghai girls are fortunate to have her as an istructor.

The swimming classes have used the Navy Y. tank but will be obliged to relinquish their claims when it is needed for the men of the visiting fleet. Four more Thursday afternoon in March are available, however, beginning to-day, the fee being $2.50 for the month. It is rumoured that if the enrolment this month justifies it, it may be possible to secure the tank during the summer, the time which it would be most appreciated.

THE GYMNASIUM CLASS IN ACTION

HOME HUMOURS

Anticipation.

Mary, the new maid, seemed eminently satisfactory, but the mistress of the house thought a few words of advice would be just as well. She concluded: "I shall expect you to be very reticent about what you hear when you are waiting at table."

"Certainly ma'am," said the treasure, whose face lit up with an innocent curiosity, "and may I ask, ma'am, if there will be much to be reticent about?"

PERSONALLY CONCERNED.

Scott and Jasper were arguing about the need of a general and immediate spelling reform and the discussion grew warm. "Look here," said Jasper at last, "why are you so bitter in your opposition to reforming the language?"

"Because," replied Scott, bringing his fist down with emphasis, "I've just invested thirty dollars in a new dictionary."

THE RULING PASSION.

Old Professor Smith, who is inclined to absent-mindedness, was a lover of good horses and an enthusiastic horseman. He could be seen galloping over the neighbouring fields and streams almost any summer evening, usually alone, but sometimes in the company of his wife who did not altogether share her husband's enthusiasm for sport.

One evening Mrs. Smith, who was riding somewhat ahead of the professor, attempted to cross a little stream in too much haste and was thrown from her horse into the water. Her mount scrambled up on the bank and when the professor reached the scene of the disaster it was trotting off toward the nearby highway. Mrs. Smith, floundering in deep water, tried to shout for help, but her husband merely lifted a quieting finger: "Stay right where you are, my dear," he said, "I'll get him if I have to chase him all the way to town."—"Harper's Magazine."

WHAT WIVES THINK ABOUT HUSBANDS

You will be engaged on a long journey through the deserts of life with this solitary companion. You will remember as a rule when he fails to please you and you will put that down to his sex. On the other hand you will ignore the fact that he keeps you throughout your life in a standard of very decent comfort that you do nothing in the world to earn. You will ignore the fact that he is frequently kind, generous, considerate and even delicate in his attentions to you. He may bring you a bunch of violets every evening on his return from work. He may present you with a valuable bracelet on every anniversary of your wedding day. He may deprive himself for life of the pleasure of listening to music because music gives you a headache. But all these things you will say are just his duty: you will pay no attention to them. But supposing that he should ever omit any one of these things. Then immediately you would say:

"He is like all the rest of his sex—utterly unrefined."

And what you will mean is that he has no sense of discernment or he would have known how bitterly your delicate female soul would be grieved by his omitting to bring you that bunch of violets.

Of course, during all this time he will be doing exactly the same by you and, if you are not exceptionally lucky, you will find that by the time you have been married 15 years there will have grown up between you a sort of dull, uninterested sex bitterness so that whatever your man may do to irritate you, you will say:

"What can you expect? He is a man." And whatever you may do to irritate him he will say:

"What can you expect? She is a woman." Whereas actually since God made us all and the world is a trying place we are most of us poor people trying to make the best of a bad job.

FORD MADDOX HUFFER

SINCE YOU HAVE GONE

Now, there is no one to laugh with,
No one to cry with,
No one to run hand in hand with,
Down the strange, sweet, unknown ways,
Where red flowers grow,
And white stars shine,
And the tongue of water
Laps against the stones,
And little, brown birds sing.
There is no one near in the silence of the night,
When the heart speaks loud,
And no one in the throbbing of the noon,
When the heart is out-voiced.
There are no brown birds,
And no bright flowers,
And no white stars—
Only I myself.
Crying
With myself Alone.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

One of the most important books this year will be the second volume of Queen Victoria's letters, which is to be published by Mr. John Murray. The first volume, edited by Dr. A. C. Benson and Lord Esher, appeared in 1907 and contained a selection of the Queen's letters down to the death of the Prince Consort in December, 1861. The second volume will carry the correspondence to about 1885, covering a most important period of history in which Lord Palmerston, Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Salisbury played leading parts.

Who, would you say, is Exon of the King's Body Guard of the Yeomen of the Guard? It is Colonel De Sales La Terriére, and he has just written his reminiscences for Hutchinson. Notables occur in them with delightful frequency, for they give glimpses of, among others, Queen Victoria, King Edward, Queen Alexandra, King George, Lord Lonsdale, and Mr. Winston Churchill. Lord Wolseley and Sir Evelyn Wood also come into the book, and it has much to say about Kitchener when he was beginning his career in Egypt. Colonel La Terrière lived with him then, and simplicity and frankness were the order of their friendship.

The new English book which sold most largely last year was Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Land and Sea Tales," of which over a hundred thousand copies were bought in Great Britain. The book still sells, especially to Boy Scouts and Girl Guides, and probably by this time next year it will have sold a hundred and fifty thousand copies.

Father Knox, whose last book won praise and readers, has a new one appearing with Methuen. It is called "Sanctions," is described as a "frivolity," and is likely to be found both amusing and provoking. It follows, in form, the lines laid down by Mr. W. H. Mallock in "The New Republic," and imitated by Mr. Lowes Dickinson in his "Modern Symposium." That is to say it is a record of a series of conversations between a set of inquirers into life. We are assured that in no book of our time have so many hares been started.

One hears that "The Book of the Queen's Dolls' House" is to be the personal property of her Majesty, who will distribute the profits made from it as she thinks fit. They are likely to be considerable, because the book will stand out very prominently on the landscape of the spring literary world. It will for one thing, be a book of beauty and its contents artistic and literary, promise to be unique. Ever so many well-known authors have written special stories essays, or poems for inclusion in the work, which the Methuens are to publish.

When Mr. Justice Darling retired from the Bench it went about that he would write his reminiscences. He has done nothing that way, so far, but, as Lord Darling, he is giving us some more verse. It will be contained in a new edition of his "On the Oxford Circuit," and there is so much of it that it will double the size of this book. The fresh poems will be found grave and gay, like the old ones, as becomes the author of "Seria Ludo."

A year or so ago a novel, called "Kamiko," by Mr. John Paris, had a great success in England and in America. Readers have watched with interest for its successor, which is on the spring list of the house of Collins under the title "Sayonara," meaning literally, "If it must be so, or otherwise," "Farewell." Japan is again the scene of Mr John Paris's writing.

BIG MARK!

"Big Mark—One of China's Boys." By. Anna Magdalena Johnnsen pub. at 2/- net by the China Inland Mission, London.

This attractive book of 100 pages with four illustrations would make a welcome gift, not only where there are boys and girls to read it, but to any resident in China who desires to know particulars of its social life. Many who have lived in Shanghai for years are quite vague in their knowledge of anything outside the Foreign Settlement and regard the peculiar ways of the natives with unseeing eyes. They would do well to consult this authoress who has lived as a missionary here for 26 years and reveals her intimacy with domestic scenes in China, in chapters on Infancy, School, Testivals and so on. The translations of children's songs are particularly interesting.

A.N.R.

ARTHUR WEIGALL'S GARDEN

BY ACHILLES.

Most people who read his books will consider "The Garden of Paradise" (T. Fisher Unwin: 7/6) to be far and away the best of Mr. Arthur Weigall's achievements in the realm of fiction. He has improved, assuredly, with time and growing maturity.

This volume contains numerous ideas which are choice and subtle, and language which is poetic and yet possesses a pungent flavour. Yusuf, a student, is much enamoured of the clever Leila, and believes to the end that she is perfectly pure in all respects whereas she has formerly been the chattel of a notable personage. The author portrays skillfully her chagrin and remorse which are awakened only when she falls in love with Yusuf. Only then does she acquire new courage and nobility, which enable her fearlessly to say that she would be content that Yusuf, the extreme idealist, should if he sees fit, kill her when she has acquainted him with the truth. Her reason is thus picturesquely expressed:

"I would not wish to live if hatred of me and contempt were to be aroused in his heart; as, after all, the longest life is but a drop of rain falling from the cloud of destiny into the ocean of eternity." There is a pleasing Omar Khayamish twang about this and the lines that follow: "Soon each of us must sleep beneath the ground without a friend, a comrade, or a loved one; and if I am sent into that Nothing which may prove to be All, a little while before you, do not think that Yusuf has done me an injury. When the eagle of my soul shall have shaken from its plumage the dust of this body, it may be that I shall be permitted to wait for him in the Garden of Paradise until he shall come again to me." One regrets that Fate always intervened to prevent the confession reaching Yusuf's ears, but he, at least, carried his illusions to the grave so prematurely reached.

There is a native and witty philosopher whose utterances are neat and to the point. His half-hantering excuse for a certain youth's puerile folly is accompanied with a request that one be not angry with him for he is but suffering from a slight shortage of years. This is almost as good as Ernest Bramah's wonderful Kai Lung!

Hassan-es-Sabbah, the orange-bearded, who persecutes Leila, was conspicuous for the expression of perpetual astonishment which he wore on his face. We can picture this Arab, crafty and enterprising, with his uplifted eyebrows and deceptively innocent smile. How charmingly the author gives the finishing touch to this gentle caricature, by telling us that Leila considered the perpetual astonishment on his face was but 'the response of matter to the audacity of mind.'

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Lord Charnwood's Study of the Man and his Work

By Dr. Arthur Smith.

Theodore Roosevelt: By Lord Charnwood. Author of Abraham Lincoln. The Atlantic Press, Boston. Pp. 232.

The well earned distinction which the author of the Life of Abraham Lincoln attained in the United States after the publication of that important contribution to the literature of the subject, is evidenced by the fact that three "Impressions" of the present book were called for within three months of its first appearance. In the case of Lincoln there was need for English readers of a full exposition of his antecedents and achievements, for he lived more than two generations before that Life was written. Few Englishmen had ever seen Lincoln, who was very little understood by the educated class of the British isles until after his tragic death. Theodore Roosevelt, on the contrary, was in very recent times an international figure. His visit to Europe contributed to the gaiety of nations, while his numerous public utterances elicited a tempest of criticism as well as at times a storm of applause. So many volumes large and small have been written about Roosevelt that it might appear that there is absolutely nothing more to say, yet there is always an interest in seeing how an able, experienced, and impartial writer will handle an inherently important and difficult task.

It is no doubt an invariable source of irritation to the people of any country to read a book about one of their countrymem, written by a non-resident foreigner, when he assumes an air of semi-omniscience as if his dicta had especial weight by reason of his lack of qualification for his task. From any failure of this sort, Lord Charnwood is conspicuously free. He incidentally commends Admiral Mahan's two volume Life of Lord Nelson, as one of the few biographies of great Englishman, adding that the people of England owe any clear idea of the importance of England's sea-power to Mahan's great treatises on that subject.

In the author's chapter on Nineteenth Century America, he is careful to begin by remarking: "It may be best to hazard here some crude and hasty remarks upon the course of the national development up till then."

And at the close of the chapter he adds: "I would repeat how fully conscious I am of the crudeness and probable inaccuracy as well as the fragmentary nature of this survey." Such an attitude completely disarms criticism, while the obvious sympathy of the author with the ideals of the object of his studies gives assurance that whatever judgments he expresses will not be hasty, ill considered, or due to inadequate information.

In matters where his national prejudices might have been expected to bias his judgment Lord Charnwood displays a rare capacity for complete detachment. This is especially illustrated in his treatment of the Alaskan boundary dispute. After five or six pages on the subject he concludes with the judgment that Mr. Roosevelt "worked most honestly for the cause of friendship between our peoples, which neither more nor less than that of friendship between America and her neighbours generally he had at heart." In dismissing this topic he says: "I have dwelt upon this matter at such length because it seems to me a good test-case of Roosevelt's manner and spirit in his dealings, and because I happen to have a very warm affection for Canada and a passionate interest in the evolution of the British Empire. I do not want to be dogmatic, but I think it perhaps significant that I began studying this point with feelings of intense indignation against Roosevelt, and that I end with the absolute conviction that he did a very able and a most right and friendly thing."

Still more space is devoted to the matter of the Panama State and its relation to the Canal, where as he says, "American comments have often been very severe upon the most conspicuous instance where he gave a swift decision in dubious circumstances." After an extended discussion he concludes that senator Hoar was "in error" in his antagonism of the Panama State, on the ground that the sovereignty of Marquini over the people of Panama was that of a usurper. That the American Congress ultimately paid a handsome bonus to Columbia did not settle the moral principle involved; but merely the political question whether it was not worth while to spend a few million dollars rather than to have a dissatisfied and perhaps permanently hostile neighbour.

Of Roosevelt's international sympathy at the time of his European visit, we have a sample in a quotation from his writings. "Germany has the arrogance of a very strong power, as yet almost untouched by that feeble aspiration toward international equity which one or two strong powers, notably England and America, at least begin to feel." Upon this Lord Charnwood remarks: "Words of more exact justice could hardly have been chosen." It is interesting to have it suggested in the same connexion that perhaps Roosevelt enjoyed being on parade with William II as a twin stage figure; doubtless he enjoyed the moment, if it is true, that the latter potentate, having craved an audience with him, was granted precisely 20 minutes because Roosevelt had an appointment with Mrs. Humphrey Ward.

Of Mr. Wilson, Lord Charnwood does not hesitate to write: "In my eyes, this singular and powerful figure appears an evil figure, which it may be right to pity, but it can not be right to admire." The closing paragraph of this discussion of one whom an Englishman once spoke of as "The foremost figure in civilization to-day," admits the author's favourable predisposition towards the subject of his study. "I began this book by avowing a hero-worship of long standing. I do not mean by hero-worship any disposition to found a cult of the hero, to use his name as a rallying cry for party, or to shape one's own life in any spirit of discipleship to him. There is only one honest and useful discipleship possible to men. Great men are only worthily honoured if the honour we pay them provokes us, the weakest or the stupidest, to stand resolutely erect, and least of all would Theodore Roosevelt be worthily admired by anyone when the power of his mental or physical machinery should impress us as the real wonder of his life.

A GERMAN HANDBOOK OF AVIATION

Moedebeck's Taschenbuch fur Flugtechniker und Luftschiffer (Moedebeck's Pocket-book of Aviation and Airships)—Fourth Edition, M. Krayn, Berlin. 15s.

This pocket book was very well known before the war, an English translation of a previous edition having a wide circulation. It has now been revised and greatly enlarged by Messrs. Suring and Wegener and contains a wealth of information, some quite new. For example, there are no less than 53 pages on the subject of motorless flight. There are in all 868 pages of text, followed by 40 pages of tables; nevertheless the matter is very condensed. There are four chapters on meteorology, one on aerodynamics, one on aeronautical photography, two on aerial navigation, one on motors and propellers, one on mechanics of flight, a long chapter on the construction of aeroplanes, one on the manipulation of aeroplanes, one on gliders, one on airships, another on their control, and finally one on ordinary balloons.

The section on aeroplanes is very full, but naturally emphasises German development rather than that of other nations. As not very much is known of recent German practice, this is an advantage rather than otherwise. The author somewhat disparages French, British and American construction, but this was perhaps to be expected, however one may disagree with him. Airships are very fully described.

This book should certainly be in the hands of any German-reading person interested in aerial navigation.

R. CHATLEY.

THE FAITH AND THE FIELD

A Missionary's Story of the Great North-West

By Rodney Gilbert.

"The Call of China's Great North West, or Kansu and Beyond."—By Mrs. Howard Taylor. Published by the Religious Tract Society, London, for the Chinese Inland Mission.

"The Call" of which Mrs. Taylor writes is not the call of the wilderness but the call to the mission field in north-west China. The book is more than anything else an appeal to supporters of missions, so that descriptions of Kansu and its people together with historical data are incidental to an account of the evangelical work being done in a number of remote and widely separated stations by the members of the China Inland Mission and those of allied organizations. In her own itinerary, Mrs. Taylor does not go beyond Kansu. She sets out from Sianfu in Shensi just before the great Kansu earthquake and arrives in Lanchowfu shortly after the catastrophe, visiting all mission stations on the big highway. Liangchow, Pingfan, Sining, Kumbum and Hochow are also visited and some account of mission work in Kanchow Ninghsia, Tsinchow and other unvisited centres is given. To those in sympathy with evangelical work the most interesting portion of the book will undoubtedly be the story of the remarkable work done by an independent Chinese missionary, a Dr. Kao who has settled in Kanchow where he supports himself through his medical practice while devoting most of his energies to spiritual ministrations in a Christian community which he has built up by his own efforts in this new and untouched field.

While Mrs. Taylor devotes most space to the personnel and the work of the various missions, she also writes of the physical charms of a rugged, mountainous country and has something to say of the character, manners and history of the picturesque denizens of the country, such as the Tibetans, Moslems, Mongols and the so-called aborigines. The material for these sketches was obviously furnished by missionaries in the field and contains nothing which the scientific student of the Kansu people would regard as a contribution, though there are some statements about the origin of the aborigines and the Moslems east of Hochow which one would be forced to challenge if Mrs. Taylor's book pretended to be a scientific work.

To foreigners in China who are not in close and sympathetic touch with mission work in the interior, the simple, primitive faith of the Chinese Christian converts whom Mrs. Taylor describes will be of interest because the sincerity of converts is always a subject for debate among foreigners in China who are not in sympathy with mission work. Miracles have a place in the daily lives of the Kansu converts. Evil spirits are cast out by prayer. An old man who is too poor to go to a Christian meeting prays for help and his wife finds a silver dollar in her sewing basket. A man curses his brother who is a Christian and his horse breaks a leg. The reader may not believe in such happenings, but Mrs. Taylor will leave no doubt in the reader's mind that the missionaries and their converts do believe in them.

The book is well illustrated with a number of photographs of typical Kansu scenes and persons.

CHINESE TRADEMARK LAW—BRITISH FIRMS' CABLE TO THE "TIMES"

Detailed Indictment of Proposed Law: Its Manifold Violations of Treaties and Menace to Business: Immense Foreign Interests Endangered

The following protest against the Chinese Trademark Law and against its acceptance by the Foreign Powers was cabled to the "Times" by the signatory British firms in China as under on March 5 and was published apparently on March 10 in London.

SIR,—Foreign property in China is menaced by the promulgation by the Chinese Government of a trademark law which, if recognized by the Powers without substantial modifications, in addition to imperilling trademarks, will weaken the whole basis on which foreigners live and trade in China. We are leading British firms in China and in our own interests and those of British trade as a whole we ask you to be good enough to publish this letter so that all concerned in trade with China may be made aware of the danger that threatens them.

THE MACKAY TREATY.

In Article 7 of the Mackay Treaty ratified in 1903 China undertook to protect British trademarks and to establish offices for their registration under the control of the Maritime Customs, which is officered by British and other foreigners. The proposed law places trademarks under undiluted Chinese control and lacks many of the essential safeguards provided for trademark owners in Europe and America.

Your columns have borne repeated testimony to the chaotic condition of China at the present time, to the powerlessness of the Central Government, to the domination of the provinces by military adventurers, to the existence of large armies of marauding troops, to the way in which treaties are being flagrantly violated, to the subordination of civil and judicial to military authority. Yet in these chaotic circumstances it is proposed to strip foreign property worth many millions of pounds of the safeguards which have hitherto protected it.

THE TREATY OF TIENTSIN.

Article 15 of the Treaty of Tientsin 1858 stipulates that "all questions in regard to rights whether of property or person arising between British subjects shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the British authorities." Under the protection of this and other agreements designed to ensure to British subjects enjoyment of the fair treatment provided by British law and British courts, British capital has been freely invested in China and a large outlet has been won for British manufactures of all kinds. The proposed trademark law strikes at the root of the safeguards which have made investment of capital and commercial development possible.

CHINESE BUREAUCRATS.

It does this in the following ways. It establishes a Registration Bureau officered entirely by Chinese from which appeal in cases of dispute lies to Chinese bureaucrats inexperienced either in trademark or any other branch of law. There is no appeal from the Bureau to a Court of Justice such as British or American law provides. On the contrary article 36 of the proposed law specifically precludes reconsideration of any decision given on appeal by the Chinese officials. Thus any dispute between two British subjects or between a British subject and another foreigner or between a foreigner and a Chinese, regarding the registrable character of a trademark on which the right to use the mark depends, will be settled by Chinese tribunals alone. This is an obvious contravention of the Treaty of Tientsin and of the extraterritorial rights also agreed to elsewhere, for all other cases of dispute between foreigners are tried in foreign courts, while in disputes between foreigners and Chinese the former have a right to be represented by their Consuls or to be heard before assessors of their own nationality. Yet while the proposed law makes no reference to the procedure to be adopted when foreigners are plaintiffs in civil actions against Chinese for infringement, and thus ignores our treaty right to be represented by a Consul or heard before an assessor, it leaves in doubt whether this right will remain to us in criminal actions.

APPEAL TO THE CHAMBERS.

In these circumstances and in view of the deliberate manner in which treaty obligations of all sorts are being ignored we desire to appeal through your columns to Chambers of Commerce and other public bodies to use their utmost influence to prevent this law being recognized in its present form, and to support us in asking for effective foreign co-operation in the administration of the Registration Bureau and effective foreign representation in all tribunals and Courts which may be called upon to give any decision affecting foreign interests in connexion with trademarks.

THE PREY OF CHINESE OFFICIALDOM.

We warn all concerned that if the law is recognized in its present form foreign trademarks will become the prey of Chinese officialdom, while the safeguards which have hitherto protected foreign property and rights in China will be dangerously undermined.

"TIMES'" SYMPATHATIC COMMENT.

London, Mar. 11.

The "Times," in a sympathetic leading article, lays stress on the desirability that a settlement should be reached as early as possible in order that the subjects of Treaty Powers shall not be put at a disadvantage vis-à-vis of their competitors.—Reuter.

PEKING, March 8.—The Shui-wuhu has appointed a commission to consider changes of duties or obligations devolving upon it as the result of the new National Constitution. Mr. Chen Luan has been appointed chairman of the commission.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA AND SOVIET RUSSIA

The Progress of Negotiations: Opposition from Marshal Chang Tso-lin

PROBABILITY OF EARLY AGREEMENT

Peking, Mar. 7.

Dr. C. T. Wang will attend the Cabinet meeting to-morrow when the Sino-Russian negotiations will be considered. Meanwhile the members of the Cabinet are studying Dr. Wang's memorandum.

It is reported that Marshal Chang Tso-lin opposes recognition as a preliminary measure. Marshal Chang contends that the Chinese Eastern Railway and other important questions should be settled, at least, in principle. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mar. 8.

This morning's meeting of the Cabinet was entirely devoted to hearing Dr. C. T. Wang's report and memorandum on the Sino-Russian negotiations which occupied three hours in reading. Consequently there was no opportunity for discussion or exchange of views. All the Cabinet Ministers were present except the Minister of Education.

THREE POSSIBLE COURSES.

Mar. 9.

The semi-official "Ching Pao" says that there are three courses open to the Government with regard to a Sino-Russian settlement, firstly, unconditional recognition, secondly, continuance of preliminary negotiations until a settlement is reached and after that recognition, and, thirdly acceptance of broad principles for recognition after which details can be settled. The paper adds that M. Karakhan has made many concessions and is not likely to concede more. It considers that the first alternative is unwise from the Chinese point of view, while the second will not meet the Russian wishes. Therefore, the third is the only one likely to prove satisfactory.

According to other reports, the Government will send a delegate to Mukden to-morrow and, as Marshal Chang Tso-lin's official views wil not be known, it is not likely that the Cabinet will reach a decision on Tuesday, when the Sino-Russian question will again be considered.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KARAKHAN PREMATURE.

In view of "China's pending recognition of Russia," Karakhan, states a Peking, telegram received by the "Shunpao," is planning to remove into the former Russian Minister's building in Peking. In this, however, he is likely to meet with opposition, since it is said that the Diplomatic Body held a recent meeting to discuss the matter, at which certain members maintained that they should not hand the premises over till the recognition had actually been brought about. They also contended that he should not be allowed to attend conferences of the Diplomatic Body until the Soviet has been recognized by all the nations.

M. KARAKHAN'S WARNING.

Riga, Mar. 10.

In the course of a note couched in very definite terms, Mr. Karakhan, Russia's representative in Peking, warns the Chinese Government against taking independent action in connexion with the Chinese Eastern Railway, formerly belonging to Russia. He declares that the slightest alteration in present relations would involve China in very serious consequences.

The newspaper, "Isvestia," adopting a similar attitude,

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

WHY NOT TOC H IN SHANGHAI?

Mar. 10.

THE hopes have vanished which were entertained a few years ago that the great war then being fought would end all war and henceforward there would be peace and goodwill among the nations. In their disappointment some idealists are inclined to smile, perhaps a little derisively, at their faith and expectations, and to echo the words of the preacher, vanity of vanity, all is vanity and a striving after the illusory. But the founding of numerous Toc H branches in England and other parts of the world is evidence that such hopes are by no means extinguished. Recently there was a very interesting celebration in London of the birthday festival of this organization. The Prince of Wales presided. Among those who took part in the ceremonies were Viscount Grey, General Sir Charles Harington, the Duke of Devonshire, the Lord Mayor of London, the Bishop of Willesden, and Sir James Barrie. "We must spread its spirit fearlessly far and wide," said the Prince, "for the spirit of Toc H is one that is wanted very badly in this country to-day and will be wanted in the future."

What is the significance of this movement? During the long strain and stress of the fighting in northern France many soldiers, wearied in body and mind, felt the need of a brief period of rest. To meet this need Talbot House, named after Gilbert Talbot who died at Hooge, was opened at Poperinghe, for the refreshment, spiritual and physical, of those serving and suffering in the Ypres salient. No less than 100,000 officers and men passed through it. The name Talbot House was shortened to "T.H." In the vocabulary of army signallers "T" was named "Toc" for telephonic reasons, so Talbot House became "Toc H." Its consonants also suggested the three words that have become the motto of the movement, "To conquer Hate." After the war the movement spread to England, the object now being to establish centres of social and spiritual influence to propagate and maintain the ideals which brought the British Empire into the war. The organization is a brotherhood of service. It has no class distinctions, its membership being drawn from young men in the schools and universities, offices and workshops. Each branch has its own Lamp of Maintenance. Round the lamp the members of the branch gather every week or fortnight in remembrance of those who fell in the war and in loyalty to the tasks which they left unfinished. The following questions and answers are a part of the simple ritual of introduction: "What lit this lamp?" "Unselfish sacrifice." "What alone can maintain it?" "Unselfish service." "What is service?" "The rent we pay for our room on earth." At the London celebration the representatives of sixteen new branches approached the Prince in due order; he lit their lamps with a taper lighted at his own Lamp of Maintenance, and a mighty shout arose from those present when it was seen that the last two lamps were those of Montreal and Buenos Aires, showing how the movement was spreading in the British Empire and beyond it. By this time the older branches had been arranged along the two sides of the hall. Sir Charles Harington and Sir James Barrie, with tapers lighted by the Prince, each took a side and walked down, lighting the lamps of the branches. When all were lit, the electric lights went out. Sir Charles Harington spoke a few ritual words of remembrance, answered by the deep and general murmur, "We will remember them." Then suddenly, out of the silence and from a distance that made it sound faint and far, as though it came from Flanders itself, there sounded the ever-moving strains of the Last Post. After the solemn hush the lights went up, to the accompaniment of the cheerful "Reveille."

Is not the spirit of this movement needed in Shanghai? It would strengthen the fellowship of the men who fought in the war by associating them in generous service for the good of others, and by giving them opportunities to spread and maintain the ideals for which so many of their comrades laid down their lives. It would instil patriotism of a high order into the minds of British youths born out here whose devotion to England, without this inspiration, may not be as strong as the patriotism of those born in the Home land to whom the soil itself is dear; and youths arriving fresh from Home would find in the comradeship of Toc H a helpful steadying influence that would keep those with a tendency to wildness from going astray. "I cannot imagine," said the Prince, "a method of memorial more practical and permanent than that the names of the dead should thus be household words, held high by generation after generation of lads coming up to work in our big unfriendly cities." Further, in this very cosmopolitan city of Shanghai, the motto "To conquer Hate," should be the motto of all. This may seem a counsel of perfection, but the war has been fought, the hatchet should be buried, and the policy of goodwill given a fair trial. At any rate, among those of British birth there should be unbounded goodwill and reciprocal helpfulness, to a degree unknown perhaps before the war, for the nation is passing through difficult and dangerous times and all should stand together. In Toc H, based on patriotism and the fellowship of service, this unity will be secured.

Chief Preventive Officer Watt, who rescued a Chinese man and woman from drowning during the typhoon which struck Hongkong last year, was decorated by the Governor on February 28 with the Royal Humane Society's bronze medal.

SHANGHAI GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mar. 11.

OPTIMISM is not to be looked for nowadays from institutions concerned with business and politics in China, and the report for 1923 of the Committee of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce certainly affords no exception. "The present position (in China) is one of infinite chaos," it says, "and it would be difficult to conceive a more hopeless state of affairs." Actually it might be suggested that that very hopelessness contains seeds of hope, inasmuch as matters could hardly be worse and in the ordinary course of events, as illustrated even in China's history, any change ought to be for the better. But it is not for Committees of business organizations to indulge in psycho-analytic speculation: they want to show results and of these the year 1923 was unhappily sterile. The most agreeable entry is that the representations made by Sicawei Observatory to the Chamber for financial assistance, as recorded in the report for 1922, met with a ready response, the sum of Tls. 5,050 being remitted to the Director of the Observatory by the S.G.C.C. There can be no firm doing business on the China Coast which would not gladly testify its appreciation of the invaluable work done by the Fathers of Siccawei.

The largest section of the report (apart from a voluminous review of events in China in the past year) is devoted to pilferage in the harbour and the consequent need of more police. In August information was received of suggested improvements to the River Police Force involving additional capital expenditure of Tls. 50,000 and additional annual expenditure of Tls. 25,000. A further increase of the strength of the Force to fifty-eight, as recommended by the Harbour Master, with accompanying plant, would involve a further capital expenditure of Tls. 100,000 and bring the additional annual expenditure up to Tls. 100,000. In May, 1922, the S.G.C.C. had pressed for at least sixty-four foreigners and forty-eight Chinese. The report states that while the Inspector-General of Customs would find the Tls. 100,000 for capital expenditure, the additional staff could not be provided unless merchants in Shanghai would agree to pay a special wharfage due of one-fifth of one per cent. of the Customs duty. The Committee examined this proposal narrowly, finally agreeing to it, if funds could be obtained by no other means, on condition that "proceeds of the levy should be devoted, together with the funds already provided by the Inspector General of Customs, solely to the River Police Service of this Port, the Customs Authorities to keep available separate accounts of receipts and expenditure. The whole to be subject to revision at the expiration of two or three years." A letter to this effect was sent to the Senior Consul on November 29 last and an answer is still awaited. It would look as if the authorities in Peking misliked the Chamber's guarded attitude. But considering the immense value of the trade of Shanghai and that no other body but the Customs has any authority on the water, it is difficult not to think that a more liberal spirit could and should be shown in the matter of policing. It will be remembered that the British Chambers of Commerce at their last annual conference had a good deal to say on this subject.

One notes that "unanimity has not been arrived at regarding the reduction in the pilotage tariff and a meeting of Shipping Representatives has been convened with a view to arriving, if possible, at some basis for mutual agreement. It is not considered advisable at the present juncture to publish the text of the Chamber's Report or the correspondence on the matter." This is rather tantalizing. The question of a reduction of pilotage charges occupied a large part of the Chamber's energies in 1922 and on November 7 of that year the Consular Body called a meeting of representatives of the Shanghai Licensed Pilots' Association and the Chamber to consider a scheme formulated by the Harbour Master. An "attitude of expectant receptivity" is still, it would seem, the only one to be taken. The Chamber took an active part in the general flood of remonstrance which poured in on Peking after the Lincheng outrage. Its telegram on that occasion is worth reproducing, melancholy though the feelings be that it arouses:—

> The Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce expresses abhorrence at the dastardly outrage perpetrated at Lincheng and humbly presents views as follows. Committee desires to emphasize China's complete disregard of the liberal treatment by the Powers at Washington Conference, which is looked upon by Chinese officials as sign of weakness. That, in view of recent attack on Pukow-Tientsin express, the various agreements made at Washington Conference be suspended until a general settlement of the present chaotic conditions both financial and military has been arranged to entire satisfaction of the Powers. Responsibility to be attached to Tsao Kun and Shantung Tuchun. If necessary, international garrisons at treaty ports and at agreed points on the main trunk lines to support demands of the Powers. That foreign settlements and concessions should no longer be used as an asylum for political agitators."

With all allowance for the heated state of feeling ten months ago, we cannot think that any of the measures urged in this telegram was either excessive, uncalled for or impracticable. It is indeed tragic to think how the unequalled opportunity that Lincheng presented of doing something really effective for the welfare of the Chinese people was frittered away by procrastination and ineptitude.

The roll of members of the S.G.C.C. shows a small upward movement, with 125 at the close of the year as against 123 a twelvemonth earlier. British, French, Americans and Japanese are represented on the Committee and once again we would venture to emphasize the importance of the part that this long-standing organization may play and the necessity of its being well supported. If the Lincheng outrage mostly resulted in disappointment, it did at least bring all the Powers into line for the signing of a joint note; and this tendency to make common cause in questions which, although ostensibly involving only one nation, affect all indirectly, has since been visible in other matters, notably the famous gold franc controversy. Such community of interest may well be observed by business men. None of them can afford indifference to what affects his neighbour; and when they band together in their own defence, it is also not to be forgotten that they are fighting the battles of their Chinese confrères against official rapacity and misgovernment.

THE WESTMINSTER BY-ELECTION

Mar. 12.

THE contest in the Westminster by-election is certainly not without humour. As far as we can see from the telegrams, which are not quite clear on the point, there are four candidates, Mr. Nicholson, Conservative; Mr. Scott-Duckers, Liberal; Mr. Brockway, Labour; and Mr. Winston Churchill, Independent, professing we know not quite what, equally opposed to socialism and protection, yet proclaiming his attachment to Mr. Stanley Baldwin, who, however, will have none of him and bids all Conservative voters to plump for Mr. Nicholson. Mr. Winston Churchill is certainly one of the ablest men in England and, it must be added, one of the most unpopular. It is curious to read in "Who's Who" that he was educated at Harrow; somehow he gives the impression, at least in parliamentary life, of having had a private tutor. He has been a soldier and fought with distinction in three continents. He has been a war correspondent and has also written books which have brought in large sums. He has, since the year 1900, represented three constituencies, Oldham, Northwest Manchester and Dundee, has "crossed" the floor of the House, as the phrase for changing one's politics has it, and, if he can get in again, now proposes to perform a sort of diagonal upon it or zigzag. And he has been at different times President of the Board of Trade, Home Secretary, First Lord of the Admiralty, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Minister of Munitions, Secretary of State for War, for Air and for the Colonies. It appears undoubted that he bears the responsibility for the ill-fated Gallipoli expedition, surely the most tragic adventure of all the war. He is a forceful though not a ready speaker, all his speeches necessitating careful preparation. And to do him justice, he is an indefatigable worker.

It is early days to speculate on what Mr. Winston Churchill means to do in Parliament till we know whether he has got there. By his allusions to Socialism and Protection one might imagine that his busy brain was planning the formation of a new party; and Westminster is certainly the sort of constituency that might be chosen as a starting-point by a champion of those middle classes of whose supposed revolt one has heard so much and seen so little. His father also, Lord Randolph, one remembers, was once a leader of Adullamites. But these attempts to create new parties, which shall exhibit the virtues of all and the vices of none, never succeed. They represent compromise, which, conspicuous though it be in British political practice, is allowed no place in British political creeds. We are not, as a people, expert in subtle thinking; every boy and every girl that's born into this world alive is either a little Liberal or else a little Conservative; and our politicians, in profession at least, must be one thing or the other. Much in the same way there appears no room in Parliament for the Indepenstates that Russia is no longer satisfied at being regarded a negligible quantity in the Far East.—Reuter.

THE BASIS OF NEGOTIATIONS.

Peking, Mar. 11.

Dr. C. T. Wang attended the Cabinet meeting this morning and reported his conversations with M. Karakhan since the last meeting of the Cabinet. Lengthy consideration was given to the whole Sino-Russian question, but there is reason to believe that no final agreement can be reached before the end of the week.

The negotiations concerning the Chinese Eastern Railway, which is the most important matter being negotiated, followed the lines of the agreement for the restoration of the Kiaochao Railway and probably an agreement in principle will be reached whereby official negotiations will open, China according recognition when this agreement is signed.

The Russian Government is apparently prepared to cancel all Tsarist treaties and the C. E. R. settlement, it is believed, is only a matter of price.

Mar. 12.

A special meeting of the Cabinet this morning, attended by all the members of the Cabinet and Dr. C. T. Wang, exclusively considered the question of Sino-Russian relations. It is understood that agreement was reached on the principles which will be the basis of negotiation with the Soviet representative.

Chinese circles are confident that China's recognition of the Soviet is only a question of days. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

China Ready to Recognize Russia

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 13.

Two Cabinet meetings were held to-day on the question of China's recognition of Russia.

The Soviet Mission and Chinese Cabinet officials agree in their statements that the result of the second meeting is likely to be endorsement of the proposal for immediate recognition of Russia.

Latest reports indicate that such recognition would be due to Chinese concessions rather than to Russian and would be decidely to the Soviet's advantage.

Peking, Mar. 13.

It is understood that the Cabinet this morning accepted the amended articles regarding the Chinese Eastern Railway and the withdrawal of Russian troops from Mongolia. Consequently no further obstacle remains in the way of recognition of the Soviet Government.

The Premier and the Foreign Minister will report to the President this afternoon and it is anticipated that President Tsao's approval will be forthcoming to-day or to-morrow and that the agreement will be signed by Sunday.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE NAVY DISPUTE

Still No Settlement

Peking, Mar. 7.

The Government still finds it difficult to heal the breach between Admiral Wen Shu-teh and Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei. The latter opposes the appointment of the former as commander of the Peihai Squadron, contending that the vessels at Chefoo form only a portion of a squadron and that they must be placed under the command of Admiral Tu, adding that there is no occasion to institute a new title or rank in the interests of Admiral Wen.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE MOHAMMEDANS AND PARLIAMENT

Peking, Mar. 7.

The Ministry of Interior has received a number of petitions from Mohammedans in Honan and other provinces praying that they be accorded representation in Parliament. The Ministry has replied to the effect that this is a matter which does not fall within its purview and should be referred to Parliament itself.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

TURN-OVER IN FUKIEN

Expulsion of Gen. Wang Who Retreats on Hsinhua : A Night Attack

Peking, Mar. 6.

Advices from Amoy report that General Tsang Chih-ping, before he was relieved of his office as Military Commissioner at Changchow and Amoy, complained to the Consular Body that the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs and two others were using the mails to undermine his position with the Central Government and asked that they be expelled from th International Settlement. The Consular Body, in reply to the communication, stated that it was not their intention to interfere in Chinese domestic affairs.

Mar. 5.

Foreign telegrams confirm the ousting of General Wang Yun-chuan. The telegrams say that a brigade of General Sun Chuan-fang's troops from Yenping arrived at Foochow at 10 o'clock on the night of March 6 and co-operated with General Chow Yin-jen's force which was already at Foochow. General Wang Yun-chuan with 2,000 men left Foochow for Hsinhua at two in the morning. The coup had been carefully planned and was quietly carried out at night. The city was quiet next morning.

According to Chinese telegrams, General Sun Chuan-fang's supporter, General Chow Yin-jen, suddenly appeared in Foochow yesterday and drove out General Wang Yun-chang, who escaped. General Chow brought his forces from Yenping, to which city General Sun had recently retired from Foochow. No fighting is reported and it is inferred that a coup d'etat had been planned, which was effected on General Chow's arrival.

Admiral Sah Chen-ping is reported to have issued a circular telegram stating that he is maintaining order pending the arrival of General Sun, which is expected immediately.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Gen. Sun's Return to Foochow: Intrigue Between Generals Wang and Lu

Peking, Mar. 9.

Although the Government apparently leave Fukien political questions to Marshal Wu Pei-fu, to whom Admiral Sah Chen-ping's telegraphic reports of recent events at Foochow have been referred, considerable importance is attached to the driving out of Gen. Wang Yung-chuan. In the first place the return of Gen. Sun Chuan-fang to Foochow disposes of the general belief that his transference to Yenping was a preliminary measure to an attack on Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang, in agreement with Gen. Wang. It is suggested by Chinese now that, on the contrary, Gen. Wang began to in trigue with Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang as soon as Gen. Sun left Foochow, and it is expected that Gen. Wang will now ally himself with Gen. Chang Chih-ping, follower of Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang, who maintains his position, independent of the Foochow authorities, at Amoy, giving allegiance only to Gen. Lu. Thus the menace to Gen. Sun on the South is likely to be strengthened.

Gen. Wang Yung-chuan is now at Hsinhua, and his post of Assistant Director of Military Affairs is vacant. Gen. Chou Yin-jen, who drove Gen. Wang out of Foochow, will probably be a candidate for this post, and it may be given to him if no other suitable recognition of his work can be secured by Gen. Sun for his able assistant. The post, however, was created for Gen. Wang. It is a sinecure that gives opportunity for intrigue and the acquisition of power dangerous to the Tuli, and Peking is in favour of abolishing it. In this Marshal Wu will have the last word.

Meanwhile Civil Governor Sah Chen-ping is said to be holding himself aloof from favour to either side. He commands a force of marines, which promptly takes control over the city when disturbances occur. The absence of looting during the recent coup is credited to the efficient work of these marines.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Reward Offered for Capture of Gen. Wang

Peking, Mar. 10.

Later reports from Foochow indicate that Gen. Wang Yung-chuan stationed parties of troops along the river between Foochow and Yenping after General Sun Chuan-fang had established his headquarters at Yenping. The brigade of Gen. Sun's troops apparently left Yenping, which is 150 kilometres north-east of Foochow, during the night of March 6-7, travelling by boat down the Minkiang. At 1 a.m. on the 7th instant they captured the Upper Bridge Arsenal, while four field-guns, eight machine guns, 7,000 rifles and 3,000 rounds of ammunition were taken from detachments stationed along the river. Gen. Sun's forces reached Foochow at 10 p.m. on the 7th, and 900 of Gen. Wang's men surrendered next day. Another thousand surrendered at a point about ten miles from Foochow.

A foreign telegram says that a reward of $20,000 has been offered for the capture of Gen. Wang Yung-chuan and $10,000 for his brother, Wang I-chuan "who are accompanied only by a few guards." It is thus surmised that the 1,900 men who surrendered were included in the 2,000 with whom Gen. Wang and his brother left Foochow.

The situation in Foochow was quiet on the 8th instant. There was very little disturbance in Foochow, the fighting that occurred having taken place along the river.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

NORTHERN CAMPAIGN AGAINST CANTON

Indications of an Early Movement: Munitions En Route to Kuangtung Border

Peking, Mar. 7.

Certain troop movements have been reported which would seem to indicate that the first steps in the Northern campaign against Canton have been taken.

Gen. Shen Hung-ying, the well-known Kuangsi militarist, has been ordered to proceed with his troops from Chenchow to Shoukuan, while Gen. Fang Ping-jen's forces have arrived at Tayuling, near the border of Kiangsi and Kuangtung in readiness to enter Kuangtung at the appointed time. The latter will be joined shortly by the First Special Mixed-Brigade from Kiangsi.

Considerable quantities of arms and ammunition are being transported from Hankow to the Kuangtung border under the escort of Gen Ma Chi.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RECRUITING TROOPS IN SHANGHAI

A Thousand Men off to Fight for Dr. Sun Yat-sen in Canton

It was learned on Monday that a Chinese recruiting campaign has within the past few days been actively pursued in Shanghai. Notwithstanding the activity shown, the recruiting agents have succeeded in keeping it very quiet, and although no fewer than 1,000 men have been enrolled and apparently despatched from the port, it has not yet been ascertained by what steamer they left.

The campaign has been on behalf of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, and the troops were informed that they would be sent to Canton. After being enrolled they were allowed to return to their homes, and were notified that subsequently they would be informed of a rendezvous to which they should immediately repair. Not even the day of their departure was made known to them beforehand. Apparently the recruits were duly informed when the day of departure came, for they seem to have left Shanghai, although, as stated, it is not yet known by which steamer they left, or when.

ADMINISTRATIVE AREA IN KIAOCHAO

Proposal to Appoint Mr. Kao En-hung Civil Governor

Tsingtao, Mar. 7.

The Kiaochao Territorial Administration announce that they endorse the movement to place Mr. Kao En-hung, the former Minister of Communications, here as Governor of a separate administrative area, comprising Tsingtao and the former German leased territory. A mandate appointing Mr. Kao En-hung is expected shortly.

The Japanese First Squadron, comprising 21 men-of-war, will leave its base at Sasebo to-morrow, arriving here on Sunday.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Mar. 8.

According to Chinese sources, Mr. Kao En-hung, who has been named as Director of the Tsingtao Administration, will shortly proceed to Tsingtao to inspect conditions in the port and to interview General Hsiung Ping-chi, the present director. It is understood that a group of members of the Shantung Provincial Assembly have telegraphed to the Government protesting against any change being made in the administration of Tsingtao, contending that, as the port is part of Shantung, its administration should be in the hands of the Civil Governor of the province.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING'S UNPAID POLICE

Salaries Long in Arrears

Peking, Mar. 7.

There again seems to be some uneasiness over the non-payment of salaries due to the Peking police and gendarmerie who are said to be several months in arrears. It is reported that Marshal Wang Huai-ching, Commandant of the Peking Garrison, Gen. Hsueh Chih-heng, Commandant of the Gendarmerie and Gen. Nieh Hsien-fen, Commandant of Police, invited Mr. Wang Ko-ming, Minister of Finance, to a dinner on Tuesday last with the object of discussing ways and means to secure the salaries in question, but Mr. Wang was ill and could not attend. Another invitation is being sent to Mr. Wang to-day.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Mar. 8.

The commandants of the Peking Garrison, the Peking Gendarmerie and the Metropolitan Police have despatched delegates to call on the Cabinet in order to inquire when and how the arrears of wages due to these forces will be paid.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE CUSTOMS SURTAX

A Preliminary Conference

Peking, Mar. 11.

The Chinese Government this morning sent a long Note to each representative of the Powers signatory to the Washington Nine Power Treaty, requesting a preliminary conference to prepare the way for the conference, which will be held in Shanghai when all the Powers concerned ratify the aforesaid Treaty, concerning the increase of 2½ per cent. in the Customs duty. The Note refers to the long delay and contends that a preliminary conference will facilitate the work of the regular conference later on.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE ITALIAN ARMS

Peking, Mar. 8.

According to current reports the Italian arms have been removed from the old Manchu arms store at Sanchiatien and are being distributed among various centres, including Jehol, Nanking, Loyang and Chenchow, Hunan. It is believed that the portion sent to Loyang is intended for Szechuan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE WAR IN SZECHUAN

Marshal Wu's Demands for Funds for Northern Troops

Peking, Mar. 4.

It is reported that Marshal Wu Pei-fu has asked the Government for $5,000,000, to pay all the Northern troops in Szechuan up to date. There does not seem to be much prospect of this demand being met in full, according to semi-official comment, but the Government will remit a percentage of the money as soon as possible.

Premier Sun Pao-chi returned to Peking from Tientsin last evening. The Cabinet office asserts that Mr. Sun's visit was taken solely in connexion with private affairs.

General Yang Tseng-hsin, Tuchun of Sinkiang, has reported to the Government the arrival at Urumchi (Tihue) of Afghan delegates with the object of bringing about negotiations between China and Afghanistan on the subject of a commercial agreement.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mar. 8.

In connexion with the demand of Marshal Wu Pei-fu for funds to pay the northern troops in Szechuan, it is reported that the Military Council has sent General Wang Hung-lieh to the Ministry of Finance to consult with the Minister regarding available money. The Council is said to have $150,000, only available for this purpose.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu recommends the appointment of Mr. Ho Pei-yung as Civil Governor of Hupeh, thus relieving Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan of that concurrent post.

Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan now holds three official posts: Inspector-General of Hunan and Hupeh, Tuchun of Hupeh, and Civil Governor of Hupeh. He was recently relieved of the command of the 25th Division, which gave him four posts. Marshal Wu points out that the posts of Inspector-General and Tuchun provide sufficient outlet for the activities of one man.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RIVAL GENERALS OF KUEICHOW

Peking, Mar. 3

Chinese circles report that a reconciliation has been effected between Gen. Liu Hsieh-chih, Tuchun of Kueichow, and Gen. Yuan Tsu-ming, the former commander-in-chief of the troops in that province, as a result of which it is believed that the former will vacate the post of tuchun in favour of the latter, Gen. Liu, however, remaining as Civil Governor. As soon as affairs are settled in Szechuan, Gen. Yuan will return to Kueichow. The reconciliation between these two leaders is attributed to their desire to unite against Yunnan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Fengtien authorities have sent Mr. Ma Chong-zeu, Defence Commissioner of the Waterworks of the Three Eastern Provinces, to Shanghai for the purpose of investigating into the conditions of the independent navy in Shanghai, and also to confer with Commander Ling on certain matters. The local Chinese press states the deputy arrived at Shanghai yesterday and will proceed to Hangchow in a few days time.

WITH reference to the firing upon the str. Meiren on December 7, by the Revenue cruiser Haichow, Admiral Lin, Shanghai Chinese Naval Officer and Captain K. T. Hsu, who was commander of the Haichow at the time of the firing, have called on the U. S. Consul-General to apologize and to express regrets for the firing, and for the fact that some shots struck the Meiren. The incident was purely accidental, they stated. They have undertaken to meet the cost of repairs for any damages caused and the Admiral has given the most formal assurances that precautionary measures have been taken which will ensure that there is no repetition of such incidents.

men have to face at the present day, and their questions are prompted by a sincere desire to better their chances of work. The former shows that he realizes perfectly well the impossibility of trying to run British steamers engaged solely in Asiatic waters except by Asiatic crews, hence his limitation respecting Suez. He, however, ignores the fact that to-day British crews have to compete with Asiatics not only east of Suez but the whole way from Japan to England and the rest of Europe. To mention one country only, Japan, with her great steamship lines, would almost certainly make inroads on the British carrying trade but for the cheap labour which the latter are enabled to obtain. There is a further and very important point which Commander Kenworthy and others have apparently lost sight of. When trouble occurs among a white crew on an Eastern run the master of a ship may be placed in the most difficult situation imaginable. Admiring the British sailor as we do, it has yet to be admitted that at times he makes rather too good a life of it when in distant ports, and from time to time numbers have to be left behind from other causes than sickness. The difficulty of finding European sailors to replace them in Far Eastern ports is very great, and there is a very great danger of a ship having to go short-handed or stay in port, so piling up charges. With an Asiatic crew in Asia this seldom proves to be the case, and we believe that if the opinion of shipowners generally were taken they would be unanimous in the belief that for Asiatic trade Asiatic seamen are a sine qua non. And whether they be Lascars or Chinese, British subjects or not, is no sufficient reason for tampering with the custom of an industry with which the prosperity of the nation is so intimately involved.

If ships are running at a loss just now, as Lord Inchcape indicates, it would be a much more serious matter if, because of some Act of Parliament, their running expenses were so increased—through the employment of white crews for instance—that they had to be laid up. Yet it is difficult to see what else would happen, for shipowners will not continue indefinitely to meet deficits, nor will the public be able to stand the drain of higher travelling expenses and heavier freight rates. As matters are at present the recent London strike may easily have the effect of higher charges all round owing to the greater expenses entailed on ships calling there. And if the public refuses to respond to these increases, ships will inevitably be laid up. Therefore instead of having improved the position of the British seaman, these champions of his cause will have merely succeeded in damaging it. Nor will that be the end of the trouble, for once ships lie idle the shipbuilding yards will feel the effect and instead of being confined to one class hardship will extend to several. The old vicious circle of unemployment and still worse trade will be started all over again. Probably it is just as well that this problem has come at first hand to Mr. Webb, for as well as being a Socialist he is an economist of considerable experience and reputation, and if his economic theories at times conflict with those current in the City, he shows a disposition to avoid any experimentation at this early stage of his career in office. Moreover the benefit to Labour of his economic knowledge may help to allay these periodical agitations in respect of Asiatic seamen which have been the rule for several years past.

THE C. P. O. SAVINGS BANK

Mar. 15.

WHEN the Chinese Post Office launched its scheme of a savings bank in 1919 most of us prophesied failure. Mistrust of lending money to any institution at all connected with the official world on the one hand and, on the other, the low rate of interest offered as compared with normal prices of borrowing in China were thought likely to prevent success. Actual experience proves that the foreign control of the Post Office, guaranteeing honesty of administration, has commanded confidence and, as in other countries, the savings bank has proved invaluable to the class who can only put away two or three dollars at a time. Thus it is that the 800 depositors recorded at the end of 1919 had risen to nearly 26,400 at the end of 1922, for which year we have now received the report. Deposits in big dollars during this year amounted to $4,125,539 an increase of 62 per cent. over the previous year, and although withdrawals also increased, as they naturally would do with payings-in rising, the amount due to depositors when the year closed was 80 per cent. higher than a year before, namely, $2,715,964 against $1,505,883. The number of depositors grew by nearly 7,000.

The report includes a large number of statistics, which, after the manner of their kind, suggest interesting reflexions to those who take the trouble to burrow into them. The analysis of passbooks shows that the greatest number, 8,214, were for sums of ten dollars and under, an illustration of the bank's usefulness to the small depositor mentioned above. But the next biggest class are the accounts between one and five hundred dollars, 7,925. Those between fifty and one hundred number only 3,410. Is it that the people who can accumulate such sums are most liable to be hit by some unexpected charge necessitating withdrawal? Or that the unwonted possession of sixty or seventy dollars is too much for their self-restraint and out the money comes to be squandered in one glorious "burst"? From personal memory of spasmodic attempts to save in earlier days, one fancies the latter is the likelier explanation. From the analysis of professions or occupations of depositors we see that merchants headed the list with 4,457, Government employees (we had no idea they got their wages paid regularly enough to save anything) came next with 3,641 and students third with 3,631. Once again we may ponder on the gulf which separates East from West: in our own student days there was never anything to save, very much the other way. But the most interesting entry is that while men depositors number 19,019 women can muster only 4,065. East or West, feminine nature is the same. No true woman (we are not thinking of the "This Freedom" type) in her heart of hearts ever really believed in banks and of anything like an investment she has an invincible mistrust. The old stocking—not, be it observed, the masculine sock—is still the true image of woman's notion of the properest way of laying something by.

Political conditions affected the Savings Bank adversely. The further opening of branches was found inadvisable on this account and "the impossibility of safely investing money locally made it necessary to remit surplus funds to the various ports and this is not only a difficult but also a dangerous procedure when the country is in a disturbed condition and bank charges abnormally high in consequence." Also, in Kuangtung, small coin deposits have slightly decreased, the rate of interest having had to be dropped in that province from 5 to 3.6 per cent. owing to "the difficulty experienced in investing funds in Canton"—which has notoriously been shoving its money into Hongkong in order to save all it can from the claws of Kuomintang military collectors. But how much more political turmoil might affect the Savings Bank is suggested by its table of investments. In 1919, its first year, it took up a modest $2,601 worth of the current Shanghai municipal debentures; in 1922 it took up $460,321 worth. What would be the value of that investment, to-day probably the finest gilt-edged security that the world can show, if extraterritoriality were removed? Still more suggestive are the figures of investments in Chinese Government Internal Loans, of which the Savings Bank now holds altogether $2,534,620 worth at face value, which, allowing for what the bonds actually cost, makes them a very profitable holding. Yet their value depends solely on the fact that they are secured on the Customs surplus and that their service is vested in one man, the Inspector-General. It is not only the Chinese banks, but voiceless small investors all over the country who have cause to be thankful that the Powers, at no small risk of boycott and disturbance, would not allow the Canton Government to appropriate the surplus in Kuangtung. Also those small investors may be grateful to the Post Office. It serves them well, produces a report which tells exactly every penny that was received and where and how, in what manner invested and at what cost, and makes a handsome showing. It has convicted us of false prophecy, and we wish it all success with the greater heartiness therefor.

GOVERNOR General Wood has been decorated with the Pope's medal of peace for his services to humanity. Father Francis X. A. Byrne presented the governor with the papal decoration last week.

SIR Edward Stubbs, the Hongkong Governor, has been interviewed by the "China Mail" on his impressions of the Philippines which he recently visited. After expressing the usual enconiums on amenities of the Islands, Sir Edward went into the question of importing Philippine timber. He thought Hongkong should try to develop a trade in Filipino mahogany and other woods. Not only were they very beautiful, but several varieties were proof against white ants, which was an important consideration for Hongkong builders. The Governor was of the opinion that the Philippines could co-operate more closely with Hongkong in suppressing the arms and opium evils.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

The Naval Base

The Labour Government has succeeded in shelving the Singapore naval base scheme by pleading the need for economy. It is a tolerably adroit way of disposing of an inconvenient question in a non-commital manner, but it will not satisfy military opinion in the country or in the Empire. It was a carefully thought-out scheme by the Admiralty experts who had before them the problem of how best to protect our trade routes. The military opponents of the plan were divided into two groups, one who held that while a base was necessary in the Pacific Singapore was not the correct place for it, and the other, led by Sir Percy Scott, who acted on the theory that the day of the battleship is definitely at an end. In consequence, they declined the view that docks capable of taking capital ships were a necessity of the case. Future events may show that this latter view is correct, but nothing has yet happened to confirm it. The naval lessons of the late war cannot be said to give it the required confirmation, and any government which adopted the theory in its entirety would be acting in a very rash manner. Fortunately the present Cabinet has not definitely decided against the base, and this is the most satisfactory feature of what is a very unsatisfactory position.

Labour in Office

When the question of the British Air Force estimates was raised three weeks ago in the House of Commons Mr. Leach, the Labour Under-Secretary for Air, gave a most uncompromising reply to Sir Samuel Hoare, the member drawing attention to Britain's aerial weakness. He more or less hinted that no expansion would take place, because the Great War had shown that the nations which had prepared for war had got most of it. Mr. J. H. Thomas, obviously a man of considerable Parliamentary skill, took it upon himself to tone this blunt assertion down considerably, and to-day we see how far Labour has progressed in its consideration of this branch of defence inasmuch as a definite programme of expansion has been announced. This is all to the good, and quite fails to conform with the expectations of what Labour might do when in office. It is worth while looking at anticipation and execution. First of all during the election, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald succeeded in hiding the suggestion of a capital levy behind his future official advisers; next he refused to commit himself to a revocation of the Singapore naval base scheme, but shelved it on the ground of economy; but when it comes to a palpable weakness in Home defence he enunciates a policy at least somewhat in line with what students of military matters would have. By doing so he must undoubtedly be dispelling the fears which a large proportion of the electorate undoubtedly held of a Labour Government. It is true that to-day the Premier is in a minority and so is not in a position to do anything really Socialistic, but we prefer to believe that he is not playing a sinister game for future power but is rather realizing his obligations to the nation and the limitations imposed by circumstances.

The Custom House

The work of removal from the Custom House was completed during the week-end, and not only has the personnel departed it but we understand that the archives have gone too. Therefore we are now taking our farewell glances at the building. Tenders for its demolition have been called for, and probably within a month the tower will be in the hands of the wreckers. Thus the glory of 30 years passes away. Work on the construction of the present Customs House was started in 1891 and the building was completed in 1895, so its lifetime may be set down as roughly a score of years. There is a tradition, which may be truth, that the ground plan, which takes the form of an "H" was so designed out of compliment to Sir Robert Hart, but the opinion today of architects and engineers, that it was so designed for purposes of light and ventilation, seems rather more in accordance with the probabilities. At any rate during its existence it has served its purpose well, and, had Shanghai not out-grown it, would have been serviceable for years to come. At an interesting juncture like the present it is worth recalling that although situated on the Bund the Custom House is not in the Settlement, the plot of land on which it stands being excluded from the jurisdiction of the Municipal Council whose writ would not run there.

The Caliph and China

As everyone knows, Mohammedanism is very firmly established in Kansu, where a large section of the population are followers of the Prophet. In Hangchow also the True Believers are strongly represented and there are districts in China where smaller sects still cling to the old religion. Yet it does not appear likely that the deposition of the Caliph will have any effect in China. An appeal for information made to several travellers and sinologues met with the response that there are few people in Shanghai who have been in close association with the Chinese Mohammedans and that, any way, the latter are not greatly different from any other Chinese except that they are more or less strict adherents to the creed. Isolated as they have been for centuries, and out of all touch with Turkey, however enthusiastic they may be over their religion, they have no such idea as seems to prevail amongst Indian Mohammedans that the Caliph is their real leader. One traveller who has spent a lot of time amongst the Kansu Mohammedans said that he doubted whether they ever had heard of the Caliph and if they were told about him he did not think it would impress them greatly. He ventured the opinion that, if a fanatical mullah went amongst the people and worked the deposition of the Caliph up into some sort of an excuse for preaching a Holy War, possibly disturbances would follow, but without some such inspiration the people would remain undisturbed. In years long past the Kansu Mohammedans were responsible for several very serious risings, but they have since been ruled with a heavy hand and now they appear to be quite content to live in comparative isolation so long as they are free from outside interference.

The Mackay Treaty

One of to-day's Reuter telegrams states that at question time in the House of Commons on the 12th instant Mr. P. J. H. Hannon, Unionist Member for the Moseley Division of Birmingham, suggested that, in the interests of British exporters, the British Legation in Peking should be instructed to co-operate with the other Legations to ensure ratification of Article 8 of the Mackay Treaty. The suggestion is very much to the point, though Mr. Ponsonby, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, did his best, apparently, to obscure it. The point is: Is the Mackay Treaty alive or dead? The attitude of the Diplomatic Body in Peking towards the proposed Trademark Law has given everybody the impression that they regard the Treaty as dead. If that is the case, how is it going to be possible to quote the Treaty in connexion with the 2½ per cent. Surtax, which is to be granted on condition that China takes steps to abolish likin? Article 8 of the Mackay Treaty providing for abolition was never ratified: Article 7 providing for Customs control of trademark registration was. If a ratified article can be set aside, as the Chinese in their trademark law propose to set it aside, what chance is there of conditions laid down in an unratified article being observed If the Diplomatic Body are asleep, we can assure them that British traders are not.

dent member, and there are certainly no spoils of office.

But in some respects there can be no doubt that Mr. Churchill might, perhaps does, voice a general feeling of dissatisfaction with the condition of things in Parliament. There must have been many in the late general election who equally disliked voting for Labour and for Protection, and there was no way out. But the fault lies not in principles so much as in the party system. A very striking book has lately been produced by an anonymous writer, who is evidently "on the inside" in parliamentary knowledge, called "The Blot on Parliament," the theme of which is that members vote, often against their private convictions, not for a measure, but at the behest of the Whips, in order to keep the Government in power. And the writer goes on to show how this inevitable result of the party system has led to class legislation and dictation to Government by powerful interests, first the landed gentry, latterly the industrial magnates, to-morrow it may be by Labour. Of all of which the writer quotes distressing evidence. The remedy he suggests is so simple that most people will call it Utopian. He urges that the Government shall not, as at present, be compelled to go out of office because it is defeated on any measure. If it is repeatedly defeated, then let a vote of no-confidence be moved and the result will decide. But it is absurd and paradoxical that a Government's life shall hang in the scales of every division, not infrequently in cases where its supporters are against it and its opponents on its side. By the method suggested, our author says, members' freedom of conscience will be restored, the private machinations of trusts defeated and Parliament will be in a fair way to achieve what it is meant to achieve—the greatest good of the greatest number.

SHIPS' OFFICERS AND PIRATES

Mar. 13.

THE voluminous correspondence which is published in another part of this issue and which, we understand, is being widely published in the Far East, should serve to bring to a head the whole question of piracy prevention on the China Coast, in which the present state of affairs is no more hopeful, if as much so, and in which the prospects of a peaceful, satisfactory and lasting settlement are less apparent, than two-and-a-half years ago, when the recrudescence of piracy in China waters first forcibly became evident. The two Guilds concerned may be taken as representing the great majority of ships' officers on the China Coast, and as these officers, followers of a profession which normally is arduous and responsible, constitute one of the most important links in the chain of commercial intercourse in and from the Far East, their opinions and their suggestions, their requests and their demands should be accorded that careful consideration their importance warrants.

A careful study of all the facts made public gives one to the conclusion that the piracy evil has now become acute and important, and has obtained a firm standing; among the present-day disabilities of China Coast conditions generally, that any disquisition on its basic origin (which indubitably is to be found in the present chaotic state of China—militarily, politically and economically) would be as useless as any efforts to strike at the root of the evil with immediate prospects of amelioration would be futile. Piracy on the China Coast is not a transitory phenomenon; it is a cold, hard fact, a fact that has to be faced from all its prospects and viewed from all its angles, fearlessly and with an open and an unbiassed mind. Piracy was last seriously considered as a recognized profession on the China Coast in the late 'sixties; and the average pirate gang of those times has been described as "an ugly crowd, with pistols drawn and knives ready. . . Low-down swabbery of cut-throat thieves, the wharf-rats of the Canton River and the fever-haunted creeks of the Fukien seaboard." It is unlikely that their successors—their descendants, maybe—are imbued with any more virtues, blessed with any more chivalry, or endowed with any more honour than were their predecessors, who were woefully deficient in these three cardinal qualities. There is nothing of glamour about the Chinese pirate; none of that romance associated with the imaginary blue seas and painted sails of the Spanish Main; none of the magnetism of Morgan or Gunn; none of the enchantment that seems to surround, on canvas, Brangwyn's handsome buccaneers of the seventeenth century. We have not to deal with such as they, but rather with a type of creature which, human in shape, can and will, if occasion arises, be more nearly a beast. And that is the pirate of the China Coast in this the twentieth century.

The Officers' position, their contentions, their demands, are ably set out in the letter of February 4 to the Colonial Secretary of Hongkong. Briefly: They want no more police interference in the defence of the ship, which, they contend with apparent justification, results in dual control—control by the police at Hongkong and control by the master on the vessel, with the Naval authorities naturally refraining from interfering where the police are vested with, and assume, responsibility. They want no armed guards or arms and ammunition on the ships; the guards, they say, are neither sailors nor policemen, are not sufficiently intelligent, are at times drunken and disobedient, usually decline combat, are generally inefficient, and constitute a hindrance rather than a help to the master of the ship. Such a formidable indictment cannot have been made without some justification, and that subject alone calls for early and thorough investigation. The arms on a ship, the officers consider, are a source of great attraction to the pirates, whose possession of them is one of the first objectives of an attack. The Officers want a comprehensive system of Naval patrols and convoys. The Hongkong Government already is doing something on these lines: it appears to be on a small scale and subject to the approval of the Admiral Commanding the China Squadron. The installation of wireless telegraphic apparatus is considered a sine qua non to all vessels subject to attack, a view with which every reasonable person must be in full concurrence. It is held by the Guilds that after every case of piracy there should be a competent, formal inquiry. With that view no objection is apparent, and it appears to have many points in its favour. The Officers consider as important that rewards should be given for any information leading to the arrest of any person implicated in a piratical attack, and in all cases of seizure of arms and/or ammunition. No objection to this course is apparent, and it appears to have much to recommend it.

We are reliably informed that feeling among the Officers, while strong on all of the points we have mentioned, is especially so on two others, separate yet correlative. They are:—

(a) That the new Piracy Regulations contain the inviolable dictum that "it is the duty of the master and other certificated officers to resist to the uttermost any piratical attack. This obligation is imperative and no discretion may be exercised as to whether to resist pirates or not;" and

(b) That no provision is made, either in the Piracy Regulations or by any other means, for a (compulsory) scheme of insurance under which, if an officer gets killed in resisting pirates, his dependants shall adequately be provided for; and if he gets maimed, he shall suitably be recompensed. Convincing cases are quoted to show the necessity for some such provision.

As regards (a): This regulation abrogates one of the oldest, most important and cherished traditions of the sea—that the master of a ship, in all circumstances and under all conditions, is the supreme governing body and the sole arbiter on his vessel when at sea, subject to no man's rule and with power to use his discretion as he thinks fit. No provision is made for a case, which conceivably might occur, of the pirates getting the upper hand almost immediately. Are the officers, in such a case, to fight to the last? If so, to what end? There may be women and children, and other harmless passengers, on board. What would happen to them in the case of pirates having been resisted and coming out victorious, is better left to the imagination. Unspeakable atrocities, butchery and savagery, easily might result. This "resist to the uttermost" policy appears to be a mistaken one; the possibilities must be considered, besides the probabilities. As to being deprived of all discretion, the Officers put forward an argument that appears completely unanswerable when they contend that "imperative obligations admit of no discretion. The idea of an officer without discretion is a paradox. . . . The officer is the leader of others." They further point to Section 5 of the Regulations which says "the master shall have complete control of the ship and all on board," and say in reply, "Without discrimination no man can control; without discretion no man can discriminate"—hence another paradox—the master being unable to avoid violation of some part of the Regulations. In view of the criticism that was levelled at this Regulation before it became a law, it is surprising that it has been included in the recently-issued new Regulations.

As to (b): It is never without the bounds of possibility that the pirates will gain control, or partial control. If the officers are to obey the Regulations, they are to fight. In such a case, someone probably would get wounded, or even killed. It has happened already. The Officers contend that as they have to adopt the dual role of sailor and fighter, some sort of provision should be made for their dependants if they get killed, and for themselves if they become wounded. Insurance is the obvious remedy. They suggest that with the money saved by the abolition of the Indian guards (some $1,200 a year per ship) such insurance could amply be covered. That, of course, is a contingency depending on whether the guards are retained or not, but in any case the Officers have a very strong case, and one that cannot lightly be disposed of.

And that is how matters stand at present; with so much publicity being given to the whole affair, everyone concerned, directly and indirectly, should be fully conversant with the facts, and it appears that everything now rests with the Hongkong Government, which cannot well avoid making known its views and its proposals.

THE TRADEMARK DANGER

Mar. 13.

IT is to be hoped that the long and weighty telegram addressed to the "Times" by twenty leading British firms on the subject of the Chinese Trademark Law, of which we published the full text yesterday, will attract the attention and have the result that it deserves to have. The firms who sent the telegram are much to be complimented on their public-spirited action: that they have their own trademarks and cognate interests to defend, does not alter the fact that they are championing, at much trouble and expense to themselves, the cause of all foreigners doing business in China. The telegram reflects credit on whoever composed it, setting forth the facts of the case tersely and tellingly, an unanswerable indictment of a most dangerous and insidious measure.

The crux of the whole matter is Article 15 of the Treaty of Tientsin of 1858, which stipulates that "all questions in regard to rights whether of property or person arising between British subjects shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the British authorities."

By no possible means can the Chinese Trademark Law be made to square with this stipulation. It is just conceivable, though not at all desirable, that the provisions of the Mackay Treaty for the establishment of a trademark registration under the Customs might be modified to suit Chinese amour propre without losing the all-essential foreign control of foreign interests incalculably valuable. That would be a matter for negotiation, after the Legations had been properly approached: and in the present circumstances of China we are very far from recommending or even being disposed to acquiesce in the idea of any change. We merely say that it is imaginable. The actual, bland overriding of the Mackay Treaty is, of course, intolerable. But that John Doe and Richard Roe being involved in a dispute over a trademark, should be deprived of the use of their own country's courts and compelled to take them to a Chinese court is unthinkable. Yet this is exactly what would happen if the Chinese Trademark Law were accepted by the Powers.

It almost seems as if the Diplomatic Body had not yet fully realized the true issues involved or the extensive nature of the issues involved and the far-reaching effect of the law. To accept it is to abrogate the Treaty of Tientsin and imperil the foundations of extraterritoriality in China. And on this vital question of the 1858 Treaty, the Legations have as yet vouchsafed no reply although they have been pressed for one since early last December. If they do not intend to let that Treaty be abrogated, how is it that there is nothing in the Trademark Law to preserve our rights under Article 15 of the Treaty? How can the Legations possibly be satisfied to accept the Trademark Law with no better safeguard of foreign interests than a suggestion—not even an indispensable condition—that foreign advisers be retained in the registration bureau? It is impossible not to think that the Legations were imperfectly advised by people who had never properly grasped the question, when they sent to the Waichiaopu the Note of January on proposed modifications of the Trademark Law, not one of which comes even near to touching its essential viciousness, and that having sent that Note they find themselves in a quandary. The appeal is to London, where it is to be hoped that everyone interested in the China trade will combine to save it while there is yet time.

BRITISH SHIPS AND THEIR CREWS

Mar. 14.

MR. Sydney Webb, the President of the Board of Trade, has in a Parliamentary sense handled the subject of the manning of British ships as cleverly as other leading members of the Labour Cabinet have met inconvenient topics. This means that he has noted points for future reference and in the meantime he allows matters to take their course. There is a great deal to be said at the present moment and especially in the present case for this line of action, and the only fault we have to find with Mr. Webb is that he leaves himself free to pursue any, even the most revolutionary, course in the future. The subject of the manning of British merchant vessels came on this occasion from a Liberal, Commander Kenworthy, who brought forward the suggestion that only ships trading east of Suez should be allowed to employ Asiatic crews, while as a corollary to this Mr. Sexton, the Labour Member for St. Helens, pointed out that Lascar seamen were not being paid a wage commensurate with good British citizenship. From the point of view of British shipping interests and actually of trade interests generally, the position these two members have taken up seems to suggest that they have arrived at only a superficial judgment on the matter, and it should not be allowed to pass without a statement of the only way in which shipowners trading with the Far East can regard their industry if they hope once more to restore it to a profitable basis. That it is not to-day on a profitable basis we know from a recent statement by Lord Inchcape who went the length of saying that there was a loss on practically every voyage of a P. & O. steamer.

Commander Kenworthy and Mr. Sexton are, of course, deeply interested in the hardships which unemployed British sea-

THE TAKING OF CHENGTU

Sudden Swoop of Yang Sen's Forces on City: Taken with Little Loss

From Our Own Correspondent.

Chengtu, Feb. 9.

At last the Northern Armies under Yang Sen, Liu Hsiang and Yuan Tsu-min have captured Chengtu, Hsiong Keh-wu, Tan Mong-shin and Liu Yu-chiu are in full retreat. But what has happened to Lai Hsin-hue? That will no doubt come to light in a few days. In all probability he has, as was suspected, thrown in his lot with Yang Sen.

The past week has been full of interest. Chengtu city was in a state of siege for a week. All the gates were closed last Saturday night, and only opened to-day (Saturday) when Generals Yang Sen and Yuan marched in to take charge of the Capital, with 20,000 troops under their command.

In my last letter I spoke of the severe defeat of Hsiong Keh-wu at Tongchuan a week ago last Sunday. After the break up of his armies, Hsiong climbed over the wall at Tongchuan and escaped in the night. He was somewhat bruised and shaken up but managed to get back to the capital by Friday night and got in before the city was closed. Gen. Yu Pei-ti, Hsiong's Divisional General at Tongchuan has not been seen since the rout. The worst is feared for Yu. He was very popular in the city, and known as a valuable general officer.

The Northern armies' tremendously swift advance upset all their preconceived plans and conjectures and made hopes of a Southern victory very slim indeed. Although Hsiong got back to the Capital in time for the siege his defeat at Tongchuan had destroyed the morale of the troops here, which is never very high unless they are winning and in greatly superior numbers.

After the taking of Sintu, Yang Sen swooped down on Chengtu with his armies. His centre and left were used to envelop the Capital. Chen Kuedong, Den Chi-heo and Tang Chi-yao, with their 7,000 stalwarts were out on the Great East road to prevent flank attacks. On Thursday morning Gen. Yuan Tsu-min as Generalissimo of the Northern forces attacked the Arsenal, with General Yang Sen and his victorious Second Army as shock troops. The Arsenal was won in an hour and half, Liu Yu-chiu's troops were soon in full-retreat. They stood for a while near the Ngan-suen-chow, the large bridge between the Arsenal and the city. A great deal of ammunition was fired at them that seldom found its mark. As soon as the Northern soldiers appeared out of the trenches around the Arsenal, the local troops turned and fled. The Eastern suburb was taken and then troops swept round to the South Gate and occupied part of the suburb.

Generals Yang and Yuan then sent an ultimatum to Hsiong that he and Tan Men-shin were to leave the city at once and would not be molested. They took the tip and with the redoubtable Chang Tsung called the "Napoleon of West China," got out of the South Gate at midnight. Their soldiers kept up a lively rifle fire all the time to cover the retreat. Next an ultimatum was sent to the gallant General Liu Yu-chin, who has played the rôle of "Middle-man" so long and successfully, to get out the next day. Yang Sen had intended to leave Liu alone as harmless, but the fighting on Friday after Hsiong had gone rather angered him, and Liu was given his marching orders. The City was turned over for safe keeping to General Lan until Yang Sen should take over. Again at the midnight hour the South Gate was opened and Liu Yu-chin said a last fond adieu. His soldiers looted the South Gate suburb in passing as Yang's men had with drawn to give them a safe passage.

LOOTING BY SOUTHERN TROOPS.

After Liu left pandemonium broke loose in the city. Hsiong's and Liu's yamêns were looted first by civilians then by soldiery. Gen. Lan soon had loyal troops on the spot and quelled the disorder, arresting soldiers wholesale. They were court-martialled in the morning and over 30 summarily beheaded in front of the old "Chen Fang Si Ling" right on the open street. It was an effective warning to all would-be evil-doers.

I went out to the Arsenal on Saturday morning, where were the Northern Generals' headquarters. The road was lined with soldiers with fixed bayonets 50 feet apart all the way from the Arsenal to the East Gate, then down the Great East street right to the Governor's Yamên.

Generals Yang Sen and Liu Hsiang entered the city early, to prepare the way for the Generalissimo Yuan Tsu-min. I had the privilege of meeting him at the Arsenal, being introduced by the Tsung Pan of the Arsenal, Ma. The General expressed pleasure on arriving at the Capital and taking it with so little loss. His losses, he said, were not more than 300 casualties in the two days' operations round the capital. The Tsung Pan announced that General Yuan was the "Tsung Si Lin" commander in-chief of the Northern Armies representing Wu Pei-fu for the three provinces. Kueichow, Yunnan and Szechuan.

The march into the city was quite imposing. Two battalions of well drilled and smart-looking troops formed the advance guard, and the Generalissimo's cavalcade gave quite the impression of the proverbial "the conquering hero comes." No opposition of any kind was experienced. The East gate remained open all day. It is expected that the other gates will be opened at once. It looks as if the people will be permitted to have a small share of their New Year's ceremonies after all. In fact pessimism has turned into joy. Business men see the end of paper money now. Some of Liu Yu-chiu's troops when interviewed said, "Why shouldn't they conquer (referring to Yang's man)? They are paid in silver and we only in paper." Rather illuminating sidelight don't you think?

Of course, the question is, what next? it is unthinkable that Hsiong, Tan and Liu will sit down and weep. It is on the cards that they will work eastward again and unite with the Yunnanese Tang Chi-yao element, who wish to recapture Chungking as a base for the South. In the meantime Liu Chen-heo is there.

NO WAR IN THE SPRING

Fengtien Faction Reported Anxious to Beat Its Swords into Ploughshares

Mukden, March 8.

The attitude of the Fengtien faction towards the political situation has considerably changed, public opinion now veering in opposition to war. This, it is reported, is due to the decision reached at the conference of military officers of the Three Eastern Provinces which was held some time ago.

In these circumstances, market-prices of various commodities, which, until recently, had fallen continuously in anticipation of hostilities in April between the Chihli and Fengtien troops, have of late gradually revived. The belief that there will be no war between Chihli and Fengtien has come to be generally entertained in both official and commercial circles here.

It seems certain that the Fengtien faction will do its best to avoid hostilities in April, and that the Fengtien authorities have decided to improve internal administration, to readjust the finances, and to encourage and develop the industrial and educational enterprises of the Three Eastern Province. Further, it is said to have been decided (1) that the autonomy of Kirin and Heilungkiang Provinces be further extended, (2) that unification of the currency of the Three Eastern Provinces be enforced, (3) that railways in the three provinces be constructed and that (4) mines and uncultivated land shall be opened and immigration encouraged with a view to the development of industry in the Three Eastern Provinces.—Eastern News Agency.

THE GREAT FIRE IN CHOUTSUN

Varying Stories of the Cause: An Unlucky Arrest and Leaderless Soldiers

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, March 4.

Two sensational stories are now to hand in connexion with a disastrous fire that has occurred in Choutsun, a town on the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway. It appears that early on the morning of February 29, fire broke out in the central district of Choutsun and burned with fierce intensity for some 12 hours, during the course of which all the principal shops and warehouses were destroyed. The death roll is estimated at 300 although this may be an exaggerated figure, but all are agreed that during the height of the conflagration the town was looted.

The first story was that a few days previously, while en route to Tsinan on his return trip from Tsingtao, a son of General Chang Foo-lai, Tuchun of Hunan, alighted at Choutsun with his bodyguard of eight men, for the purpose of seeing the town and the train went without them. General Chang's son and his men had, therefore, to wander about in the town in search of accommodation. Moreover, being short of funds they had to go from one place to another for the purpose of ascertaining the cheapest lodgings.

Now, in Choutsun there was a very energetic chief of the local garrison in the person of Colonel Mai, who supposed General Chang's son and his men to be a gang of cut-throats. He consequently arrested the young man and his bodyguard. In vain did General Chang's son endeavour to make his identity known, until he asked for permission to telegraph Tuli Chen and Governor Hsiung Ping-chi at Tsinan concerning his predicament.

It was then that Colonel Mai realized the delicate position he had fallen into, in arresting the son of a Tuchun. The story continues that Colonel Mai made himself scarce, leaving his soldiers in a disorganized state and that, not having received their wages for some time, they thought it a good scheme to burn the town and take advantage of the confusion by looting it.

The second story is that it is the custom of the people in Choutsun to celebrate the Lantern Festival for 15 days. On February 29 a stiff north wind was blowing and a number of lanterns caught fire and ignited the paper shutters of a public house. By the time the fire brigade got to work, several buildings were well alight. In the interval, bandits in the neighbourhood took advantage of the confusion to loot the town. According to this second story, the bandits set fire to other parts of the town far removed from the seat of the fire.

It is unfortunate that the confusion and panic were so intense that very few can give a clear account of the looting. Some assert that it was the Government troops that did it while others say that it was the brigands.

Many Roasted While Asleep: Property Loss Over $1,000,000: The Brigands' Chance

Tsingtao, Mar. 5.

Further advices are reaching here about the holocaust in Choutsun on Friday when, according to reports, more than 300 people lost there lives. The town was almost entirely consumed, practically all the buildings being swept by the flames. To add to the terror of the inhabitants, bandits in the surrounding hills, attracted by the mounting flames, sweeped down on the city and ransacked many houses before the flames reached them, their occupants having fled in terror.

Many awoke to find their domiciles in a blaze and were roasted to death. Scores were trampled under foot in the mad rush that ensued in the narrow streets. The panic-stricken people dashed madly about until some leader among them led them out to the open country. The injured, in many cases, were left behind to become the prey of the flames and the bandits, who remained as long as possible. Bodies were stripped of clothing and jewelry.

The property loss is said to be more than a million dollars. More than 100 shops and about 90 houses were destroyed. More than one-eighth of the population are on the casualty list.

Believing himself to be in deep trouble and fearing the consequences of his acts Colonel Mai disbanded his troops and fled. The soldiers, freed from his command, decided to loot the town. They ransacked the place killing those who sought to stop them, and finally set the place of fire. Bandits appeared and completed the work of pillage. Chang and his party were able to get away unscathed.

The fire and the strange tale of its cause have made a sensation here. Inquiries are pouring into the police to ascertain the fate of friends and relatives. The police still are without official advices. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tsingtao, Mar. 7.

It now appears that the early reports of the fire at Choutsun were exaggerated. The death-roll was probably not more than a score and the reports of general looting have not been substantiated. The material damage, however, is said to exceed $500,000.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BANDITS SCARCER IN SHANTUNG

Over 200 Executed by Tuchun Tien's Successor: Roads Safer

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsinan, Shan., Mar. 1.

Gen. Cheng Shih-chi, who replaced the unfortunate Tien as Military Governor, is evidently getting to work to exterminate the bandits. It is said that over 200 of them have been executed since Cheng came into power.

The minor officials in the rural districts are realizing that their efforts in this direction will be supported by headquarters, and in some parts of the province the roads are becoming safer.

THE LATEST VICTIM.

About Chinese New Year the son of a wealthy merchant of Choutsun was carried off by local robbers. The lad was caught while offering filial sacrifices at the ancestral graves.

Negotiations for a big ransom were soon started. The go-between had even arranged to receive the money at a lonely rendezvous, when the father of the captive put the case into the hands of the local military official, a man with plenty of initiative. The go-between was ambushed and compelled to divulge the whereabouts of some of the bandit leaders. The premises were surrounded, but the inmates put up a stout resistance. In desperation the soldiers set fire to the place, and among the ruins the charred remains of several bodies were found. It is feared that the merchant's captive son may have perished in the flames.

PHILIPPINE AMBITIONS

Independence Ideals Knocked on Head by Message from President Coolidge

Manila, Mar. 7.

The letter from President Coolidge to Mr. Roxas, the Chairman of the Philippines Independance Mission, stating that there is no hope of independence at present, is regarded as knocking out the props from under the local campaign to raise money from voluntary contribution to continue propaganda in the United States. A few thousand pesos have been raised so far. Three Americans, one of whom is a missionary and the other two businessmen, have contributed to it.

The projected boycott of American merchants, newspapers and so forth has failed to materialize to date, though there are evidences that attempts are being made. A chain letter advising a boycott is being circulated.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANGSHA MILITARY CONFERENCE

Disappointment at Postponement: Marshal Wu Pei-fu's Message

From Our Own Correspondent.

Changsha, Mar. 5.

Disappointment is evinced at the postponement of the much-talked-of military Conference which was to meet on March 1. It has been delayed for 10 or 12 days through the non-arrival of two most important officials who rank next to the Commander-in-chief, both of whom have been employed away from Changsha and neither of whom started for the capital in time. Rumour is, of course, rife as to the reasons for such late starting. The two officials. Divisional Generals Yeh Kai-hsin and Ho Yai-tsu, are said to be on their way and will arrive some time next week.

Awaiting them are Brigadier-Generals Tang Sheng-chih, Liu Hsing, Tang Sheng-ming, Chiang Tsu-ou, T'ang Hsu-pien and Tsou Hsu-ping. There is also the Hupeh General Hsia Tu-yin, who has been in the province since Gen. Hsiao Yao-nan took over the seals of his native province. Gen. Tsou Li, a Hunan (Liuyang) man. has just returned from Loyang, bringing with him a lengthy missive from Marshal Wu Pei-fu which will form the main subject of discussion.

Beyond the fact that Chao Heng-ti will be confirmed in the highest military office in the province, if the military conference agrees to the cancelling of the Hunan Constitution and loyalty to the Peking government, I have not heard anything else about Marshal Wu's message.

Gen. Ma Chi and some of his colleagues are also here.

Among other subjects which the conference will take up will be the question of both the military and financial relations between the generals and the provincial authorities—both matters in which there is much need of proper understanding.

BEGGAR FARMERS

Hochow's Unwelcome Visitors: Lower Yangtze Valley Peaceful

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hochow, An., Mar. 5.

About two weeks ago a straggling band of about 300 beggar farmers from Honan province came into Hochow from south of the river and squatted in the temples and city gates. They demanded money to help them back to Honan. In the beginning of winter they had migrated south but now they were returning to their little homes and farms.

Last December a young man in Hochow strangled a seven-year-old boy and then threw his body into pond because the little fellow had pulled his ear in fun. Last week this man was escorted out of the city by the mayor and a band of soldiers and placed before a firing squad who did not miss the mark.

The ground has been purchased and a new house is in process of erection for the Bethel Mission in Hochow. This mission and the Methodist have been holding Union Evangelistic meetings for a month with Dr. Chen Wei-ping, Mr. Li Yoh-han, David Yang and others assisting as evangelists. Great interest has been manifested and over 140 persons have signed cards asking for more Bible instruction. The people certainly showed great interest and were most attentive.

No robbers have been reported for over a month and the people all up and down the valley seem happy and contented. It is to be hoped that the war lords will let them alone. If they do all will be peaceful.

February has been a wet cold month and very little spring planting has been done. The winter wheat, beans and rape plants seem very flourishing and a bumper harvest may be anticipated for June.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

OUTBREAK OF WAR IN EAST SHENSI

A War of Vengeance Styled Punitive Expedition: The Senseless Fighting of Factions: Wu Pei-fu's Adherents to be Wiped Out

From an East Shensi Correspondent.

It was on Saturday, February 9 at night that the city of Hoyang suddenly was enclosed by between 12 to 18 hundred soldiers, who early in the following morning opened a brisk fire and made a determined, though vain, attempt to enter the city.

The enemy had chosen a favourable time, because the General for the troops in Hoyang and connecting military district, as well as the Colonel, who had the direct command of the city troops and several of the Staff-officers had gone to their homes in the city of Pehshui for the Chinese New Year holidays, and were entirely unprepared for hostilities of this kind.

Thus the city was only defended by the troops at home, until the General and the Colonel had time to return with additional soldiers. Thereupon the troops were ordered outside to attack the enemy, who kept up a hard fight, and only retired step by step, in some directions 20, in others 20 li from Hoyang.

THE NATURE OF THE WAR.

This was for some 10 days, and still is, rather difficult to decide. It was soon learnt, that the foremost attackers were two former Majors of the Hoyang general. These, like nearly all of General Kao's troops, had formerly been robbers, like Kao himself. But while Kao, very much impressed by General Feng Yu-hsiang's acts, while he was in this province, had in fact begun to reform himself as well as his army, these two majors of his, Tuan and Wang, would not reform. Thus Kao started war on the former in the town of Weichuang, with the intent of relieving him of his weapons, but Tuan was able to escape with most of them and came and joined Ma, "chi-tui-chang," in Hancheng. Major Wang, stationed in Hoyang, was just about to be relieved of his weapons too, because it had been known to Kao that he secretly had assisted robber bands in the neighbourhood; but he managed to escape with one company of his soldiers with their rifles and ammunition; and having gathered some robber bands about him, went and joined Ma, "szi-ling," in Hancheng, was gladly receives any rascals, provided they have guns and can add to his strength.

For about the said number of days it was generally thought, that a war of revenge only was fought, and that these two Majors were assisted by Ma "szi-ling" secretly.

The gentry of Hoyang sent several telegrams from Tungchow to the Tuchun in Sian inquiring about the nature of this business, but no answer was received.

A POLITICAL WAR OR NOT?

While General Kao, was in the act of driving Ma "szi-ling's" troops back to Hancheng, it became known that large bodies of troops had entered his district from the southwest and were fighting his troops in that direction. Accordingly he recalled all his troops to Hoyang and leaving 1,000 men to defend that city, took the rest with him and went westward to ascertain who it was that had attacked him there.

Soon it became known however, that the whole warplan had been laid by the Tuchun, Liu, in Sian, and that he had used the antagonism between Ma's and Kao's troops to start the so-called "punitive expedition," with the object of destroying entirely the power of Kao, who had proved in the past to be a hard fighter. As the Governor's troops, so overwhelming in numbers, brought with them plenty of artillery of which Kao had none, and even big guns, they soon took several of his positions and marched inwards his stronghold in the city of Pehshui, which according to order was to be levelled with the ground.

This city has been besieged and bombarded now for five days, and to-day, February 29, the news has come that Kao has fled, after having killed a great number of the attacking troops, and that he took with him about 1,000 men, as well as his families and valuables.

The Colonel, left to take care of Hoyanghsien, was later offered the command of his master's troops, if he would offer allegiance to the Governor, and seeing that his master had to give up city after city, he accepted the offer and handed the city over to Ma "szi-ling," who was besieging it.

CHIHLI PARTY THE REAL AIM.

However the nature of the war is not yet clear. Though many believe, what the proclamation now posted all over the district says, that it is purely a punctive-expedition directed against General Kao alone, it is to the observer hard to believe, that such stern measures would be taken against him for such faults, as are mentioned in the proclamation (whereof some are entirely false), seeing that some of the leaders of the troops ordered to attack him, do not discipline their troops nearly as well as Kao and their characters fall far short of his.

Personally, I with many others, am inclined to credit the rumour that has been floating about long, that the younger political element in the province is about to start a war against Wu Pei-fu and Tsao Kun with the object of "diminishing their power."

We are told too, that after Kao, the Colonel of Puchenghsien is next to be attacked, and after him the cities occupied by General King in Ulinfu are to be dealt with, beginning with the city of Lochuan, that lies to the north of Pehshui.

However, plans may be altered according to circumstances. While these lines are penned a great war council is being held in the city of Tungchowfu, which the Tuchun himself has actually come to conduct.

No doubt there is important business at stake.

ANOTHER LEADER ADVANCING.

But while they now are congratulating themselves on the superficial victory won over General Kao, owing to their big guns, reliable news has already reached us, that General Ching from the north is also on the move, and that his troops have reached and taken Ichuanhsien to the north of Hancheng. The city there was almost emptied of troops, when Ma ordered a regiment from there to assist him in attacking Hoyang. In its absence, however, Ching's troops had entered Ichuan, and now Ma's Ichuan regiment, together with two other regiments of his, are on their way back to Ichuan to retake it.

Thus it is evident, that war between different factions in this province has commenced and we may at any time see the Chihli general in Tungkuan take advantage of the Tuchun's troops' expedition to the north and follow his not altogether concealed ambition to place himself in chief command of the province. Because everything points to the fact that even this beginning is after all a war between north and south.

The Yangtze has probably reached its lowest level this season and will steadily rise. At Kiukiang on March 7, the water mark was 9.1 feet rising. Hankow on the same date recorded 6.1 feet steady. A vessel drawing 17 feet could reach Kiukiang at the present state of the channels.

Of the thousands thrown out of employment through the Japanese earthquake, the "Japan Advertiser" states that bank clerks were the most unfortunate, 2,315 of them losing their positions.

CANTON MILITARISTS IN WUCHOW

Getting Ready for Flight? Rumours of Impending Hunanese Southern Adoance

From Our Own Correspondent.

Liuchow, Si., Mar. 1.

The old Chinese year closed with comparitive quietness and the new was ushered in with questions as to what the next few months might hold in store for this storm-tossed city.

In December Marshal Luk with a fine body of well equipped troops left Nanning for Kueilin calling on the cities en route and receiving a warm welcome all along the way. The merchants and gentry alike hasten to put their faith in the Marshal Luk in the hopes of a better government and a united province, and this tour of the province seemed in the minds of many to be connexed with such a scheme.

Reports were current that the Marshal had gone to confer with the Hunan leaders regarding a concerted move on Kuangtung, and as Wuchow has been an outpost of the Canton government for many past the interest in government affairs was naturally intense in this city.

Nothing startling has yet happened, but recently members of the Canton military party stationed in this city have been anxious to find more comfortable quarters. They seem to prefer foreign buildings in close proximity to the steamer landings to the former yamêns inside the city wall. An open road to escape by seems to be the desire of all, and within the last few days several of those in highest positions have left on urgent business for places nearer the coast, while their trained retinues and families are following closly behind them. Why this hurried exodus, is the question that the man on the street asks. And the answer of many is, "Marshal Luk is marching on Wuchow." If this is true Wuchow may soon again be under the control of the Kuangsi leaders and as the Marshal has instituted order and stimulated business in other parts of the province his arrival here is looked forward to by the masses with a great degree of pleasure.

NEW ROADS FOR WUCHOW.

Meanwhile steps are being taken to improve the road system of the city, by the opening of larger and better roads. Already surveyors are at work across the river from the city making plans for a Maloo which will connect the growing suburb on the banks of the West River with the city and make travel to and from the city more easy, as well as encourage settlers who cannot find housing accommodation in the city side to settle on the hills to the west. A large street is also to be made along the Fu River front running down to the bund and boat landings.

A few days ago an enterprising firm started a launch service between Wuchow and Pingloh. The launches fly the Portuguese flag and are expected to make regular trips up and down the Fu River. Later when the river rises it is hoped to extend the run as far as the ancient capital Kueilin. Such an improvement on the present slow style of travel on houseboats will indeed be a welcome change and much appreciated by those whose business obliges them continually to travel along this route.

BRITISH STEAMER AGROUND.

The heavy rains of two weeks ago raised the river several feet and made steamer travel up and down the West River more easy. The British-owned steamer Kochow however did not long enjoy the flood, for on her last down-river trip, during a fog she ran aground 20 miles below Samshui. The receding waters left her stranded. Now she is high and dry and must wait for the next flood before there is any hope of refloating her.

LIFE IN HANGCHOW

Sudden Dearth in War Rumours: Missionary Music-lovers

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, Mar. 5.

Rumours are few these days, but deputations to Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang from far and near are frequent. Of what results from them we know nothing.

We hear that bandits are making their presence felt in Yuyao. Recently a skirmish between the police and military took place in front of the Customs Overseer's Yamên in Ningpo, and resulted in a couple of his waiters getting mawled.

The Waterworks Committee is still meeting and talking plans, but we still depend upon the clouds for our water supply, and these days it is more than abundant.

Yesterday the monthly Missionary Association meeting was a musical one, and met at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Duncan Main. There was a generous programme and every piece was encored. The talent was all local with the exception of "Joe" Evans, who came specially from Shanghai to charm us with his violin solos, and he did. Dr. Lasell, the pianist, accompanied him with distinction. The singing was of a high standard, and a reading by one of the ladies on woman's rights in South America, tickled our risible faculties not a little. We look upon these social meetings as stress and distress ventilators and aids to mission work.

Mar. 3 (delayed).

On Saturday afternoon at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Latimer, the foreign community had a great treat in seeing the "Goblin Fair"—a fairy operetta presented by the children of the Hangchow American School, under the direction of Mrs. C. B. Day.

The children, some of whom were only tiny tots, played their parts exceedingly well, and fairly astonished the audience who had no idea there was so much latent amongst the children. Mrs. Day deserves great praise for her wonderful accomplishment.

Dr. Edwards, of Taiyuanfu, who was at Home when his hospital was burnt down in November, is here on a visit to his old friend and fellow student, Dr. Main. Dr. Edwards is accompanied by his doctor daughter, and has returned to rebuild his hospital. He was very much interested in the progress made by the C.M.S. Medical Mission during the last few years.

The Rev. C. P. Barkman preached the monthly English sermon yesterday on "God inexhaustible."

CATTLE DISEASE IN CHINA

Dr. Charles S. Gibbs, bacteriologist to the College of Agriculture and Forestry, Nanking, is still in Kaifeng, Honan, working on rinderpest. This winter's epidemic seems to be particularly virulent and widespread, says the College bulletin. It has been reported from Shansi, from Shantung (unless the disease there is other than rinderpest) and Nanhsuchow in Northern Anhui. The incidence of disease is high; in many cases 100 per cent. of all the cattle of a village die. Mr. W. E. Salee of Kaifeng estimated about a month ago a mortality of 50,000 head of cattle, with a value of $1,000,000, which would seem conservative in view of the wide area affected and the virulence of the epidemic. By now the loss is undoubtedly very much greater. The last letter from Dr. Gibbs says that he has arranged for an experiment in several of the villages near Kaifeng, using products which he has made in Kaifeng, and which he has already used with success on the mission herd.

Dr. Gibbs' experiments are watched with the keenest interest and hope, as the control of rinderpest is absolutely essential to the development of a safe and profitable animal industry in China.

CHINESE MONTAGUES AND CAPULETS

Daughter of Tang Sacrifices Herself for the Family of Pang

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kaifeng, Ho., Mar. 10.

A few days ago the whole city was in consternation at the death of Miss Pang, affianced daughter in-law to Gen. Tang, who is said to have taken her own life to be with his deceased son who, never having seen, she honours beyond measure by her death.

The General is one of the wealthy landlords of Kaifeng, a friend of the late President Yuan Shi-kai, and one who enjoyed his confidence when at the height of his power. Gen. Pang was a Shantung man, who wanted to get into favour in those good old days and sought to do so by making an alliance with the family of Tang. Thus it came about that the second son of Gen. Tang was betrothed to the young daughter of Gen. Pang. When Yuan Shi-kai was lost as friend and patron, a coldness sprang up between the two families, and this the passing of years had not abated at the time of the girl's death.

When the funeral rites for his son were over it occurred to Gen. Tang that the vacant place might be filled by the wife that was to have been his son's, and accordingly sent for Miss Pang. It is reported that Gen. Pang was very wrath at this demand and declared that his daughter should not leave his home, and that death had given his family a quittance of all obligations to the family of Gen. Tang. It seems, however, that Miss Pang herself thought otherwise and without waiting to ask her father's leave or blessing she set off with her mother, whom she had won over to her way of thinking, for Honan and the home that should have been hers if her intended husband had lived.

THE SPIRIT WEDDING.

With her came the bride's trousseau that had been procured for the great occasion of her life. After being some time in the home of Gen. Tang, it is said, she solemnly arrayed herself in her wedding garments and going to the grave of her husband - to - have - been went through a spirit wedding with the spirit of the departed. Returning to the Tang home she proceeded to drink a poisoned draught and so passed into the spirit world of her unknown lover.

That is the story as it comes from the family of Tang, and to honour her and incidently to gain further merit for the family Tang gave her a most elaborate funeral.

A monster procession was formed, which led by bands and a multitude of banners marched through the principal streets of the city escorting a sedan chair in which was a large photo of the young bride. This procession kept up for a good half day, so that the whole city might hear of the virtuous daughter-in-law, and yield plaudits to the family of Tang.

It is said that General Tang has petitioned Marshal Wu Pei-fu, and the President, for the privilege of building a memorial "p'ai-fang" to commemorate this worthy "widow." The widows' arches in Honan are very beautiful, usually made of cut stone and much decorated with carving. If Kaifeng is to have such an arch or arches it ought to be a worthy addition to street ornamentation.

AN ADDED HORROR.

There is a story going the rounds that adds even a greater touch of tragedy to this story. The papers recently had reports of a certain "General Pang" who has committed wholesale assasinations among his family. This Gen. Pang is also a Shantung man, and the story of Miss Pang as recorded above is being filled in with the added horror of the temporary insanity of her father, bereft of his senses, when he discovered the loss of his daughter. After killing 25 members of his family, concubines, officers, and servants, he took his own life, thus adding grim emphasis to his objections to cementing his family alliance with the family of Tang.

GAINING GROUND FROM YELLOW RIVER

Useful Work in Honan: How the River Dyked Itself: Marshal Wu Pei-fu's Interest in Forestry and Agriculture

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kaifeng, Ho., Feb. 28.

In my last news letter I spoke of the very commendable efforts of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, to further the cause of afforestation, by holding the various magistracies responsible for the work. In that letter I also mentioned the passing of Mr. Wu Ih-lu, the head of the Forestry Department in this province for many years, till his elevation to the headship of the Industrial Department.

When Mr. Wu was raised to the Shi Yeh Ting, a former pupil of his, whom he had raised step by step in the Forestry Department, till he had become chief secretarial head of the department, was made the Commissioner in sequence to Mr. Wu. This young man had been appointed by Mr. Wu to go to Loyang on many occasions to attend to the carrying out of Marshal Wu Pei-fu's afforestation schemes, and from this contact frequently repeated, he gradually worked himself into the marshal's good graces. It seems to be part of Marshal Wu's policy to take the men, whom he knows intimately, and place them in spheres of influence that may be very useful to him when he will eventually stand in need of all his friends can do for him. Thus Mr. Ren Wen-ping, was made Commissioner of Forestry in the province. But the favours of fortune have not stopped there. When his old patron came to an untimely end on New Year's eve, and left the Industrial Department without a head, there seemed to be a veritable landslide for Mr. Ren, when he was appointed concurrently head of the Industrial Department as well.

A SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENT.

There are several reports accounting for this second stroke of good fortune for Mr. Ren. Since his elevation to the Forestry Headship he has been much in contact with the Marshal, who makes it this business to be interested in all things in the province. The Honan International Famine Relief Association had done an admirable piece of work along a short stretch of the Yellow River Embankment in the way of experiment in reclamation work. This was the anchoring of trees in the river bed some distance out from the shore marked by water. The trees were anchored parallel to the shore for some seven or eight li in extent while the season was still dry. When the waters arose each tree became a centre for a small whirlpool, which attracted the silt from the centre of the river, and deposited it fairly regularly between the row of trees and the shore. When the waters subsided the result was most gratifying, as a new shore line had been marked and several hundred of acres of good land had been reclaimed inside the line of trees. This is known in reclamation work as the Tree Retard Method and was carried out under the advice of Mr. Todd, the consulting engineer of the Famine Relief Commission in Peking.

UNLUCKY JEALOUSIES.

Then the Honan Famine Relief Association asked the privilege of planting trees along this stretch of reclaimed land, and also along the new dyke erected during recent famines by relief labour to keep back the angry waters of the Yellow River when in flood. The good offices of the Nanking University Forestry and Agriculture Department were to have been utilized through its extension scheme, to get young trees and to start experimentation leading to improvement in agricultural methods for the province. The plan proposed to make the work self-perpetuating, by utilizing the trees grown to continue the work of reclamation, as the purchase and delivery of grown trees makes a big inroad on finances, and the fruits of the agricultural work were to continue the work for the benefit of the farming community of the province.

The Forestry Department of the province, through its head, so rumour says, found this plan very humiliating, as it seemed completely to ignore the provincial machinery. As Mr. Ren was in attendance on the Marshal at Loyang, it is said that he insinuated that this scheme if carried out, would constitute an encroachment on Honan's sovereign rights, because there are several foreigners in the Famine Relief Association. Needless to say the scheme has not been approved, though it would be of very great advantage to the province and help in solving one of the great engineering problems, of the Yellow River, that of keeping the bed from silting up: the very work that reclaims the bed adjoining the shores also keeps the channel open, and deepens it.

A MUCH REGRETTED OFFICIAL.

Incidentally there have been other changes in the personnel of provincial officials. The foreign community of the province regrets the passing from the control of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs of Mr. C. T. Sia, who has been Commissioner for several years now. Since his connexion with Honan affairs, Mr. Sia has been in touch with the Foreign Bureau, that is for 16 years. Mr. Sia was educated in Fukien, of which province he is a native, and having a good grasp of English he turned his attention to teaching in Government schools, both in Changteh-ho and in this city. For the careful mediation and conduct of foreign affairs, Mr. Sia got a good schooling under Mr. C. F. Hsu, who was Commissioner in this province for many years before he was promoted to the banner office in Shanghai. During his own term as Commissioner, Mr. Sia has ever been careful to guard the interests of the province, while attempting to be just to the foreign residents who had grievances to adjust. But unfortunately for him at the present time, perhaps, he has been a hard working member of the Famine Relief Association, and now he is not Commissioner in the Bureau of Foreign Affairs.

A USEFUL PEN.

His successor, Mr. H. L. Li, comes direct from the court at Loyang to fill the vacant office. Mr. Li is most eminently fitted by many gifts of mind and person to adorn this office, even though he is the nominee of the great Marshal. He was early educated in St. Paul's school in Hongkong and later went to England and America. He has been an attaché of the Waichiaopu in Peking, and also much interested in journalism. So keen has been his pen, with so much power to embarrass his political enemies, or at least the political enemies of his party, that he has suffered reprisals even to the extent of being incarcerated. It may have been for this particular gift that the Marshal invited him to Loyang to be his English secretary, and incidentally his propagandist in the English papers. It may not be too long a guess to say that whatever bears the index of "Chung Mei News Service" as coming from Honan and having nice things to say of Wu Pei-fu and his plans, has been from the pen of Mr. Li Hsin-ling. He has now come to take his post in Kaifeng, and we are very sure that his pleasant and winning personality will soon make him many friends both among Chinese and foreigners alike.

THE CIGARETTE TAX IN KIANGSU

Supported by Those Who Hope to Farm It: More Money for Weapons for Peking

According to the "Shunpao," nothing definite has yet been settled between the disputants regarding the proposed imposition of the special tax on the sale of cigarettes in Kiangsu. The attitude of the opposing dealers has been greatly weakened, and there are not a few among them who have been scrambling for the right of farming this tax in this or that district. Speaking of Shanghai, the difference in the treatment of dealers inside and outside the foreign settlements, seems to be the only knotty point that requires straightening out.

The "Shunpao" does not blame those who are outbidding each other for the farming of the tax, since it is only human nature to compete for a profitable job. What the paper objects to most is that the Ministry of Finance at Peking should be allowed, by taking advantage of this opportunity, to secure an enormous sum of money with which more arms may be purchased and more blood shed, as well as to destroy the Constitution which Peking itself has promulgated by appropriating to itself this business tax, which is fixed in that Constitution as belonging to local revenue and which is urgently needed for the development of local education. Cigarette dealers should not agree to Peking's proposition even for the sake of a profitable job, as in doing so, they would support the oppressors of our people instead of opposing them.

THE TAX ITSELF LIGHT.

The sale tax on cigarettes passed by the Kiangsu Assembly is fixed at 20 per cent. of the price which would be the lightest tobacco tax in the world, viewing it as a levy on luxuries. Dealers have really no ground to complain, and they are not complaining. The dispute is mainly sustained by dealers fighting for the farming right as already said, and they rely upon the big tobacco merchants to back them up. In China, tobacco merchants are almost all of foreign nationalities, native merchants forming only an infinitesimal part thereof. Thus, the cigarette business may be regarded as the foreigner's business. As foreigners have no genuine love for China, they would pay money to whomsoever could best protect them against the sale tax. They think that if the payee should spend such money on fire-arms and kill people, foreigners would be immune (from such killing). The tobacco merchants have promised to pay 2½ per cent. to the Central Government, and 2½ to local authorities. Based on this percentage, Kiangsu would benefit to the extent of $300,000 a year only, which would not go far in furthering educational work in the province. But, (and it is a great "but,") if other provinces should follow suit, the total sum available to Peking for the purchase of arms and slaughter of people would be very large indeed.

SECURITY FOR MORE LOANS.

And there might be another phase worth considering, viz, this 2½ per cent. tax might be pledged in advance for a big loan. As such a transaction, considering the handsome interest and fat discount it would yield, would be profitable, why should not the tobacco merchants be glad to accommodate Peking? As the tax which these merchants would have to pay could be kept to offset the interest and build up an amortization fund, no security would be demanded. With ample funds in hand, Peking could satiafy its thirst for the people's blood as much as it pleased.

QUARANTINE AND ISOLATION

Smallpox Patient at Amoy Made to go on to Hongkong: Another Case on Board the Result

It will be remembered that at the annual meeting of the Associated British Chambers of Commerce in China, held at Shanghai last month, a resolution was passed to the effect that

> "... in the opinion of this Conference the absence of quarantine regulations at Chefoo and other of the smaller ports constitutes an ever-present menace to their commercial interests. The Conference would, therefore, urge the importance of providing quarantine facilities in all ports or of issuing regulations providing that ships which have become infected, destined for such ports, must proceed to other ports in which quarantine facilities exist."

A case has been brought to our notice which gives point to the above resolution. A few weeks ago, after the Indo-China str. Yatshing had left Shanghai for Amoy and Hongkong, the third engineer was stricken with smallpox. When the vessel arrved at Amoy and the Port Doctor came on board, the case was brought to his notice and a natural request made that the patient be transferred ashore. This the Port Doctor, we are told, declined to have done or to permit, on the ground that although quarantine regulations obtained at the port, and that there was a special quarantine anchorage (at Cornwallis Stone, we believe) for infected ships, there were no suitable facilities ashore for the reception, isolation and treatment of cases such as smallpox. The result was that the patient had to be taken on the ship to Hongkong, and during the voyage between Amoy and the Crown Colony another case of smallpox occurred, the victim in this instance being tht captain of the vessel.

AN IMPOSSIBLE POSITION.

One can hardly blame the Port Doctor of Amoy for declining to allow ashore a case of very infectious disease if he is denied proper facilities for dealing with such a case, and his action in the matter is easily to be understood. The absence of very necessary isolation facilities, however, is a matter not so easily justified, especially if we consider the size of the port and the magnitude of the traffic that passes through it; for Amoy, while not one of the greatest ports of China, is by no means one of the smallest. We have no statistics for last year available, but from those for previous years it appears very probable that the ocean shipping using the port during 1923 was close to the 2½ million tons mark; that the trade of the port under the supervision of the Customs was something over Hk. Tls. 30,000,000; and that the number of passengers passing through the Maritime Customs averaged considerably more than 1,000 a day.

ONE CASE OF MANY.

And Amoy is but one case of many. There are numerous other ports in China, some larger than Amoy, some smaller, at which a state of affairs equally unsatisfactory prevails. The whole subject, as the Chamber of Commerce resolution indicated, is a broad one and should be dealt with on broad lines; but there should be little difficulty, in cases such as that of Amoy, in providing the requisite isolation accommodation. Practically every port in China has its official Port Doctor, and the provision of quarantine regulations and facilities, and accommodation for isolation of infectious diseases at those ports, should not be a problem insuperable, or even difficult. The expense involved would not be appreciably high, especially if weighed against the possible benefits, for—once more to quote the Chamber of Commerce resolution—"the absence of such regulations . . . constitutes an ever-present menace to their commercial interests." Now that the matter has officially been taken up by so weighty a body as the Association of British Chambers of Commerce in China, the necessity of something being done on the lines suggested possibly may be realized at Peking, and we can only hope that the matter will receive that early attention and be accorded that early action that its undoubted importance warrants.

CHINESE POST-OFFICE SAVINGS BANK

Review of the Fourth Year's Work and Statement of Accounts

Peking, Mar. 4.

The report on the working of the Chinese Post Office Savings Bank for the 11th year of Chung-Hua Min-Kuo (1922) states, inter alia:—

The period under review represents the fourth working year since the inauguration of the Post Office Savings Bank. In spite of unsettled conditions with consequent cessation or dislocation of communications, it is possible to record an expansion in almost every branch of savings bank work.

General conditions caused by the political situation were such as to render inadvisable the further opening of savings banks, the total number of which therefore remains at 334.

The impossibility of safely investing money locally made it necessary to remit surplus funds to the various ports and this is not only a difficult but also a dangerous procedure when the country is in a disturbed condition and bank charges abnomally high in consequence.

INCREASING POPULARITY.

In many districts the Post Office Savings Bank enjoys great popularity, while in a few it is not so well supported owing to the rate of interest being much lower than that offered by native banks and money shops. Nevertheless, it is felt that the Savings Bank system is becoming better known and more fully appreciated as time goes on, and this is borne out by figures given in statements attached to the report, which show steady advances over the previous year.

Owing to unsettled conditions everywhere, the public in general has abstained from inland investments and turned to the Savings Bank for the safe custody of their money, having come to realize the absolute security of deposits entrusted to this institution.

Deposits, in big dollars, during 1922 amounted to $4,125,539.30, an increase of 62 per cent. over 1921, and withdrawals to $3,021,074.14, an increase of 73 per cent. over 1921, while the amount due to depositors grew from $1,505,883.79 to $2,715,964.48, an increase of 80 per cent. over 1921. The number of depositors increased from 13,863 to 20,378.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

U. S. NAVAL AEROPLANES FOR CHINA

Part of a Large Consignment Landed in Manila

Manila, March 13.

Ninety-seven military aeroplanes are due to arrive at Manila on board the transport Meigs to-morrow. Some will be used by the new naval flying unit. It is unofficially reported that naval planes will later be sent to China.

The guards on military hangars at Camp Nichols, Manila, and Camp Stotsenburg, Pampanga, have been doubled following rumours that disaffected natives have planned to disable the planes there.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE CHINESE BANKERS' ASSOCIATIONS

Annual Meeting in April

Peking, Mar. 7.

The Chinese Bankers' Association of Peking has nominated a committee to make arrangements for the annual meeting of Chinese Bankers' Associations throughout the country, which is to be held in April this year in Peking in accordance with the resolution passed at the last meeting at Hankow on April 15 last.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WU PEI-FU'S BID FOR FIRST PLACE

The Real Capital Gradually Shifting from Peking to Loyang: Peking Now Only a Useful Screen Against Foreign Claims

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 6.

Political developments in Peking for some time past have been of little more than local interest and, as Loyang rises on the crest of a new wave, the importance of whatever happens in Peking in the way of purely domestic politics dwindles to insignificance. While the Gold Franc question hangs fire, while Sino-Russian negotiators seem to get nowhere, while diplomatic plaints to the Waichiaopu remain unanswered because Peking can in no instance make up its official mind what to do as long as it has no power to do anything, the best space in the Chinese press is devoted to speculations upon the alleged personal feud between Premier Sun Pao-chi and Minister of Finance Wang Ko-ming. This has to be printed very prominently to give anyone a thrill, because no one feels that it matters very much how the so-called Cabinet problem is solved. All interest is centred upon the provinces, with General Wu Pei-fu monopolizing the limelight as usual.

THE VICTORIES IN SZECHUAN.

There is every evidence that the Chihli leaders would all like to take speedy advantage of the victories in Szechuan to launch an overwhelming assault upon Kuangtung, and then possibly Yunnan, before any of Dr. Sun's potential allies have a chance to organize relief movements or create diversions. It is apparent to all that to do this on the proper scale and to make a lasting job of it, all the factions of the loosely knit Chihli group must stand solidly united on every front. To this end someone must be acknowledged the boss, and it must be clearly understood who will distribute power and profit when the campaign is over. There can be no doubt that General Wu Pei-fu is making a determined effort at this juncture to demonstrate that he is the only logical candidate for unchallenged leadership and that he is making no little progress in impressing this upon many minds. The assault which he is making in Shantung upon the strongholds of the so-called Paoting and Tientsin groups there is already half a victory. It will be complete when Governor Hsiung Ping-chi's resignation from the post of Kiaochao director is accepted and when Admiral Wen Shu-teh is formally appointed commander of the Pei Hai squadron. In spite of the most strenuous opposition from Tsao Kun's closest advisers; and in spite of opposition from Admiral Tu Shih-kuei, supported by Governor Chi Hsieh-yuan, it appears at this writing that Peking will be forced to comply. Such a victory would demonstrate beyond cavil that the de facto capital of most of China is now really Loyang and not Peking.

LOYANG'S THE ONLY POWER.

The usual tests of the genuine existence of a Government are its ability to collect money and control its disbursement, the ability to give orders to armies and have them taken, and the ability to shoulder and honourably discharge international obligations. According to none of these standards is Peking a Government. Loyang qualifies in the two respects of being able to collect and disburse money and of being able to order armies about. Loyang has not undertaken the burden of international obligations and will not do so until the Powers openly declare that Peking is a humbug and a farce.

Those who know General Wu Pei-fu and the trend of his thoughts, which always hark back to historical precedent, can have no doubt that when he chose Loyang as his headquarters he did so because historically it was a strategic centre and, under many dynasties, a great capital of the Middle Kingdom. There is no telling what Wu Pei-fu actually has in his head because this erratic little man, who seems to speak so frankly, has no confidants to whom he ever exposes his whole mind. But the writer believes it very safe to wager that, at the back of his mind, General Wu Pei-fu is determined to make Loyang the centre of administration for a new China and that he already regards Peking as nothing more than a wet blanket between himself and the smoke of foreign endeavour in China.

THE PETTINESSES OF PEKING.

Local affairs are really trifling. Nothing that can happen in the Cabinet can possibly have the slightest effect upon general conditions in China. Mr. Sun Pao-chi took office and accepted as his colleagues those indicated to President Tsao Kun by Wang Yu-chih. He counted upon getting Parliament's help to rid him of these persons so that he could quietly withdraw and give Dr. W. W. Yen his post with a Cabinet of his own choosing. Over the New Year Mr. Wang Yu-chih "fixed" Parliament in some way, so that all the investigations and impeachments of Christmas time are now forgotten. Having nothing else to stand on, Mr. Sun Pao-chi stands in the Chinese press as the one immovable opponent of the Gold Franc settlement, which in itself automatically marks him for extinction.

Mr. Wang Ko-ming has been so cautious in his movements, in his endeavour to avoid Parliamentary criticism, that he has reduced Peking to the lowest state of penury which this capital has yet experienced. He has developed eye trouble in such a serious form that he cannot possibly talk with the foreign diplomats nor negotiate even the smallest loans.

All of this is of course hopelessly irrelevant "piffle," having nothing whatever to do with the general state of China and with foreign trade in China, any more than Tsao Kun's indisposition has to do with the price of bonds.

At this juncture the really serious question is: How many Chihli leaders will loyally follow Wu Pei-fu's lead in the effort to reunite China by force? Would not folk like Chi Hsieh-yuan and Sun Ch'uan-fang much rather see China divided so that they can dicker for semi-independent places of their own? Will not Chang Tso-lin, who has no intention of invading China proper, make a feint towards Chihli to create a diversion and save Sun Yat-sen rather than see Wu Pei-fu dictating terms to all China from Loyang with no recalcitrant on the map but himself? Tang Chi-yao must follow much the same tactics as Chang Tso-lin. Unity under a Loyang dictator would suit his convenience no more than it would Manchuria's.

NO PROMISE OF PEACE.

There is no promise of peace in the present situation, though there may be some promise of the evolution of a responsible authority in Loyang if Wu Pei-fu wins out. This promise, however, holds out nothing to the foreigner; because the Powers would not think of recognizing Loyang as the capital of China, however big the monopoly of power centred there might be, and because Wu Pei-fu would not encourage such recognition, which would involve obligations, so long as he could preserve Peking as the afore-mentioned wet blanket between the accident and himself. His great game now is to have two centres in China, one taking all the power and collecting and spending all the money, namely Loyang, and the other assuming all the responsibilities and obligations with absolutely no power to discharge them, namely Peking. Foreign recognition of Peking means loyal concurrence in this scheme and cannot possibly mean anything else, whether to China or to the Powers.

Tuchun Hsiao Yao-nan has decided to build a motor road connecting Hwangchow and Macheh districts at a cost of $500,000. He has himself given $50,000 for the purpose, and the rest of the money will be raised in these two districts.

THE RELEASE OF FATHER VAN PLAET

Peking, Mar. 9.

According to semi-official sources the French and Belgian Legations have addressed notes to the Waichiaopu expressing their pleasure at the release of Father Van Plaet, but calling attention to the large number of bandits operating in Suiyuan and urging the Government to take drastic measures to suppress them.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DIVINATION IN HUNAN

A Chinese Planchette and What It Wrote

From Our Own Correspondent.

Siangtan, Hu., Mar. 4.

The writer has for many years been anxious to see and witness the working of the Taoist Planchette, but not until recently has an opportunity been offered. Three foreigners and as many Chinese were invited to be present at the working of this medium and we turned up just in the midst of some special work for a distant patient. Then every thing was cleared for us to have a chance to witness the working of the Planchette. It consists of a crooked stick with two prongs, and on the opposite end at the bottom a sharp stick which does the writing in the sand. Two men hold this pen, one holds one prong with his right hand and the second holds the other prong with his left hand and they together write what the god states in the sand. One man standing by announces the character and smooths over the sand in the box for the second and so on till the end. If was a put-up job for us and a commonplace story of being glad that the party had come to see. It was all so crude as to be uninteresting and so manifestly false as to be silly. Many are turning to this old Taoist medium for revelations of the spirit world in these days.

A SOLDIER RIOT.

The political situation does not seem to change here. We had a scare on the streets here recently. Word came from headquarters to disband some soldiers who had no guns, in the interests of economy, but more recently it has been learned that those being disbanded are not loyal to the powers that be and so these soldiers were armed in some way, and the leader refused to be disbanded and firing took place; one soldier was killed and several wounded. Several wards of the City were closed for hours and the shopkeepers all shut up for the day. It seems strange that there should be disbanding when there seems for months to have been such feverish activity in drilling and recruiting new troops.

IN GENERAL.

The large steamers are running to Siangtan and have been for several weeks. The water has been very high for this time of the year and many are predicting floods this year.

The new road between here and Hsiang Hsiang is being pushed with vigour and it is hoped that it will be open in a few months.

Mrs. Shambaugh of the Evangelical Mission has been taken to their hospital at Liling for treatment. She has been unwell for several months and this hospital having accommodation for foreigners, it is hoped will help to bring Mrs. Shambaugh back to health.

The Chinese New Year season has passed with the usual festivities and closed with a very interesting episode. On the night of the 16th there was an eclipse of the moon, which lasted for several hours and during those hours the whole town was one big uproar with gongs and bells and guns and firecrackers and such a continuous din as one scarcely ever hears even in this land of strange noises.

A SAD thing has happened to the Zoological Survey of India. It has lost the latter part of its collection of mollusca owing to the coolies on the staff drinking the alcohol from the preserving bottles! But it ought to have known. In China, at least, snake spirit is medicine and very valuable.

MILITARY MATTERS IN KUANGTUNG

Trouble Between Dr. Sun and Gen. Shen: Settlement of the Rice Strike

Canton, Mar. 1.

Mr. Yang Shu-chan, a Szechuanese and former chief private secretary to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, this morning assumed the post of Civil Governor of Kuangtung. At present some 32 of the 96 districts in the province may be considered under Dr. Sun's influence.

According to the vernacular press, there is likely again to be trouble between Dr. Sun Yat-sen and Gen. Shen Hung-ying, the Kuangsi leader who first joined and later turned against the Kuomintang leader early in 1923. A report is, however, in circulation that Gen. Shen may be persuaded to return to Dr. Sun's fold if he is promised the appointment of Commander-in-Chief of the troops in Kuangsi.

The national convention of the Kuomintang recently terminated without taking any action for the reorganization of the General Military Headquarters or for the nomination of Dr. Sun as "President of the Consolidated Government for the Reconstruction of China." For some reason the more able leaders of the Kuomintang have thought fit to sever their connexion with the Canton Government altogether. For the time being Dr. C. C. Wu is the only well-known Cantonese in high office in Canton, being Secretary of Foreign Affairs, but he has not been formally admitted to membership of the Kuomintang.

Mr. Wen Hung-fei, a Cantonese Senator in the Peking Parliament, recently arrived in Canton on a visit. He was promptly arrested, but later released after Dr. Sun's attention had been drawn to the fact that Mr. Wen came by appointment on a special mission.

The rice-shop employees' strike ended last week in a victory for the Labour Union, which secured an increase of 30 per cent. in wages for its members. Owing to the fact that the head of the union, Mr. Yen Yu-sheng, and his wife were assassinated while in bed one morning, many rice shop hands are now afraid of being union men and have given public notice of their resignation from membership.

ASSAULT ON A JOURNALIST.

Mr. Kuo Li-chuan, an editorial writer of a local daily paper, the "Yinchiangpao," was attacked with a cudgel at the Canton Press Club on February 29 by a member of the Kuomintang, Mr. Huang Ti-han. Mr. Huang charged Mr. Kuo with having cast reflexions on his party when reporting incidents in connexion with the settlement of the rice strike. The "Yinchiangpao," which is one of the largest dailies in Canton, has announced that its proprietor has ceased to be a member of the Kuomintang and will no longer be subject to the control of the party.

Dr. Sun has ordered the Hunanese troops to lead in the proposed offensive against Gen. Chen Chiung-ming and fighting is expected on the eastern front. As the telegraphs between Hongkong and Canton are still interrupted owing to the position of the rival troops along the Canton-Kowloon Railway, which is still closed to public traffic, true conditions on the eastern front cannot be ascertained, even apart from the censorship and the delay in the mails.

A REIGN OZ TERROR.

A reign of terror still exists in Canton and the district. The British gunboats in Canton waters are forced to take serious steps to deal with terrorists interfering with British launches or small steamers. Practically all small Chinese steamers have been under foreign registration in order to avoid their being commandeered for war service.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Chinese merchants who undertook the collection of the cigarette taxes for the Government in the Wu Han cities have already lost about $6,000 since the Bureau was established, says the "Central China Post." The Financial Commissioner now does not agree to take over this unprofitable organization from the merchants.

HUNANESE TROOPS IN CANTON

Making Nuisances of Themselves While Awaiting Transfer to East River

Canton, Feb. 27.

During the past week there has been little change in the military positions. The Hunanese troops of Gen. T'am Yin-hai have continued to arrive, and there are now in the City several thousands. They are to move out to the East River within seven days according to an order published by their C.-in-C., but it is doubtful whether they can be supplied with ammunition in time to allow of that. They are at present very short of ammunition and every effort is being made to increase the output of the various factories.

The behaviour of these troops in the City has left a lot to be desired. Their discipline is not good. There are daily instances where they create disturbances at places of amusement, such as the roof-gardens of the Sun and Sincere Companies and the theatres. They attempt to enter without tickets and, when remonstrated with, start a disturbance. Last Sunday at the Sun Company on the Bund about 200 of them tried to force their way in, and roughly handled the employees who tried to stop them. Assistance was sent for and a Hunanese officer with some armed men arrived and tried to get the men to disperse quietly, but apparently they took no notice of him, and went away through the Hotel Asia pulling up the stair carpets and doing much damage to windows etc.

A strenuous effort is being made to centralize the finances of the province and a certain amount of success seems to have attended them, but much remains to be done yet.

The strike of the rice coolies is now partially settled and the situation is somewhat better as the import of rice has been possible owing to the efforts of the Overseas Chinese Association, but it still remains for a complete settlement to be come to before normal conditions can be restored.

THE SOVIET AND JAPAN

Moscow Boycotting Vladivostok Japanese

Peking, Mar. 8.

M. Karakhan visited Mr. Yoshizawa yesterday and explained that the Moscow Central Executive Committee had recently resolved that there could be no de facto relations with any country which had not recognized the Soviet. Therefore, the Japanese Consul at Vladivostok could not be recognized. This and the other recent Russo-Japanese incidents were discussed. No decision was reached.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PHILIPPINES' LUMBER EXPORTS

Manila, P. I., Feb. 18.

Exports of lumber from the Philippine Islands more than doubled during 1923, due largely to the demand from Japan after the earthquake and fire of September, according to figures compiled by the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

In 1923, the lumber exports from the Philippines were 36,949,904 board feet, while in 1922 they amounted to only 18,285,000.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PHILIPPINE TRIBUTE TO DR. WOODROW WILSON

Baguio, P. I., Mar. 4.

The late ex-President Woodrow Wilson's name is to be perpetuated by the city council, which has just adopted a resolution changing the name of Kisad Road, one of the principal thoroughfares of this city, to Wilson Road.

The resolution says:—"His policy toward the Philippine Islands during his entire term of office was characterized by a genuine sympathy for the Filipino people and their ideals."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MODERNIZATION OF JAPAN'S ARMY

Need for Drastic Changes in Military Methods: Mission of Investigation

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tokio, Mar. 6.

The study of present day military equipment and the methods of financing its adoption form the basis of instructions given by the Minister of War to the special committee of General Staff offices, which has just been appointed to draft recommendations for the thorough modernization of Japan's army of 245,000 officers and men.

This committee, of which the chairman is Lieut.-Gen. Tsuno, the Vice-Minister of War, is not expected to submit its report before the end of the next fiscal year, that is, March 31, 1925, and during the interval between now and that date will survey the whole range of possibilities at home and abroad.

That there is urgent need for drastic change in the military machine of this country is frankly admitted on all sides. Japan has made no serious alteration in her methods of attack and defence since the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese war, it is pointed out; she took part in the Great War, it is true, but only in the very limited area of Tsingtao, and that before the experiences of the most modern forms of warfare were put into actual practice in the field. She has, therefore, fallen behind, and, if she is to take her place beside the great nations of the would, she must bring her fighting organization up to date.

NOT AN AGGRESSIVE MEASURE.

Emphasis, however, is laid on the fact that any changes that may be adopted as the result of the investigations now to be made most not be regarded as of an aggressive character. Japan merely desires, it is stated, to bring her army as regards standard of equipment and training into line with those of the other Great Powers, who learned their lessons at first hand during the world struggle of 1914-18.

Investigations abroad are to be conducted by the military mission, of which mention has already been made. This mission, headed by Lieut.-General Kamiji Wada, will spend six months in Europe and America, and will devote its study to such organizations as tank corps, motor transport, machine guns, and automatic rifles, in all of which Japanese army heads declare that they are disastrously deficient.

AIR FORCE TO BE DOUBLED.

Another branch of the army service that will engage the serious attention of the investigators is the air force, which at present consists of six flying squadrons, and which army officials insist should be doubled. Plans are already being considered for a five year programme of air force expansion.

Perhaps the most significant aspect of the inquiry is the fact that the investigations are to cover the methods of financing the changes.

It is certain that financial ability to meet the cost of remodelling the army enters very largely into the question, and it has been suggested that the modernization process will be carried out at the expense of further economies in army expenditure.

THE WASHINGTON PACT.

It will be remembered that as the result of the popular movement arising out of the decisions of the Washington Disarmament Conference, which emphasized the need for curtailment in military as well as naval expenditure, the army authorities in Japan agreed to and carried out a reduction of the army personnel by about 57,000 men, which was claimed to be a reduction by five divisions on a peace strength.

Now it is hinted that, in order to modernize the army, and to secure the necessary funds, the number of divisions may be reduced, which proposal is a noteworthy change in army policy, when it is borne in mind to what extent the authorities have gone in their advocacy of 21 divisions as the minimum strength of the army, and how a few years ago great efforts were made to increase the number of divisions for the defence of Korea. Alternative suggestions to the foregoing, which the investigating committee will have to consider, are: (1) the abolition of the infantry brigade in favour of the French plan of forming a division out of three infantry regiments, under one chief of infantry, and (2) the assignment of two battalions to each regiment.

THE SOLDIER'S PAY.

Another question which it is expected that the Committee will take up is that of the army personnel, and the possible increase of the pay of the private soldier. The private soldier has hitherto been in receipt of some 15 sen a day, which has necessitated his being subsidized while on service by the members of the family. This has naturally tended to make the army unpopular, and it is suggested that an improvement in the soldier's financial remuneration would enhance the standing of the army in the popular estimate. Here, however, again, it is mainly a question of finance.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A CHINESE LABOUR MANIFESTO

Address to Moscow and London on Evils of Militarists in China and Treachery of Intellectuals and Socialists

We have received from the signatories copies of letters published below which have been addressed to the Soviet Government in Moscow and the British Labour Cabinet. We offer no opinion on their contents, which we print for purposes of interest. But the number of organizations signing the letters is imposing. We have no idea of the numbers of workmen they include.

The Commissaries of Soviet Russia

c/o M. Karakhan,
Soviet Envoy in China

DEAR SIRS,—Since the sad news of M. Lenin's decease was made public, the people all over the world have been plunged into profound sorrow, especially the class of people who are living under heavy oppression. The thought, spirit, and achievement of M. Lenin not only have obtained political rights for the oppressed class of your country, but also have greatly helped the weak peoples of the world in their protesting for their rights. How unfortunate it is to mankind that he should be suddenly overtaken by death when his work is not yet complete!

The militarist government in our country has become tyrannical to the extreme. The education of the workmen is still in its tender infancy. Because of this, the labourers have to suffer under the militarists' suppression, in addition to the capitalists' exploitation. Moreover, all the outcast politicians and some of the educated class who call themselves socialists take the opportunity of the labour movement to show their apparent kindness to the workmen but carry out practically their plans for enriching themselves. From the sacrifice of Hwang-Nai and Pang-Jen-Chuan on January 7, 1922, and the tragedy of the P.H.R. workers on February 7, 1923, we can see clearly the atrocity of militarists combined with capitalists, and underhand policy of the false socialists. It is enough to break one's heart in telling this.

Because the labourers of our country are situated in this state of oppression and exploitation, they respect and even worship the more, M. Lenin, who has really fought for the well-being of the oppressed class. Now that he is no more, we lose a great man to help us resist oppression. Our sorrow, therefore, is more and deeper than can be put down in words.

We hope your country will follow the spirit of M. Lenin and continue to develop your principles. M. Lenin has sympathized with the claim for freedom of the Oriental nations. We hope that you will cherish this sympathy and promote the relation between your country and the Orient.

Very truly yours,

Their Excellencies
The Secretaries of State of Great Britain
London, England

HONOURABLE SIRS,—Since the formation of your Cabinet, the world has seemed to receive a shock! Capitalism though still powerful and dominant is approaching its day of downfall. The establishment of Soviet Government in Russia has dealt the first blow to capitalism. What will be the influence which your recent success will exercise over the future, it is certainly impossible to foresee; but there is clearly proved again the tendency for all who uphold the cause of labourers to get the upper hand in the society of today. Both your Cabinet and the Soviet Government in Russia are the pioneers of the world of labourers, to whom we ought to show proper sympathy and support. As part of the world-labourers, we hereby express our feeling toward your success.

We do not want to pay you empty compliments. We want to put hope in the place of compliments. First, let us report to you our present situation and then express our hope.

The little development of the Chinese labour movement is a recent affair. In the history of the world labour-movement, it is quite young. In regard to us labourers, our education is very scanty and our organization weak, for which we are very sorry. But in present China, our movement cannot but prove to be a specially difficult one, and our oppressing enemies are specially numerous.

Not to mention the mercilessness of the capitalists and the cruelty of the militarists and government officials, our new and most detestable enemies are those outcast politicians and rascally scholars. They call themselves by the respectable name of socialists, but take the opportunity offered by labour movement to realize their disreputable and dangerous plots for attaining their selfish aims. Apparently they say they are helping us labourers, but in fact they are using us as a cat's paw. They have nothing in view but to cheat and tempt us, and, by means of exploitation, further their own personal power and increase the chance of profiting themselves. As animals that have made preying on us their business of life, the so-called socialists are not a little bit less merciless than the capitalists and government officials. They only know how to harm us.

The martyrdom of Hwang Nai and Pang Jan-chuan on January 7, 1923, and the tragedy of P.H.R. Workers on February 7, 1923, are memorable events in which Chinese militarists and capitalists combined to deal with us with iron hands, and in which the false socialists were also revealed. Under these circumstances, what a hard time we are having!

Upon this, we very earnestly hope that you will understand our present situation and help us to go on. As we firmly believe you will offer us help, we, with the warmest sympathy, herewith congratulate you.

(Signed as in the first letter.)

AMERICA AND JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

New York, Mar. 10.

The Japanese Minister, Mr. Hanihara, addressing the Japan Society to-day, expressed pleasure at the thought that the United States and Japan were located in the same ocean. He thanked the Americans for their friendliness in sending relief to the earthquake sufferers and subscribing to the last Japanese loan. The only issue of importance outstanding was the immigration problem, the solution of which was more particularly a matter of the elementary principles of international intercourse—in other words, whether Japan as a nation was entitled to the respect and consideration accorded by other powers in their dealings with each other. The United States had perfect right to restrict immigration, but it should be done in a manner which did not discriminate against Japan.—Reuter's American Service.

NO DECLINE OF MORALITY

Chinese Press Believes Merchants Are Honest: Only Individual Failures

The following interesting Chinese press comment on Sir Ronald Macleay's speech at the opening of the "North-China Daily News" building appears in the Peking papers.

Referring to what Sir Ronald described as the partial responsibility of foreigners for the introduction of modern reforms and theories into this country, which were mainly responsible for the 1911 Revolution in the Wu Han cities, the majority of the vernacular newspapers highly eulogized the British Minister for his sensible utterances; but the "Shih Pao" and other journals caution the Chinese authorities against further procrastination in bringing about political reunification of China simply because they might mistake the friendly speech as partial approval of, or support to, their existing inconsistent and half-hearted efforts to bring about the unity of the Republic through peaceful measures.

With regard to the resolution of the British Chamber of Commerce Conference about the alleged decline of the morality of the Chinese commercial people and their inability to observe agreements and contracts in Tientsin and other Treaty ports the papers are of the opinion that there is no decline of the commercial morale on the part of the Chinese merchants, especially, those who have business intercourse with foreigners. The "Min-kuo Pao" admits that on account of extreme financial pressure in recent years, individual cases have been reported of the failure of Chinese merchants to observe their contractual obligations with foreign firms; but the paper repudiates the idea that the Tientsin cotton disputes can be regarded as the actual moral decline of the Chinese traders as a whole. But the paper urges the Chinese merchants always to live up to their obligations.

HONGKONG MILITARY LANDS TRANSFER

Safeguarding Service Interests

London, Mar. 6.

Replying to a question in the House of Commons to-day Mr. William Graham, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, stated that negotiations were proceeding between the War Office and the Hongkong Government for the exchange of properties there, including the existing parade ground and the military hospital. If and when a settlement of this question was reached, the question of the hospital accommodation required by the Navy and Army would be reconsidered.—Reuter.

Hongkong, March 13.

The Legislative Council to-day approved, under the protest of the unofficial members, Sir John Oakley's award regarding military lands.

The senior unofficial member, protesting, stated that the award was arbitrary and irregular and suggested that the matter should be referred for arbitration to Lord Parmoor.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Note: Under the award the Colonial Government agrees to take over the lands within 10 years at Sir John Oakley's valuation, which involves payment to the Army Council of $16,983,512.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

AEROPLANE CRASH AT CHITA

Red Army Loses One of Its Leading Pilots

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Feb. 29.

At Chita recently, Commandant Koshelenko of the Aero Section, 5th Red Army lost his life in an aeroplane fatality. The accident happened in the afternoon at 2.15. The pilot was flying over the town at an altitude of 6,000 feet when the machine suddenly plunged to earth.

A technical commission which sat recently decided that the accident has not been caused by engine trouble. It is thought that the aviator had a heart attack or fainted.

The deceased was considered to be one of the best aviators in the Soviet Army, on the outbreak of the war he was studying at the Moscow Aero School, and was one of a number of pupils sent to France in 1917 to study military aeronautics. Following the Russian coup d'etat in 1917 all Russians attending the French Army Aero School were asked to join the French Army. He agreed to serve with the French Colonial troops in Africa. In 1918 he attempted to fly from Nice to Tunis, but his machine came down in the Mediterranean. Subsequently after returning to Vladivostok after the war he took part in Red Army operations against Merkuloff troops at Habarovsk.

SHENSI BRIGANDS ACTIVE

Routed by Shansi Troops in Attempt to Cross Yellow River

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiangchow, Sha., Feb. 28.

Two desperate attacks have been made by bandits to invade Shansi within the last fortnight. In one case the invaders came from Shensi crossing the Yellow River near Tsikeo, at the western end of the Fenchow motor road. About same date, 15th of the first moon, an encounter took place with Shansi troops at the south-east corner of the province some little distance from the Honan terminus of the Taotsing line. In both cases the attack was successfully defeated and the enemy driven off with loss.

Shensi or Honan tufei will be well-advised to "hold off," for it is perfectly clear that Governor Yen and his colleagues are not going to be caught napping.

PHILIPPINES' FORTIFIED ZONE

Japanese Steamers' Breaches of Regulations

Manila, Mar. 11.

The Customs have ordered the detention of the Itsukushima Maru on its next call at Manila owing to alleged violation of harbour regulations by passing close in by the Corregidor fortified zone in spite of signals from Fort Mills at Corregidor forbidding her. This is said to be the third case of violation regarding the fortified area by foreign ships within a short period. Governor-General Wood is taking up the Itsukushima Maru and other cases with Washington and a protest to Tokio is expected.—Reuter's. Pacific Sevice.

A NEW SOVIET ENVOY TO MONGOLIA

Ceremonious Reception and Flowery Speeches by Red Mongols: Moscow's Professions of Beneficence: But Careful Emphasis: on Fact That Mongolia is not Independent

The following is a translation from the "Zarya" of Urga. In reading, careful allowance should be made for the paper's pro-Bolshevist nature and its highflown statements accordingly be discounted.

On January 3, Comrade Alexei Vasilieff, presented his credentials to the Mongolian Government, these were accepted by Tseren Georgie, the Mongolian Prime Minister.

There was a parade of the troops and students of the Military School, in the entrance to the Government House stood members of the local People's Party and the Union of Youth. The Minister, who was accompanied by his staff and the Consul, was saluted by the guard of honour and received to the strains of the "International", played by the Mongolian Military Orchestra. After inspecting the guard of honour the Minister complimented the Young Army and gave them the best wishes of their elder sister the Red Army.

SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER.

The procedure of presenting the Credentials was conducted with the greatest solemnity. In the Cabinet Room were the Premier, Tseren Georgie, Acting Premier, Dan Zan, Minister of War, Rinchino, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Amour. The text of the Credentials was read and received standing.

Replying to the good wishes of the Russian Government, Tseren Georgie said that in 1919 the Mongols lost their automony and were under the heel of Chinese militarism, they also lost the rights granted them by the Kiachta Tripartite Agreement. In 1920 they suffered from the Whites and Baron Ungern. Mongolia found a saviour in the People's Party who eventually freed the country from the Chinese and Ungern and with the help of the Soviet, Mongolia became free. They entered into treaties with the Soviet which were far more generous and equitable than those of the old Tsarist régime, which they replaced. Even so, it was difficult to persuade the masses of the Justice of the Soviet. Further, continued Tseren Georgie, there were a number of Russian citizens who accused the Government of anti-Russian prejudices, but this was not the case. The arrival of the new Minister, the first to arrive from any country, would settle all misapprehensions and he hoped that the relations between the two people would be more cordial in the future.

VASILIEFF'S REPLY.

In his own words, Comrade Vasilieff emphasized the wording of the Credentials, which spoke of sincere feeling and friendship, without ulterior motives, of the Soviet for Mongolia, and said that Russia was ever ready and willing to help her neighbours on the path to freedom and civilization. Mutual friendship in outside provinces must bring about normal conditions in economic spheres. The ratification of the Russo-Mongol Bank project and the Russo-Mongol Telegraph Convention, which he brought with him from Moscow were the first steps towards a prosperous future which would be of mutual benefit. The Soviet fulfils its promises always. Therefore it was necessary, in perfect frankness, to emphasize that Soviet Russia is at present surrounded by reactionary States and she is forced to take these circumstances into account. On her part, Mongolia must recognize that it is often necessary to fall back on the second line of defence, and present circumstances demand that Mongolia should foster immeasurable enthusiasm amongst her peoples for the new régime. In closing Vasilieff impressed upon the Mongolian Government the unchanging friendship of the workers of Russia for the workers of Mongolia. Not one step in Mongolia would the Soviet take without the permission and authority of the Mongolia Government.

INTERVIEW WITH VASILIEFF

The new Minister from the Soviet Government to Urga gave an interview to a representative of the Rosta News Agency and also one from the local newspaper, "Zarya", in which he gave a short sketch of his life as well as his views on the Far Eastern situation. He is a true Muscovite, having been born, educated and imprisoned in Moscow. On finishing Preparatory School he went to the university to stuy medicine but left this for law. For his part in the students' demonstration in 1899 he was excluded from the University and deported. He continued his studies in Berlin, in law and philosophy. In 1902 he returned to Russia but was arrested as a "political" and sent to Saratoff. From there he again returned to Moscow to sit for a State examination and became articled to an advocate. Comrade Vasilieff joined that young body of advocates who were always working in the interests of the proletariat and who formed the nucleus of the Social-Democratic Party which has produced such men as Kursky, the present Minister of Justice in Soviet Russia. It was in 1904 that Vasilieff joined the Social-Democrats and accepted the Bolshevist principles. He had already spent two years in prison and a similar period in exile in Saratoff and Tver. In 1905 he was a member of the Moscow Bolshevist Committee and was responsible for their military disorders in memory of the "Decembrists", when for the first time in history, the streets of Moscow were barricaded. Here it might be mentioned that the first steps in revolution were taken by the Moscow garrison and that garrison was under the direction of Comrade Vasilieff. After the October Revolution (1917) Vasilieff occupied a responsible position as Assistant Commissar of the Moscow Military Command. He was also a member of the Highest Tribunal in Russia. In recent times he was Soviet Minister of Justice in the Turkestan Republic, and from this position, after three months vacation, he came to his present post, as Minister Plenipotentiary in Urga.

RUSSIA AND MONGOLIA.

In answer to questions on the relations between the two countries, Vasilieff said, "The present mutual understanding between the two nations leaves nothing to be desired." The Mongol Government was sincerely in accord with the ideals of the First Workers Republic and those ideals which the Soviet was propagating amongst Asian peoples. The bonds of union between Mongolia and Russia were greatly strengthened by their commercial relations and the Russo-Mongol Telegraph Convention has further tied the knot more securely. On the soil of the economical re-birth of Mongolia will be raised the home of her cultural and progressive regeneration. The farther Mongolia travels along the road to prosperity the greater will be the reforms in her fiscal, judiciary and civilizing policies, and the easier will it become for the two nations to collaborate. In all these efforts towards reform Mongolia can count upon the energetic support of the Soviet. Justice, however, demands that it should be said that, under present circumstances, Russian citizens are less favourably treated than those of some other nations. This is not normal, and should be immediately rectified. He hoped for the formation of an improved code of conditions which will state more clearly the rights of Russian living and trading in Mongolia and on the frontier which extends for several thousands of versts. All this will help to smooth out and improve conditions to the mutual advantage of Russia and Mongolia.

MONGOLIA AND CHINA.

Vasilieff was then asked for his personal views on the situation between Russia, China and Mongolia. In this affair, he said, the first thing to explain is our national political policy which is to establish complete freedom and real friendship and which is directed to these ends by the International Committee of Universal Union of Peasants and Workers. We have always stood for and still stand for the self-determination of small nationalities and peoples. But at the same time, we Bolsheviks, the professors of the Marxist doctrine, do not hide in the ground and we do not shut our eyes to our surroundings. In my speech on the occasion of presenting the credentials, I drew the attention of the Mongolian Government to the fact that we are living in a period of reaction. This situation, not of our own evoking, prevents us from making an energetic advance, it even causes us to withdraw to our second line of defence. Applying this to the interests raised by your question, I will say definitely, that the present conditions do not permit of us speaking or referring to the "independence" of Mongolia, the only thing we can refer to is "automony" for your country. But, here it is important to emphasize that the difference between the two is more visionary than real. For example, China is completely independent in theory, but actually she is controlled by foreign financiers and internal unrest. All Chinese financial measures are controlled by representative of the Entente. Chicherin only spoke the truth, when he used the classical example of Bulgaria, which in 1909 was under the sovereignty of Turkey, yet actually she was far more free then than now. Too much stress is laid upon the external signs of independence: what should be considered, are the actual conditions under which you live, and if you make the necessary preparation, you can live much more free and unmolested under Automony that under Independence. The thing for your country to do is to make itself so strong financially, economically and militarily that you will be able to speak to all nations as an equal, then even if you only have automony, yet your allegiance will be purely nominal. You should be strong enough to insist on being allowed to go your own way along the road to progress and freedom.

There is one thing which I cannot emphasize too strongly, concluded Vasilieff, and that is the words of the Soviet Minister for Foreign Affairs, Comrade Chicherin, when he said Good-bye to me in Moscow: "Kindly inform the Mongolian Government, from me that Russia has done nothing, and will do nothing, behind their back. The Mongolian people will be the sole arbiters of their fate and future standing."

RAILWAY ROBBERIES IN RUSSIA

Severe Sentences on Principal Culprits but Actual Leader Still at Large

Riga, Mar. 9.

It is reported from Minsk that 22 of a body of well-equipped bandits, including three women, who have carried out a series of robberies on the railways, have been tried and condemned to death. Eight have been sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment and 27 to shorter terms, while eighteen have been agquitted. The band, which was led by Ataman Yegor Monich, also terrorized the local population and carried out pogroms of Jews. The leader has escaped across the frontier.—Reuter.

AMERICAN AIR STATIONS IN MANILA

Manila, P. I., Feb. 18.

The first navy air unit installed in the Philippine Islands has just arrived from the United States on the navy transport Vega. It consists of 10 officers, 43 enlisted men and six seaplanes, under the command of Lt.-Cdr. C. S. Keller. Headquarters of the unit will be aboard the old warship Ajax, which is moored at the Cavite naval station.

The United States now has air stations at Camp Nichols, just outside Manila, Corregidor, Camp Stotsenburg and Cavite.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WILL KORNILOFF BE EXECUTED?

The Decree of Amnesty: General Opinion His Chances of Escape Are Small

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Feb. 28.

There is considerable speculation among residents here as to whether Gen. Korniloff will be executed or not, now that the appeal he made in the High Court has been dismissed. His lawyer, Mr. A. A. Widder who has put up a very spirited deferce, is taking the case to the Senate at Peking, as a last measure. It will be remembered that some time ago the President of China signed a decree of amnesty to be extended to Russian prisoners incarcerated in Chinese prisons and that the prison authorities in the railway area were requested by the Court here to make full lists of all Russians, which has been duly done, with Korniloff's name included. Since the extreme penalty passed on Korniloff has now been confirmed by the High Court a representative of the "Novosti Zhizni" called on the Public Prosecutor and was told that according to the Constitution of China the prerogative of amnesty belongs to Parliament, but that the President has authority to mitigate sentences in individual and special cases.

The decree of amnesty has a long history. It was in the ninth year of the Chinese Republic when the Minister of Justice moved the question of the necessity of mitigating the punishment of convicted criminals whose sentence was too severe for the comparatively slight offences that had been committed. This forms the basis of the decree recently issued by the President. According to the actual meaning or sense of the decree it shall be for the public prosecutor of the Three Eastern Provinces Special Area to go over the lists of the convicted and solicit mitigation of punishment for those whose offences do not represent too grave a menace towards public peace.

According to the opinion of this Court official but a very small proportion of the convicted Russians are likely to obtain a reduction of their punishments, since the Courts of Justice in the Three Eastern Provinces Special Area only apply a very severe sentence in very exceptional cases. According to the general opinion of well-informed Chinese the chances that Korniloff will not suffer the death penalty are but small. He has a sister in Moscow in Government employ, who is doing all what she can, and it may be the Soviet representative will intercede on the behalf of Korniloff.

CONGESTED CHINESE COURTS.

The Chief Justice of the High Court of the Special Railway Area has recently given for publication statistics concerning the working of the Chinese courts in this territory during the past year 1923. The figures compiled are of considerable interest.

In the special Area Law Courts there have been 11,017 civil and criminal cases heard during the year, whilst final decisions were given in 1,502 criminal trial and 7,513 civil suits.

The District Court decided 3,346 civil cases and pronounced judgment on 620 criminal trials, the corresponding figures for the High Court being 219 criminal and 474 civil cases.

The Lower Court attached to the District Court brought to a close during the same period, 2696 civil and 237 criminal cases.

The Lower Provincial Courts situated along the railway decided 997 civil cases and tried 426 criminal cases.

Notwithstanding the intensity of the work, the number of cases pending has slightly increased at the beginning of the year 1924. On January 1, 1923 the pending cases numbered 1513 civil and 91 criminal. During the year were registered a further 7,860 civil and 1535 criminal cases, thus leaving at the beginning of the current year 1,840 civil and 124 criminal cases still pending.

RUSSIANS MURDERED BY HUNGHUTZE

Villages Sacked in Ussori Region: More Outlawry in Manchuria

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Feb. 29

Pogranitchnaya residents are alarmed at the activities of a dangerous band of Hunghutze, said to be 600 strong, who have lately pillaged Russian villages and Cossack stanitzia between Lake Hanka and the Manchurian frontier.

Reports state that the brigands entered Russian territory north of Pogranitchnaya, raided the village of Konissarovskaya, which was sacked, and afterwards destroyed by fire. The peasants were illtreated and some did not escape with their lives.

The village of Jarikova met a similar fate, but news of the bandits' activities by this time had reached the authorities, who despatched a strong Red detachment against the marauders. Red troops encountered the Hunghutze at Nesterovka, which was surrounded by the soldiers, who opened fire on the bandits. Up to the present Pogranitchnaya has not yet heard how the fight went, but it would seem that only a portion of the enemy were in the village at the time. Advices from Grodekovo indicate that the rest of them were in the neighbourhood of Novo Alexievsk, about 12 versts from Pogranitchnaya and eight from Grodekovo.

As the bandits are travelling in a southerly direction it seems unlikely that they will enter the frontier town of Pogranitchnaya, especially as there is a strong garrison there, including mountain guns and an armoured train. The railway workers have none the less appealed to the C. E. R. Administration for further protection.

It is predicted that the horde will proceed to territory south of Sanchiakou, where there is little chance of their meeting with resistance.

According to Russians, the Hunghutze were wearing Chinese military uniforms and carrying service weapons. If this is so, no doubt the Russians will formally protest against Chinese regulars trespassing in Russian territory.

So far there is no official news of the affair.

General Massacre Prevented by Cheka Guards

Riga, Mar. 9.

The Soviet press publishes reports from Vladivostok with regard to an attack on the East-Siberian village of Kommisarovka on February 20 by 300 Hunghutze, who, it is alleged, were reinforced by Chinese soldiers from the garrison of Mishiyan. The village was burnt and men were killed and women outraged.

The Cheka guards prevented massacre of the whole population, and killed 20 bandits. The remainder plundered two more villages. The Russian frontier guards subsequently killed 20 more bandits.

It is alleged that the band was commanded by a Chinese officer called "Siasava." The Band was well-equipped and had four field-guns and an ambulance.—Reuter.

WOMEN STUDENTS IN THE PHILIPPINES

Manila, Mar. 4.

Women are to be admitted as students in the University of Santo Tomas beginning with the school year of 1924-1925, it is announced. The change in the University's policy was recently approved by the Pope and the ecclesiastic officials have arranged to admit young women into the Institution's College of Pharmacy at the opening of the next school year.

The University of Santo Tomas was founded more than 300 years ago and is the oldest university under the American flag.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WU PEI-FU AND CIVIL POWER

Kaifeng Commissioner of Foreign Affairs Now Sent to Loyang

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kaifeng, Ho., Mar. 10.

The new Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Li Hsin-ling is spending his time in Loyang, with the first secretary in charge of the Bureau here. It would seem that the great Marshal is determined to concentrate all power in the little western city. Those offices that carry little real power with them are left here in the real capital. The stories that are being repeated about Mr. Li, that he was mixed up in some oil company scandal and consequent ly spent time in prison, are not believed here.

I suggested in my last letter that Mr. Li had spent some time in prison as a political prisoner, on account of his journalistic feats against the Anfu clique, and that is the correct story of his imprisonment.

FAMINE PREVENTION.

Mr. O. J. Todd, the consulting engineer of the Famine Relief Commission is now in the district. He and his party left last Saturday for Lanfeng and the portion of the Yellow River on which the "tree retard" work of reclamation was attempted. He will come back to Kaifeng to-day and will soon start for Shensi to consider suggestions for a very big irrigation work in that province. If his approval is given the Relief Commission will no doubt finance the scheme.

The Right Rev. W. C. White, of the Canadian Church Mission in this province, who has been so active in Famine Relief for many years now, is to leave to-day for Canton, and attend the General Synod of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Huei. He will not return to Kaifeng, but will proceed to Canada for his furlough and a well earned rest.

SPRING IS COME.

Spring is so far advanced that the buds are beginning to swell, and the jasmine are all in bloom.

The winter has been a singularly mild one for Honan. There has been no snow; and no time has the ice been more than the thickness of a finger through.

The minds of many have already been exercised over the dryness of the spring, for no rain has fallen. For the last few days there has been no meat on the market, on account of an order against taking life of animals till the drought should be broken. I rejoice to say that a very gentle rain feel throughout the past night. It is dark and sullen again to-day and the rain may start again. It is devoutely to be hoped that there may be sufficient to allay the dread of gaunt famine.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE

Enormous Advance in Imports

Tokio, Mar. 5.

The foreign trade of Japan for the month of February shows an excess of imports over exports to the amount of Y. 186,494,000. Exports during the month under review amounted to Y. 104,792,000 while imports reached the total of Y. 291,286,000.

The foreign trade of the Empire for the first two months of this year has totalled Y. 721,021,000, of which sum Y. 505,496,000 represents imports and Y. 215,525,000 exports.

From these figures it will be noted that the excess of imports reached this year is Y. 289,971,000. Compared with the first two months of 1923, exports have decreased by Y. 2,662,000, while imports have made the enormous advance of Y.200,315,000.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Mar. 9.—Gen. Li Yao-nan, who three or four years ago was acting Tuchun of Kuangtung and exercised military influence on the West River, is reported to have arrived at Loyang and it is believed he will also come to Peking in order to discuss the situation at Canton.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SHANGHAI NEWS

AN ACTOR-MANAGER IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. R. B. Salisbury's Varied Career: Medicine, the Stage, the Air Force and Once More the Stage: The Versatile Chief of the "Quaints"

The subject of this sketch affords as much remarkable matter as we have had the privilege of publishing for a long time. To-day he is the most successful theatrical manager visiting the Far East, yet rather more than a score of years ago, he was in such a different capacity that his occupation to-day would hardly have been considered possible. Fortunate accidents, however, happen, and a man trained in medicine and dentistry is to-day offering to the Far East the very things its residents want in the way of amusement.

Mr. R. B. Salisbury, of "Quaints" fame, was brought up to the medical profession and for a number of years he pursued it. He selected dentistry as his particular branch, and the openings in this line took him to South Africa. There he seemed to be assured of a lucrative practice, but Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's policy intervened. The British troops were withdrawn from South Africa, and a practice up to that time worth thousands to himself and his chief practically went west. He then threw in his hand at dentistry, and turned to the stage. He had been in amateur theatricals once or twice before but not enough to convince him that he was cut out for the job. Nevertheless he took whatever chances were coming.

EARLY EFFORTS.

His first job was with the Woods-Williamson Company in South Africa, and within a fortnight he had been appointed manager of another company. Success attended him in these ventures, and he contributed greatly to theatrical enterprise at the Cape. He was the first man there to undertake productions of Ibsen, Bernard Shaw and Somerset Maugham.

After this Mr. Salisbury returned Home, and set about the work which we know so well now. Work in London offers of course, the great prizes of the profession to bold venturers, but once a man has been abroad, especially resident in another continent, there is the inevitable call of "furreign parts." Mr. Salisbury confesses to having been bitten by the "travel bug" badly. So it was that after successfully managing a London company from 1912 onwards, he decided in 1914 to see the Far East. India and China appealed to him, and although he had been successful in the City and was under no compulsion to find fresh fields he resolved to see what the East and Far East offered.

FIRST EASTERN TRIP.

Selecting a company he came East, but during his travels in 1914 war broke out. About this time he was approaching China with his "Quaints," and there was a feeling that a theatrical company should not in any sense of the word give its mixed audiences anything in the nature of political or war comments. Mr. Salisbury broke this rule at Shanghai with an "All-British Night," when the audience practically took the burden of entertainment on its own shoulders and seldom has anything so furiously popular been seen. When he returned from Japan and found he could secure the Lyceum Theatre for one night, a Saturday, he learned that within three hours of announcing his return he was booked up.

Mr. Salisbury's hope was now to proceed Home as quickly as possible, as there was bigger work for members of the company to do than the entertainment of Far Eastern audiences. Arrived back in London, he had the mortification to find that the War Office would not have him in any capacity. Mr. Salisbury is slightly built and of rather diminutive stature, and the idea in those days was that soldiers should be big hefty men. There was, accordingly, nothing to do but to get to work again, and in London he took the Vaudeville Theatre, where he introduced the "intimate" revue. The Gatti's who owned the theatre wanted a chorus of 12 girls, whereas Mr. Salisbury, who knows exactly what he wants on the stage, had no idea that such a number was called for. He compromised, however, by selecting the smallest and most petite girls he could find, and events proved him to be correct.

Now came the "Pedlar of Dreams," which proved an instant success. On the occasion of its 70th performance Mr. Salisbury received a notification from the War Office that they would take him as a "Tommy," and an end was put to this venture.

IN THE AIR FORCE.

This was on a Saturday. Mr. Salisbury quickly got into touch with Mr. André Charlot, then at the Playhouse, and by the Monday the latter had taken over the Vaudeville. For a second time Mr. Salisbury saw hopes of a fortune vanish into thin air, the first having been on the Eastern tour which had been extraordinarily successful.

AFTER THE WAR.

Mr. Salisbury thus joined the infantry, but within a short period secured a commission in the Royal Air Force, in which he became a pilot. It happened that towards the end of the war Great Britain was becoming short of medical men of whatever branch, and in 1918 Mr. Salisbury was seconded from the Air Force to a London hospital where once more he took up the practice of dentistry. He was employed on this work until the conclusion of the war left him free to bring the "Quaints" into being again.

Mr. Salisbury then joined Mr. Dion Boucicault, and subsequently was stage director for the duration of a couple of plays at the Criterion. Then he decided to come out East again, and has since been here three times with his "Qaints," with intervals occupied in playing in London and the Provinces.

While Mr. Salisbury says that he comes out to the East because he likes it, there is another side to his penchant. When he runs companies at Home he makes more money, not having the same expenses, but to have to play the same part for months, as others do, fails to appeal to him. In fact he says it would drive him crazy.

At the same time he realizes fully the difficulties of playing to Far Eastern audiences. Here one plays to what is practically a West-end audience. At least half the people have seen the shows when they were at Home only last year, and the other half will see them next year, and all have a good idea of what they should be. And a company has no pit and gallery to carry off a production as would be the case at Home. All of which increases the difficulties with which companies here have to contend against.

Mr. Salisbury says that a Shanghai audience is particularly quick to appreciate a joke. The people are worth while taking the trouble to please for the very good reason that if they are not pleased they simply stay away from the theatre. Withal they are a cheery crowd, although always complaining of being hard up, the Shanghai slogan, to quote Ranger Gull, apparently being, "In the midst of life we are in debt; in fact we are here to-day and gone to-morrow."

MR. W. C. Cassels, who has been acting British Consul at Kiukiang since Mr. C. D. Smith was granted sick leave in October last, arrived in Shanghai on March 8. Mr. and Mrs. Cassels and family are now staying in the Consulate as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Moss. Mr. J. B. Affleck has been appointed acting British Consul at Kiukiang and Mr. Cassels is proceeding on the 15th inst ant to Swatow as Vice-Consul.

TRAVELLING HOME VIA SIBERIA

Some Initial Difficulties to be Overcome before the Actual Start is Made

We have of late received a number of inquiries as to how one should proceed in making arrangements to go Home viâ Siberia, a once popular and expeditious trip which nowadays the Soviet representatives do not seem disposed to encourage. This we are left to presume, judging from available information as to the formalities required of a prospective passenger.

We understand that callers at the Soviet office in Ezra Building, upon stating that they require to proceed to Europe viâ Siberia, are presented with a number of forms to be filled up. Here are some of the questions set:

Name
Age
Occupation
Reasons for proceeding to Russia (admittedly a difficult question to answer).
Does the applicant speak Russian?
Has he any friends in that country, if so state name, age, occupation, place of residence.
Has applicant served in any military capacity against Russia, as a conscript or otherwise?
Has applicant been in Russia before?

These are only a few of the questions put, and the entire collection has to be answered in two sets of papers. Of the first, the applicant is required to furnish five copies, three in English and two in Russian. He may have the translations made himself, or pay the Soviet office for the same. Of the second group of questions, a summary of the first set, the applicant must furnish three copies, one in English and two in Russian. The formalities have been duly complied with when the applicant has submitted all this detail, together with five copies of his photograph.

POSSESSION OF PASSPORTS.

This having been done, and the question of one's passport approached, the Soviet official will request that the applicant hand over his passport for despatch either to Moscow or Peking, together with the other documents. There appears to be some doubt at present as to where the particulars have to be sent for the official "chop" to be applied, but certainly they must go either to Moscow or Peking, and if to Moscow, the applicant may have to wait for three months before the documents are returned.

In the matter of the passport, it should not be necessary to warn British applicants that on no account should they hand over their passport to any Soviet office. Why it should be necessary to send applicants' passports either to Peking or Moscow is rather difficult to understand, since, if it be a question of guarding against fraud, the British Consulate in Shanghai would be the proper place for establishing the genuineness or otherwise of such a document. Other possible reasons for wishing to get hold of passports in this way afford interesting material for speculation. However, no more need be said now than that this demand should not be complied with.

BOOKING FOR THE JOURNEY.

With regard to booking for the journey, we believe that at present it is impossible to book at Shanghai for any place beyond Harbin, so that it would be necessary to arrange to arrive there two or three days before the trans-Siberian express is due to leave. As to the journey itself, a recent traveller eastward states that the accommodation is quite good, though not so well appointed as formerly, and that the cost of the trip is in the neighbourhood of $600.

THE Four Roads Street Union, West Gate, met a few days ago and passed a resolution asking the Settlement Police to deal with the nuisance of loafers and people of a similar type who molest respectable citizens in the streets. As many of these people live in Chinese territory a similar request has also been made to the Chief of Shanghai-Woosung Constabulary.

VALUE OF LAND IN SHANGHAI

Chinese Property Inside the Settlement Doubled in Value Within Three Years

An important property transaction was completed last Friday in Shanghai, land to the value of over half a million taels changing hands.

The property in question is E. C. Lot 583 (Cadastral Lot 537), possessing an area of mow 12.6.2.2, and is situated at the junction of Chekiang, Hoopeh and Canton Roads. For the purposes of taxation it is assessed by the Municipal Council at the rate of Tls. 33,000 per mow, or a total of Tls. 416,526.

Three years ago this land, including the houses standing upon it, was bought for a sum of Tls. 268,000, and the owner has now sold it, also with the houses, for no less than Tls. 535,000. This works out at Tls. 42,000 per mow (houses included) against the Municipal Assessment of Tls. 33,000 (exclusive of houses). The value of the houses will certainly not be anything like the Tls. 9,000 difference shown here, and a genuine rise in land values is indicated.

Messrs. Algar & Co. Ld. negotiated the transaction.

COMMANDER CAREY DECORATED

For Long Service in the R. N. Reserve: Friday's Ceremony at Consulate

A pleasing ceremony took place at H. M. Consulate last Friday, when Lt.-Cdr. Hamilton Foote Carey, R.D., R.N.R., of the I-C. S. Kungwo, was presented with the Royal Naval Reserve Officers' medal for long service. The presentation was made by Mr. Sidney Barton, C.M.G., H. M. Consul-General and was attended by Rear-Admiral Anderson, Lt.-Cdr. Symes, Mr. Hitchison, Vice-Consul, Mr. H. N. Steptoe, Vice-Consul, Mr. A. Brooke Smith, Mr. L. Boyack, head clerk in the Shipping Office, Capt. Gibb, Mr. W. E. Kirby, secretary of the China Coast Officers' Guild, and Mr. Dixon (Messrs. Mackenzie & Co.)

Mr. Barton said that, by command of his Majesty, he had pleasure in handing to Lt.-Cdr. Carey the insignia of the Royal Naval Reserve Officers' decoration which his Majesty had been graciously pleased to confer on him. The decoration was only conferred upon officers who had at least 15 years' service in the Reserve, and thus they knew that Lt.-Cdr. Carey had not only done war service but also was one of those men who were prepared to "carry on" and be prepared for emergency and who, when emergency did arise, were able to be of the greatest possible use. It was a comparatively easy thing to tackle extra work during time of war or civil trouble, but it was not so easy to work consistently when there was no excitement attached to the job and with little thanks and perhaps not even the approval of one's neighbour. Lt.-Cdr. Carey was thus the type of man we wanted in China and in Shanghai, and he was proud of having the honour of presenting the decoration awarded to him.

Lt.-Cdr. Carey responded with a neat speech, in which he thanked the Consul-General for so kindly arranging the little ceremonial, and added that he regarded the presentation as an honour not only to himself but to the merchant service in general and to his employers. The honour Rear-Admiral Anderson did him in attending was quite in keeping with the Service, which was one huge club and renowned for its good fellowship. During his years of service he had always had very good relations with the officers under whom he served and with his brother officers in the permanent service. Lt.-Cdr. Carey concluded by saying that he greatly appreciated the gathering so kindly arranged by Mr. Barton and Mr. Moss, and would regard it as an addition to the many courtesies and kindnesses of his Majesty's Consular service in China.

FOOTBALL FUN

An International Classic at Chinkiang

From a Correspondent.

It is a very rueful individual who is wielding this pen in an attempt to describe what has been the most interesting football match in which he has participated. He is enduring, with as much fortitude as he can muster, the aftermath of the violent exercise which a lovely game of this kind involves. His nether limbs are vehemently protesting against the unusual exertions which the occasion required of them. During the last four months, which have been spent in language study, the only exercise which kept him physically fit was a daily walk of a mile or so and this, as can be readily realized, is no suitable training for the football field. Consequently, at the present time, the process of sitting down is an exceedingly painful one, and to cross the legs so as to sit in comfort can only be achieved by lifting one of them with the hands and placing it over the other.

From the student body of this language school a football team was chosen to play against that of a local high-school. The opposing team was composed entirely of Chinese, but a striking feature of our was its cosmopolitanism, for in it three continents and six countries were represented. In the forward line was a player who hailed from Sweden. He had made his first appearance on the football field three days previously. In spite of his previous efforts to memorize the rules of the game he instinctively put out his hands once or twice and stopped the ball therewith; but apart from this slight violation he played remarkably well and, to his own surprise, actually scored a goal. On the right wing he was assisted by a German colleague whose knowledge of football was no more extensive than his own, but who played with much energy and courage. On the left wing of the forward line was another German who, while knowing little of the game, distinguished himself by fleetness, clever footwork and twice scored for his side.

THE TEAM OF ALL THE TALENTS.

Other players were an Australian, a Canadian. The Australian functioned as one of the half-backs. In stature he was of considerable length, and the longest part of him was his legs which, when in action, cleared a wide area around him. There was no player on the field more zealous than he, but his zeal was not always according to knowledge, for on one hectic occasion, when a number of the opposing team were strenuously trying to put the ball between our posts, he relieved them of the effort by doing it himself. The movements of this half-back were quite easily followed owing to the bright blue bed-stockings which encased his shins. This leads me to remark that most of us were arrayed in rather a weird assortment of togs, for we had not brought our sports-clothes to the school. Consequently, all had to resort to the best substitute for "shorts" and other articles which could be found or borrowed. Our centre half-back was running about with a boot on one foot and a shoe on the other.

I attempted to play as left full-back, but of my own contribution to our victory I will say nothing, except that as I ambled off the field I was painfully conscious that it was very small. But mention must be made of the brisk American who played with me at right full-back. What our friend did not know about [illegible] would fill [illegible] But he was really splendid [illegible] and more than once called an opponent to the ball when he was in dangerous proximity to our goal. The Canadian filled the position of right half-back. He was of a corpulent frame and made up in energy what he lacked in [illegible] and [illegible] In [illegible] he was assisted [illegible]

THE LAURA KADOORIE SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AT BAGDAD

Princely Benefaction Recently Visited by King of Iraq.

A London newspaper recently, when describing the sights and possibilities of the rediscovered garden-country of Mesopotamia, asserted that there are only two buildings in the whole of the domain worth seeing, and they are well worth a visit. They are the principal Mosque—the name of which has passed from memory—and the Laura Kadoorie School for Girls in Bagdad. It was only a few weeks ago that the school was accorded a signal honour, being inspected by the King of Iraq.

The King of Iraq (in peaked head-dress), with his Ministers and the Head Mistress, after inspecting the Laura Kadoorie School for Girls, Bagdad.

The Kadoorie brothers have behaved in princely fashion in the matter of their benefactions and there are few parts of the Near East and the Far East that have not good cause for feeling thankful to them. Many years ago, when they retired, they realized the great fortune their business instinct had brought to them and decided that they must do big things for the benefit of less forturate people, they sat down for a while to discuss what it would be best for them to do. The discussion was brief, for the late Sir Ellis simply said, "Give me China, and you can do what you like elsewhere."

The bargain was made and everyone knows how much Sir Ellis has done for China, especially in the way of education, though as a matter of fact he also did a great deal for other countries. Mr. E. S. Kadoorie's benefactions mainly have been in the Near East and they cover the whole of that great area.

The Bagdad School for Girls, named after Mr. Kadoorie's wife, ranks high amongst his gifts, and its success has amply justified the foundation. Indeed, its standard is such that a girl who does not hold its certificates has to be exceptionally well favoured or have some other special attraction if she is to secure a husband. The school was started in a small way, but it has grown so rapidly that now there are 1,600 girls in attendance, whilst the building, with its handsome marble embellishments, is, as the London paper suggested, one of the finest in the Near East. Attached to the school are many departments where the girls receive instruction in embroidery, dressmaking and kindred arts and the beautiful work turned out by them eventually attracted the notice of the King of Iraq's consort, who purchased several articles. When the King saw these he wanted to know from whence they came and on being told said that he must pay a visit in person to the school.

Bagdad then was in a feverish state of excitement, for the visit of a King in these romantic countries is a different business to say, a tour by the Prince of Wales through some Midland manufacturing area. Amongst other things, a special chair and cloth of gold covering had to be made for him, and three days were occupied in cleaning up the streets through which he would have to pass. The great day arrived and the King rode through Bagdad preceded by 300 men of his guard running to clear the way. He made a most particular inspection of the school and he and all his Ministers expressed themselves as both surprised and delighted at all they saw. So now the school ranks higher than ever.

HOLIDAYS AT TSINGTAO

A Possible Rival to Post Earthquake Japan: Busy Preparations for Visitors

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 1.

Deputy Governor Kun Chi-ping at a Press dinner yesterday asked the journalists to assist the Administration in advertising Tsingtao because he thought a large number of residents in the outports will have to abandon Japan this year as a summer resort. He was of the opinion that due to the disorganization of tourist facilities in Japan, foreign residents in China who are accustomed to the practice of spending their vacation in that country every summer will have to look elsewhere for a suitable resort.

Deputy Governor Kun said that the following points should be emphasized with regard to [illegible] a holiday resort, namely, the absence of bandits, safety from earthquakes, ex[illegible] climate, unsurpassed facilities and the anxiety of the Administration to ensure efficient protection to the visitors.

The beach will be reserved for holiday makers and special policemen will be detailed to keep the undesirables away from the foreshore. Boats will be provided [illegible]

The staff of the Hankow American [illegible] is to be shortly augmented by the arrival of Mr. Robert C. Coudray, who is consular clerk. He is expected to arrive from the United States toward the end of March.

CATTLE PLAGUE IN ANHUI

Rinderpest Rampant in Province

From Our Own Correspondent.

Yingchowfu, An., Feb. 28.

During the past weeks rinderpest has been rampant here as elsewhere over big stretches of country. Many hundreds of head of valuable cattle have succumbed to this dread malady.

The thrifty and small farmers have been sadly hit, as they depend so much depend on their ox or cow when ploughing starts.

The local farmers appear to believe that when blight falls on the crops in the fields it remains on the stalks that become cattlefood, and in the event of a very mild winter, especially when snow does not fall until well on toward the end of winter, they once become anxious for the safety of their cattle. If the snow comes soon after winter sets in, they think that the chief cause of these epidemics has been eliminated.

Dealers in skins have been more than busy and thousands of hides have found their way to Hankow for export. These are usually taken across country to the Peh-Han Railway and thence by freight trains to the southern ports. Animals are being brought in when monetary circumstances permit to get ready for the time they will be required, and that is not now very far distant.

The Hector and the Antenor, sister ships of the Blue Funnel Sarpedon and the Patroclus are expected to come into commission in the autumn. They have been considerably delayed by the boiler-makers' strike in Great Britain.

JAPANESE EMIGRANTS FOR BRAZIL

Tokio, Mar. 5

To encourage emigrants to proceed to Brazil, especially from the earthquakes-stricken districts, the Home Department has decided to defray all travelling expenses and to grant a subsidy of Y. 200 to each emigrant. If a sufficient number respond to this offer on the part of the Government, it is proposed that the first party of 100 shall leave Japan for Brazil by the end of next month.

Additional parties will be sent later, if the scheme works out satisfactorily.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hongkong is to have a super-cinema palace at West Point, to be erected shortly at an estimated cost of $130,000. Interior decorations and furnishings are to be on an elaborate scale.

THE QUAINTS

"The Beggar's Opera"

When we announced that Mr. Salisbury was bringing "The Beggar's Opera" to Shanghai, we ventured to predict that it could not be revived under better auspices in the Far East.

A great point about the Far Eastern revival is the fact that the original text in Mr. Salisbury's hands has suffered only to the extent of "cutting" of the more frank and shameless parts of the dialogue, and the opportunity of hearing the original is a pleasure which not even Lovat Fraser's exquisite settings at Hammersmith could make up for. The audience at the first night in 1728 could hardly have been more enthusiastic than that at the Lyceum Theatre on Monday. We had nearly all the jokes about "shameless sluts" and "saucy jades," nearly all the songs—all of which were wildly applauded. It was surely one of the most riotous evenings in the history of the Lyceum Theatre.

When the opera was first performed it was the Polly of the day that made it. Miss Dorothy James is not exactly a perfect successor to the famous Lavinia Fenton, but she gave a well-balanced sympathetic reading of the part. Miss Olive Turner, as Lucy Lockit, who possesses a beautiful voice, and acts with great sincerity, one ventured to think, should have slipped into the other's shoes. It is sincerity as well as an expression of innocence, that is required to portray the only well-behaved character. But she was greatly helped by her highwayman hero, magnificently played and sung by Mr. Ernest Melvin. Mr. James Allan as Filch and Mr. R. B. Salisbury as the Beggar and Lockit were excellent, and Mrs. Peachum, in the hands of Miss Mavis French, was played in a spirit of real fun. The duets and ensembles go capitally, as for instance the chorus of cut-purses in the tavern near Newgate.

All the minor parts were admirably taken. The dance at the end of Act II for sheer beauty both of Dr. Pepusch's music and of its exquisite movements has rarely been equalled on the local stage.

The settings appeared to be closely copied from the Hammersmith production, but there is one small fault that nearly spoils the principal scene outside the worthy Peachum abode. The pillars of the portico should not resemble the trellis work of a suburban garden, but the classicism of the Augustan age in domestic architecture.

"The Nine O'clock Revue"

"The Nine o'clock Revue" given by the "Quaints" was enthusiastically received by a full house at the Lyceum on Thursday. The production was amusing, but nothing more nor less than what it pretended to be—a revue. There was the usual conglomeration of dances, songs, funny men and the inevitable "Mammie" song. Much of the book was clever, but the show inclined to drag in the early stages. Mr. Salisbury was his usual scintillating self and had the whole house with him in "William the Konk," probably his best efforts of the evening. Miss Dorothy James danced delightfully as ever and was well supported by the chorus; they were particularly good in "Susannah's Squeaking Shoes," the "Mammie" song aforementioned, a delightful feature of which was the scenic effect of the tumbledown hut, silhouetted against the moonlight. The revue brightened up considerably towards the end, but in our opinion was much too long, and the fall of the curtain came soon enough. Mr. James Allen ran a good second to Mr. Salisbury on the humorous side; his song of "Nicholas" was an exquisite piece of foolery. Miss Mavis French and Miss Olive Turner acquitted themselves with honour as did the whole cast. It was, indeed, difficult to discriminate between the performers, with the outstanding exception of Mr. Salisbury and Miss James, for while all were good none stood out above his or her fellows.

On the whole the company did an excellent best with a very ordinary production of its kind, glossing over the vulgarities and getting the best out of the book.

FIRE AT FOOCHOW RD. THEATRE

House Rapidly Cleared During Performance: No Casualties Reported

The Chinese theatre at the corner of Hoopeh and Foochow roads was the scene of some excitement about 7 p.m. on Thursday, when an alarm of fire was given. The usual performance was in progress at the time, but the house does not appear to have been unduly crowded, and despite a rush for the doors when the alarm was given, the theatre was cleared without accident, and in exceedingly quick time.

The fire occurred in a Chinese shop at the back of the theatre opposite the stage door, and separated from the main building only by the usual narrow alleyway. The place was stored to the roof with a quantity of stage gear, actors' clothing, properties, scenery etc., and the actors themselves turned to with the stage hands in hasty efforts to save these belongings. A good deal of stuff was saved from the ground floor, and a good deal more in the upper part of the premises was lost, this portion of the building being burned out. Central Fire station answered the call and in half an hour's work had the fire under control, with no danger of its spreading to adjoining buildings. The theatre staff made good use of emergency fire appliances whilst the brigade were on the way to the scene. No casualties were reported.

HUMMING-BIRD

I can imagine, in some other world
Primeval-dumb, far back
In that most awful stilness, that only gasped and hummed,
Humming-birds raced down the avenues.

Before anything had a soul,
While life was a heave of Matter, half inanimate,
This little bit chipped off in brilliance
And went whizzing through the slow, vast, succulent stems.

I believe there were no flowers, then,
In the world where the humming-bird flashed ahead of creation.
I believe he pierced the slow vegetable veins with his long beak.

Probably he was big
As mosses, and little lizards, they say were once big,
Probably he was a jabbing terrifying monster.
We look at this through the wrong end of the long telescope of Time,
Luckily for us.

Riverside Power Station Disaster.—The following report by Messrs. A. McLean Ranft and D. Somers Brown, sent out by Messrs. C. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd., to investigate the circumstances under which a 20,000 K. W. Turbine was wrecked on November 15, 1923, is published for general information:—

Shanghai, February 27, 1924.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to our conversation this morning at your office the following telegram was received to-day from Messrs. C. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd.:—

"It is now possible to throw "further light on the accident "which occurred to the 20,000 "K.W. Steam Turbine at Shang-"hai November last. It has "been suggested that the acci-"dent was caused by increase in "speed of Turbine beyond nor-"mal; although the evidence "shows that this did not occur it "seems desirable to give se-"quence of events should a tur-"bine of this design overspeed. "First, discs would come loose "on turbine shaft as stress of "centrifugal force overcame al-"lowance for shrinkage between "discs and shaft; the discs com-"ing loose would cause blades to "jamb and fouling of blades "would take place, under these "conditions it would be impos-"sible for turbine to continue to "accelerate, but even if this were "possible discs would have to "attain speed of about 3,000 re-"volutions per minute and shaft "a speed of 4,000 revolutions per "minute before they would "burst.

"The normal speed of the "machine in question was 1,500 "revolutions per minute, from "this it is evident that if the "shaft were of even moderately "sound material it would be ex-"tremely unlikely for the mach-"ine to reach such a speed that "the shaft would burst.

"The Engineer-in-Chief, "Shanghai Municipal Electri-"city Department, has held an "enquiry at which it was dis-"closed that at the moment be-"fore accident occurred there "was nothing abnormal in run-"ning of turbine, nor was there "shadow of evidence that tur-"bine had exceeded normal "speed. The whole of evidence "so far received from our en-"gineers who were sent to "Shanghai to report shows that "the accident was caused by "rupture of turbine shaft.

"Photographs of fractured "shaft and diagrams showing "positions and nature of frac-"tures have been fully discussed "with technical experts of Mak-"ers of shaft forging, and they "are in agreement with us that "all evidence points conclusive-"ly to accident having been due "to a concealed defect (probably "a clink) in interior of the steel "forging. The forging in ques-"tion was obtained from one of "the experienced steel firms in "this country. The shaft forg-"ing was made from a cold in-"got in 1921 when the precau-"tions which were known to be "necessary during manufacture "of large forgings of alloy steels "were not as fully appreciated "as they are to-day in respect to "medium carbon steel forgings "of dimensions required for this "shaft. All medium carbon "steel forgings of large or vary-"ing sections are treated to-day "in a manner similar to the "highest class of alloy steels for "ordnance under the direct "supervision of the steelmakers' "metallurgical experts, and "from the casting of the ingot "to the final quality heat treat-"ment the material is not allow-"ed to become cold. These pre-"cautions and the present al-"most universal practice of "boring holes through the cen-"tre of shafts for internal in-"spection and examination have "reduced possibility of repeti-"tion of such an accident to "minimum.—Turbo."

The accepted interpretation of the metallurgical term (clink) is an internal crack due to heating the forging too quickly, and may be developed by forging into a cavity of dimensions according to the size of the original crack and the amount of forging which has been put upon it.

After our preliminary survey at Riverside a critical examination was made of the damaged parts of the turbine, and all the available information covering the running of the plant at the Power Station was carefully considered. The evidence obtained suggested the accident was caused by the breaking of the turbine shaft; all the other damage being consequential.

The turbine shaft was found broken into three main portions, transversely and lengthwise. When these were assembled and co-related it was found that several pieces of shaft had broken away from the transverse fracture, also that a portion of shaft was tightly wedged in the cast steel turbine casing. When all the shaft parts were co-related a longitudinal irregular fracture was disclosed at the centre of the largest diameter of shaft, indicating that during the process of forging this fault had developed, extending longitudinally and outwards leaving a comparatively small section of sound material. The nature of the fractures suggests that the final breaking of the shaft was instantaneous and would not give any warning or indication to those responsible for running the plant.

In conclusion we wish to take this opportunity of expressing our thanks and appreciation for your guidance and assistance, and for having placed at our disposal unreservedly the evidence and information you had collected prior to our arrival at Shanghai, which has been of material assistance in carrying out the investigations.

We would like you to convey to your officials and staff our appreciations of their valuable assistance in this matter.

Your's faithfully,
A. McLEAN RANFT,
D. SOMERS BROWN.

TERRIBLE FIRE IN CHAPEI

Over 40 Chinese Lives Lost in a Veritable Death Trap: Pathetic Scenes Among Ruins

A terrible fire broke out at Chapei on Monday shortly after 11 p.m. when a big silk weaving filature, some four or five storeys high, suddenly burst into flames in a veritable labyrinth of Chinese houses. It was some time before the blaze was discovered and by the time the Chapei Fire Brigade was able to get to the scene there was absolutely no hope of saving the building. The factory is known simply as "The Cantonese Factory" and it is set well back in the middle of a thickly populated area just off North Szechuen Road Extension, about a hundred yards beyond Range Road. The inhabitants of the houses near by were fleeing for their lives taking with them all their household belongings and valuables. The factory is most unhappily situated for it is bordered on each side by very narrow streets, rendering the work of the brigade terribly difficult. Lines of hose were laid up alleyways and through private houses and then trained on the flames just underneath the factory walls at imminent peril to the lives of the firemen should the walls have caved in.

The glow in the sky could be seen for miles around. Huge clouds of sparks shot up into the air and every few minutes the crash of burning masonry could be heard. Neither was the work of the firemen assisted by the large crowds of sightseers drawn up all round. When a "North-China Daily News" reporter arrived on the scene no-one, including the police and firemen, knew very much of what was happening, excepting the blaze was a serious one. Among the sufferers were a number of Russians who could be seen standing in the roadway beside their baggage.

Forty dead bodies were recovered on Tuesday among the débris and and unfortunately this number probably does not in any way represent the total lives that may have been lost, as there is no means of estimating the number of men, women and children who were in the building at the time. It proved to be a death trap. Although the windows were barred on the outside, the inmates made frantic efforts to escape when exit by the stairway had been cut off by the flames. Those outside were powerless to offer assistance, despite the agonizing shrieks from within.

An unofficial estimate made by members of the Fire Brigade place the number dead at over 50, while it is asserted in Chinese quarters that between 200 and 300 perished.

This latter figure may easily be correct if that number of women and children were on the fatal second storey, the windows of which were barred and screened with wire netting on the inside. The intensity of the flames combined with the falling floors and roof which scattered bones here and there will, however, make a final accurate estimate entirely impossible.

Friends and relatives were searching among the gruesome remains all day on Tuesday.

The building which housed the silk filature was situated just off North Szechuen Road north of Jukong Road in Hsuan Kong Road. The Settlement Fire Brigade who also responded to the call soon had nine jets playing on the Szechuen Road side, the lines being run 200 yards into the interior of the district through a maze of one-storey buildings, while the Chapei firemen battled with the flames from the inside section. The interior condition of the building, being of such light wood, had so fed the flames that before the arrival of the Settlement Brigade the one floor had already collapsed. It was impossible to do anything for the doomed structure, so water was played on to the surrounding buildings in case the flames should spread. The absence of an alarm system in Chapei was responsible for the great headway that the flames made before it was known that the fire had started. Shortly before four o'clock it was found possible to stop work.

SHANGHAI PORTLAND CEMENT WORKS

A party of officials of the Public Works Department of the Shanghai Municipal Council and others on Saturday made an interesting tour of the recently completed "Elephant Brand" factory of the Shanghai Portland Cement Works, Ld. The many in the party who were competent to judge all expressed themselves as very favourably impressed with the compression tests, the results being highly satisfactory.

The works are situated on a piece of ground measuring 150 mow, just above the Kiangnan Arsenal. It is a purely Chinese concern, capitalized at $3,600,000. The construction of the works was begun in 1921, and by the summer of 1923 the "Elephant Brand" cement was placed on the market and was extremely well received. The works are equipped with the latest machinery for the production of cement, the selection having been made after a group of foreign and Chinese experts had inspected a large number of cement manufactories in Europe and America. Many of the ingenious labour-saving devices won the admiration of the visitors.

The plant has a maximum capactiy of 1,400 barrels of 375 lb. per day of 24 hours; it has also a barrel shop which has a daily output of 1,200 barrels or 1,200 steel drums. There are two jetties, one for landing raw materials, such as stone, clay, gypsum, etc., and the other can be used by steamers of 3,000 tons to discharge coal. The length of the water-front is 1,200 feet. The plant generates its own electricity, has a small waterworks and manufactures its own gas. An important feature of the establishment is the laboratory where one foreign and one Chinese qualified chemist make daily tests of the cement, coal, clay etc.

NANKING TUCHUN'S CHAUFFER ROBBED

Came to Shanghai with $900 for Motor Accessories

Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's chauffeur, who arrived in Shanghai on Monday evening with $900 in his pockets to purchase motor accessories, was robber early on Tuesday morning by a gang of three men who attacked him and dragged him into an alleyway.

Tsung Li-sung says he arrived in the early evening and proceeded to a lodging house at 331 Kiukiang Road. He had gone out to a restaurant to procure some food and was on his way to meet a friend at the Yih Ping Shan Hotel at about 2.20 a.m., and while going along a cross road this side of Thibet Road he was attacked by the gang, some 40 yards off Nanking Road. They jumped upon him and gagged him, while one of them stabbed him seven times with some sharp instrument. After taking him into an alleyway he was robbed of the wallet containing $899. Eventually the police removed him to the Shantung Road Hospital, where the doctors certified that he had two wounds in the neck, two in the left arm, two deeper ones in the left hand and one in the right thigh. His condition is reported as not serious.

CHINESE POLICEMAN SHOT IN YANGTSZEPOO

In attempting to arrest an armed gang of five in Ward Road, Yangtszepoo, shortly after 8 p.m. yesterday, a Chinese P. C., No. 1180, was shot dead.

The robbers were departing from a pawnbroker's shop at 744 Ward Road with clothing they had stolen from the place, when the policeman's suspicions were aroused. Securing the assistance of another P. C., the pair approached the gang. While chasing one of them P. C. 1180 was shot through the head. His companion stated that all the men were armed with revolvers. No arrests were made at the time.

MOTOR ROADS OUT OF SHANGHAI

New Road and Service of Buses to Tsingpu

A good deal of interest is being taken in the Shanghai-Tsingpu motor service project in Chinese circles in the the two cities concerned. The idea was taken up once before but had to be dropped owing to insufficiency of funds. Now, however, three well known Chinese merchants of Shanghai Chêkiang and Tsingpu are taking the matter up again and intend forming a company with capital of $600,000, the shares to be offered to the general public. The gentlemen concerned are Mr. Chang Pau-pae, a member of the Kiangsu Provincial Assembly, Mr. Shen Kung-hsien of Chêkiang and Mr. Mo, of the Teh Dah Cotton and Spinning Factory of Shanghai. Ten motor cars will be purchased and put on the service with skilled drivers and competent conductors and the road will run from Sicawei through Piyisz, Tsihpao, Szeking, Tienmasan and so on to Tsingpu. The road will, of course, have to be built for the purpose, and what will probably happen will be that the company will buy the full rights of way from the proper authorities and so make profit out of the road itself. The result of the service should be a big fillip to the district through which it runs and should help to develop the surrounding country. The people will look kindly on the scheme without doubt, for great disappointment was expressed when it fell through last time it was mooted. Tsingpu is about ten or fifteen miles from Shanghai. At the present stage the scheme is in its infancy but we hope to give more details in the space of a few days.

PASSENGERS BY THE TEIRESIAS

Mr. H. F. Bell Retiring

Leaving Shanghai this week by the Blue Funeral str. Teiresias and after a short stay in Hongkong with his niece Mrs. Blood (née Doris Lavers), continuing to England by the Naldera, Mr. H. F. Bell says goodbye to the Far East. Mr. Bell was born in Shanghai, son of Mr. F. H. Bell, of Adamson Bell & Co., and Mrs. Bell, afterwards Mrs. Jenner Hogg, and after being educated, at King's School, Canterbury, came out to Shanghai in 1894, to the firm of Ilbert & Co. It may be mentioned that almost immediately he joined the Cathedral choir and has sung in it ever since; yesterday its members presented him with a silver cigar box, a memento of his very long service. It is also to be recalled that a house in San Souci Terrace where Mr. Bell messed with the late Mr. "Ruby" Ellis and Mr. C. E. Anton, afterwards taipan of Jardine's, could in those happy days be rented for we think Tls. 35 a month. Mr. Bell was a good cricketer and lawn tennis player but riding was his great game and for several years he was a well recognized jockey. He was an ardent paper hunter though he never had the luck to win a hunt. He was also for many years in the Light Horse attaining almost a record we believe, for on the outbreak of the war, when a groggy knee effectually prevented his going Home to serve, he joined up again with his old Company and did his full measure of work. He left Ilbert's to become an exchange broker some 20 years ago and actually retired from business last year. He was a member of the Country, Race, Shanghai and Golf Clubs, serving for some time on the Committee of the last named. The regret which his friends feel at losing him is compensated for, to some extent, by the thought that fortune has favoured him at so early an age.

MR. AND MRS. COCHRANE.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Cochrane also have left China for good by the Teiresias. Major Cochrane, M.C., as he should be called, is an engineer. He served with much distinction in the war in that most perilous arm, the balloon observation, in which work he was thrice shot down and learnt a good deal about parachuting. He also was with the British Occupation Army in Cologne for some time after the armistice. He came to China in 1919 to help build wharves and godowns at Pootung for the Blue Funnel, and the only complaint his friends had against him was that he found the delights of engineering almost too engrossing. But when he could be tempted away from reinforced concrete, he was an ardent golfer. Mrs. Cochrane will be remembered as one of the best amateur actresses that the A.D.C. has had. Her playing of the servant in "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" was a beautiful study only surpassed by her quite flawless performance of Maggie in "What Every Woman Knows." She was chairman of the B.W.A. Dramatic Section for some time, when, however, her modesty kept her too much in the background. She is an admirable reciter. Mr. and Mrs. Cochrane are ultimately bound for Java, after which it is their friends' sincerest wish that some other job may call them back to Shanghai!

OUR LOCAL FILMS

How to Secure the Best Type

How to secure the highest possible type of films for Shanghai audiences was the subject of the first paper read before the members of the American Women's Club on Wednesday morning by Mrs. I. L. Boynton, who stated that she had acted only as a compiler in collecting the experiences of American cities which might bear upon the problem here. "Can the public reform the moving picture business?" she asked, and answered, "Yes, when public opinion so voices its approval or disapproval definitely enough to register upon the producer's mind. Public opinion has never been organized efficiently except during the war."

Censorship, the speaker went on, was good as far as it went, but even the best censorship boards permitted the showing of plays which if not vicious were certainly not ideal, They eliminated the worst features of the films but at best this was only a negative action while the "better film" movement had a constructive effort in commending ideal plays and making it profitable to produce those of this type. Both lines of endeavour were doubtless necessary at the present time and might exist side by side, although it was hoped that the need for censorship might finally be done away with.

It was suggested that women's clubs might well take upon themselves the duty of bringing the best plays to the attention of the public and of commending their producers, as well as devoting five or 10 moments of each meeting to a régimé of the best current cinema productions. The elaborate censorship regulations of Australia and their practical application were quoted, as well as examples in the United States.

It was stated that so far as was known the only local organizations censoring films were the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A. and the American School. The willingness of the proprietors of local cinemas to co-operate so far as possible in showing high grade films was mentioned, and also the fact that the Chinese did not seem so keen to see melodrama and "racy" pictures as did the foreigners.

SHANGHAI'S EDUCATIONAL VALUE.

Mrs. N. F. Allman then spoke on sights of educational value about Shanghai, looked at from the standpoint of parents anxious to give their children all the advantages of their local environment, and emphasized the desirability of making them understand the conditions under which they were living and to appreciate the picturesque atmosphere. Besides the possibility of visiting such places as Woosung, Sungkiang, Jessfield Village, Loonghua Pagoda and the like, there were mentioned the Native City, commercial enterprises such as silk and match factories, presses, both native and foreign, schools, the Mixed Court, and public institutions.

SHANGHAI AMERICAN SCHOOL

Judge Lobingier on the Need for American Education

The Scottish Rite prizes were presented at the Shanghai American School, on Monday, by Judge C. S. Lobingier. Mr. C. L. Boynton, the acting Principal, briefly explained how the prizes came to be offered and also spoke of the Judge's interest in the school and the services he had rendered to Americans in China during his ten years' residence in the country.

Judge Lobingier said that it gave him a great deal of satisfaction to see the American School in full operation in its new premises. Recently the organization he represented engaged in a systematic educational campaign in the United States with a view to removing the plague spots of illiteracy which the world war had revealed. Its programme included the support and improvement of the public schools, popular instruction upon political and social needs, and the establishment of a Federal Department of education under a Cabinet officer. In China the conditions were quite different but the needs of the American colony were not less exacting and important. Here the problem was to keep American the rising generation, to bring it up in touch with American ideals and devoted to American purposes and needs. He regarded that as no less important than the task of making Americans out of those at Home of foreign birth and his idea in providing these prizes and instituting these contests was to stimulate interest in, and familiarity with, America's needs and problems. He felt that this was the nearest approach that could be made in China to participation in the educational programme of the Scottish Rite.

Already the contests had demonstrated that the purpose of the prizes was being attained. The choice of subjects disclosed that the students had caught the spirit of the enterprise and were acquainting themselves with the needs and conditions of their Home country and the treatment accorded their themes had won the highest praise from those who had heard them. The great benefit was not the reception of the prize but the instilling of practical patriotism and civic education.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Bucknell, jr., arrived by the str. President Grant last Friday. Mr. Bucknell will serve as U. S. Junior Assessor in the Mixed Court, succeeding Mr. N. F. Allman, who has resigned from the consular service.

A LONG RECORD.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In the reprint of the first issue of the "North China Herald" of August 3, 1850, appear two announcements worded in the manner peculiar to that time, regarding certain insurance agencies then held by the firm of Jardine, Matheson & Co., and it is interesting to note that of the five Companies mentioned, the firm still represents three, viz:—

Alliance Assurance Company,
Reliance Marine Insurance Company,
Canton Insurance Office.

The last mentioned was, I believe, founded by the "Ewo Hong," in 1832, so that the continued representation for so many years is scarcely so unique as the fact that the firm has held the other two agencies for practically three-quarters of a century.

Surely this is somewhat of a record, especially for the East?

I am, etc.,

JOHN ENGLAND.

Shanghai, March 7, 1924.

By Royal Warrant, the Royal Horse Artillery, Royal Field Artillery, and Royal Garrison Artillery will henceforth form one corps. It will include all artillery units of the Territorial Army and the local batteries and companies of Royal Artillery abroad. Enlistments will be for service in the Royal Regiment of Artillery. Since July, 1916, the Royal Regiment of Artillery has consisted of two corps—(1) the Royal Horse Artillery and the Royal Field Artillery (including the Special Reserve, Royal Field Artillery) and the Royal Horse and Field Artillery units of the Territorial Army, and (2) the Royal Garrision Artillery, including the local batteries and companies of Royal Artillery abroad, the Special Reserve, Royal Garrison Artillery, and the Royal Garrison Artillery units of the Territorial Army.

THE Field Artillery Battery, S.V.C., held their annual dinner in the Volunteer Club on Saturday night, when there was a full attendance of members, old gunners and others. Major R. W. Davis presided, and was supported by Mr. S. Fessenden, the Civil Commandant, Col. Gordon, C.M.G., D.S.O., the Battery officers and other officers of the Corps. The toast of "The Guests" was proposed by Lieut. Lobb, and replies were made by Mr. Fessenden and Col. Gordon. The latter referred to the work of the Battery, and pointed out that with the fine personnel of the members it would be possible to bring its efficiency up to that of any regular battery. Lieut. Mellows in an amusing speech recalled the condition of the Battery at a time when very few of its present members had been born. In those days the ponies they had were those which ordinarily did duty in the Municipal scavenging carts, and on one occasion when the Battery was returning from the Point two of them fell dead. An excellent musical programme was carried through, and the dinner was one of the most successful on record.

INTERNATIONAL RUGBY

Ireland Beat Wales

Cardiff, Mar. 8.

Ireland beat Wales by 13 points to 10 in an international Rugby football match played here to-day.

The weather was sunny and there were 45,000 spectators, including the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald and Mr. J. H. Thomas.

After a quarter of an hour a neat passing movement by the Irish three-quarters ended in Gardiner securing a try which Crawford converted. The Irishmen then played with tremendous dash and a brilliant breakaway by the backs resulted in H. Stephenson scoring a try, which was not converted. The Welsh forwards controlled the ball splendidly in a series of footrushes and finally Richards scored a try, which, however, they failed to convert. At halftime Ireland was leading 8-3.

On resuming, Wales attacked strongly and after five minutes Watkins, the Welsh half-back, scored a drop goal. An Irish raid resulted in Hewitt securing a try which Crawford again converted. Nothing daunted Wales made a glorious forward rush, Pugh scoring a try, which was not converted. In the closing stages of the game the Irish line was frequently in danger owing to the fierce forward rushes of the Welshmen, but the match ended with Ireland the victors by 13 points to 10.—Reuter.

CORRESPONDENCE

PRICES IN SHANGHAI.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News."

Sir,—With reference to a paragraph, taken from your "Day to Day" columns of to-day's issue, I would particularly direct your attention to the sentence therein, "Business cannot prosper . . . if the goods sold are not of proper quality and of a right price."

I enclose for your information a receipt for a safety razor strop purchased to-day at a Chinese company. The charge for the same, you will note, is $1, yet I invite you to purchase the identical article at a foreign store and they will unblushingly demand $1.50. It is exactly the same with all other commodities sold in Shanghai and, as usual, the consumer is ever the victim for it is nothing more than victimization. Taking the above quoted extract regarding "Business" there would seem to be many firms in Shanghai who should now be languishing in bankruptcy!

Another matter in which the opinions of your readers may be invited is the ever increasing cost of commodities. Take as an instance, sugar. The cost of a 10-pound bag two years ago was $1.10. Ten cent rises have been added from time to time and without any reason being tendered, till to-day the price of the same 10-pound bag is $1.55. And so the vicious system progresses. Where it will all end unless somehow checked is hard to say, but it is a fact that families in Shanghai who did not find it too difficult to pay their way on the price ruling two years ago, now find it hardly possible, on account of the inflation of prices having to be met with a not commensurately increased salary, to make ends meet.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
"Puzzled."

Shanghai, March 6, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News."

Sir,—Your correspondent "Puzzled" would be less puzzled if he made a wider survey of prices at foreign and Chinese stores in Shanghai. The citation of a single case, and that of an article as rare as a blue tiger (some sort of patent razor strop), proves nothing at all. It may be news to your correspondent that the patent of a famous razor ran out fairly recently, and that he is possibly comparing the price of new and cheaper stock with the original article.

I note, by the way, that you advertised in your paper only the day before, a razor, blades and case for $1.20 at Weeks. Why buy a strop?

There are a great many things—Japanese hats and cutlery, Chinese shoes, shirts, soap, scent, cigars, that once used will never be forgotten. Many of these commodities would be cheap at double the price if purchased at a foreign store that confined itself exclusively to imported instead of local products. A known brand of whisky, or butter, or cod-liver oil costs just about the same at a foreign as at a Chinese store—providing it has not been purchased by the native retailer as damaged cargo at an auction.

The writer is not interested, even indirectly, in any foreign store, but is puzzled to know why, if they make the huge profits suggested by your correspondent, they do not pay correspondingly huge dividends, or princely salaries to their staffs.

There is just the possibility, however, that they conduct their businesses honestly; that they do not take advantage of Lao-wai passers-by to charge in gold dollars what they usually charge in Mex.; and that they can be depended upon to sell goods that can be eaten or worn or used with confidence. It will be noted that no comparison has been made between the quality, attention and advice that the casual buyer receives at either of the sources mentioned native and foreign. To some this may be of no value; but there are others who appreciate it.

Old residents here are under no misapprehension as to what would happen if retail trade were left entirely to the Chinese. They have had experience of "rings" before and do not need to be reminded of the necessity for foreign stores to stabilize prices. The cost of coal is a case in point. It cost no more to mine and little more to carry to the consumer during the war than it does now, yet the prices went up two and three hundred per cent. No doubt if Kailan coal was raised from $13 to $30 a ton we should be paying a like increase for all other grades of coal.

It ill becomes "Puzzled" or any other foreigner here who knows local conditions to rush into print because they have to pay 50 cents more for a patent razor strop or a dollar more for a pair of patent leather shoes at a foreign store.

I am etc.,
Unperplexed.

MORAL WELFARE.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News."

Sir, Since, as your leader on Moral Welfare so well points out, "legislation in moral matters is powerless," why should we cling to fallacious ideas any longer? Is it not time to omit from the licensing conditions of hotels the words "that no disorderly or immoral conduct, gambling, etc., be permitted on the premises"? What is the use of such "grandmotherly" legislation when, as our Police department assures us "in some of the hotels prostitution has become part of the business on which the proprietor relies for his profits?" Does not this mean increasing defiance of licence conditions which our police are aware of, but are apparently unable to prevent? Fancy the police authorities of an English city making such a confession! Why make law and order ridiculous by attempting to control such matters at all, and failing? Who cares what takes place on premises so long as rent and taxes, and licence fees, are duly paid?

I am, etc.,
Laissez Faire.

Shanghai, March 10, 1924.

∴ With all respect to our correspondent this appears to us an illogical not to say absurd position to take and not quite fair on the police. Because the experience of three years in Shanghai—of three, and thirty, and thirty-three thousand years elsewhere—proves the Moral Welfare League's policy a failure is no reason for abandoning the ordinary machinery of government. Our correspondent's letter appears to us additional evidence of the hopelessness of rational argument on this question.—Ed.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News."

Sir,—Your footnote to "Laissez Faire's" letter in to-day's issue is justly warranted, for anyone possessing powers of deduction would at once know that new measures are always countered by newer methods, as has been so ably stated by the Deputy Commissioner of our excellent police force.

Does "Laissez Faire" really expect a hotel manager to insist upon incoming guests producing marriage lines before granting them accommodation? If such was the case there would be, without doubt, a necessity for an increased police force to settle unseemly brawls between hotel managers and prospective guests. There must be few who would tolerate such an insult and passively acquiesce in pandering to the whims of unconventional reformers.

I am, etc.,
Wang Mao

Shanghai, March 11, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News."

Sir,—As the matter of seeking the best methods of dealing with our local moral welfare problems is of importance, and is of public interest, I hope you will once more allow it to be discussed in your columns, in a frank and fair manner: as a beginning I venture to refer to some of the points of your leader dealing with the Police report published in the latest Municipal Gazette. Let us first, in fairness, remove a misconception. your words "the policy forced on the Council by the Moral Welfare League" are incorrect, and therefore misleading. The policy referred to was unanimously recommended by a properly-appointed Commission, only one third of whose members belonged to the M.W.L. It was proposed at the Ratepayers' Meeting by Judge (now Sir) Skinner Turner, and it passed the meeting constitutionally, so I fail to see how it was "forced on the Council by the M.W.L." That sentence appears to indicate a prejudice which is regrettable, and which does not help towards a fair and dispassionate consideration of what is, at best, a difficult problem. Let us be thankful for the good which it is admitted has already been gained by the experiment, and if better ways can carry us further, we are willing to try them.

When you say that "hotels make a regular income out of a business (prostitution) they once never used," one wonders what period the "never" refers to; to have any bearing on this discussion it should mean that such business was not used prior to the last three or four years. If that is the meaning, the statement is amazing, and betrays a lack of knowledge of conditions which no writer of a serious article on the subject ought to display. The police know better, and speak of the business being of "greater extent." The Vice Commission's report four years ago said: "We have great reason for thinking that much immorality takes place in certain Chinese hotels in the Settlement." There was sufficient evidence that this practice is of long standing: what, then, is the purpose of suggesting that a new situation has arisen since the new policy was started? It may have been written off-hand, but it is a misleading statement.

When saying that "legislation on moral matters is powerless" surely it is not meant that law should take no cognizance of morality at all: is it meant that while legislation should not be used to try to improve morals, yet it shall be used to protect and perpetuate prostitution and attendant evils? Experience everywhere teaches that law and morality are very much co-related, and while nobody expects that legislation will change a man's heart and desires, yet it can greatly assist in lessening temptations, and especially it can give a "sporting chance" to the "under dogs" of the world. I have never heard anyone suggest that any laws at Shanghai aim to make people virtuous and pure: yet, for some old-fashioned reasons, street solicitation has always been punishable, and hotel licences require that "no disorderly or immoral conduct, gambling, etc." take place on the premises: picture shows are subject to police control: panders and obscene picture sellers are punished, and opium-smoking is prohibited. Why have any legislation on these matters at all if it is powerless? The police, and most citizens, will prefer to believe that legislation in moral matters really has its uses, and its powers.

As regards the present accessibility of vice, I beg to differ from the view of your leader; there is no question whatever in my mind that prostitution is making less show on the streets now than it did five years ago. Conditions are totally changed in Nanking and Foochow Roads, and in some other districts. When increased solicitation "in public parks" is spoken of, the reference is to foreigners, who have always been a numerically small part of our problem. Only 15 houses, with 53 women, were reported in 1920; many of these women are still undisturbed in well-known houses, and others are reported to be housed elsewhere: it is doubtful if any of the solicitation referred to comes from women who have been evicted by the new policy, or who were in Shanghai at all in 1920. As we all know, and ought frankly to admit, there are at present other causes which have probably much more to do with "glad eye" solicitation than the Council's policy. Over 95 per cent of our problem is Chinese, and among these, vice is much less flaunted than it used to be: the brothels are fewer, the streets show less exhibition of girls, and in fact vice now has to be sought instead of its hitting the eye every evening as one went through the city. I consider this a gain to "public morality" even if private vice remained the same.

I am glad to see your word of caution to any who might want to hastily change the present policy. Public feeling is, as you say, opposed to a system of licensed and medically supervised houses: yet you add that by no other means can girls be "trapped and brought back to special areas." The figures given to the Vice Commission, from two independent sources, showed about 4,500 Chinese prostitutes: it is doubtful if the whole of these came under the licensing regulations. The Commission said that the estimate given could not be a complete one: a Chinese estimate about the same time gave over 8000, and recently in your correspondence columns the enormous figure of thirty to forty thousand was given for greater Shanghai. On any showing the "untrapped" must have greatly outnumbered those officially recognized by the police, and this is the common experience of towns in Europe where regulation is practised. But who wants to "trap" girls? That is one of the saddest features of the whole business, in that it denotes that somebody is victimized, and there can be no doubt that in many cases girls are compelled to submit to virtual slavery of the worst kind, against their wish; in other cases they are deceived and taken advantage of and treated so unchivalrously that the whole matter is one for shame to our community. Frankly, I prefer to hear of girls living as "emancipated prostitutes" rather than herded in the stews, with bitter hardships, as they used to be. They are likely to have more humane treatment and more comfort in the life they follow, for whatever reason, and which I regret that any of them should follow. My opposition is strongest to "commercialized vice," and especially the compulsion and cruelty connected therewith; and as we are told that the present policy has alleviated these evils, it has so far done real good to hundreds, or thousands, and apparently has worked no real harm to any, and I see no good reason for not continuing it at least to the end of the term. Let us be "sporty" enough to see the last wicket fall before changing sides, and then with wood grace we can with good-will together face the next step. From my own observation, and the experience of other places, I doubt if we shall find any other policy likely to do more to improve things than this is doing; but I shall be ready in due course to follow any other lead or policy, provided it is a genuine attempt at moral welfare, and not a retrograde step or an evasion of the problem.

With your permission, Sir, I will refer to the Police report in a future letter.

I am, etc.
I.M.

Shanghai, March 11, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Your leaderette of Saturday 8 and two letters subsequently published dealing with conditions in hotels, have all overlooked one important point. The situation indicated by the authorities, accepted by yourself and your correspondents, may be true: it is certainly not new. This is interesting because it is on the basis of this and similar assumptions that you attempt to discredit the Moral Welfare League. But do not let that trouble you. To prove that the situation is not new, I respectfully refer the authorities, yourself and your correspondents to the dossier of the Vice Commission and to the Vice Commission's published report. If others have mislaid their dossier they may see mine, which has been neither mislaid nor overlooked. In this dossier you will find reports by the authorities and others which indicate a very bad condition of affairs in hotels. There are some interesting admissions. As a matter of fact the Vice Commission's report is made up very largely on information supplied by the authorities of the Settlement. If necessary, I can give some additional evidence to show that the situation was as bad before the present system went into effect, as it is now.

May one ask another question? The police evidently think they have inside information on this matter which enables them to make their recent public assertion. Now, according to a licence condition, such things should not be allowed to go on in hotels. That licence condition, furthermore, is not something new nor introduced by the Moral Welfare League: it existed before the Moral Welfare League did. But why, if the police have this definite information, do they not proceed in some way to see that this licence condition is kept? I am not attempting to minimize the difficulties in this problem. But why do the authorities not offer some solution to this problem instead of implying that the blame lies on the Moral Welfare League where it certainly does not belong? Why do the police not call on the Moral Welfare League to assist them in securing the "necessary evidence" as they did in the case of other places, which were successfully closed?

I am, etc.

RICSHA MISSION CHRISTMAS FUND.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—It is with very deep appreciation of your oft repeated efforts on behalf of the "Ricsha Mission" that I have again the honour of acknowledging your cheque received on the 12th instant for $5,261.64 the amount resulting from the "North-China Daily News" sixth Christmas Fund for ricsha men.

Through you, Sir, to the Management of the "North-China Daily News" and to all who so kindly and generously contributed to the Fund or sent directly to the Mission, most sincere thanks are tenndered on behalf of the coolies and their families.

As formerly, the money will be expended in providing food, clothing and general assistance to sick and indigent men and their families not only at present but during the year while the money lasts.

This season, during the Christmas week, December 20, 1923, to January 2, 1924, the distribution of food, clothing and other gifts was on a much larger scale than ever before both in respect of the amount of relief and the number of recipients. The Fund will continue during the entire year to supply on an average about 300 meals daily, many garments and other assistance to sick and needy men.

The conditions under which the ricsha pullers ply their calling still leave much to be desired, but evidences of improvement physically and in the morals of the men generally, are not lacking. This, along with the sympathetic attitude of a large portion of the public towards the men and the work of the Mission on their behalf, greatly encourages the efforts made for the amelioration of the hardships from which as a class the men suffer.

Taking this obvious change for the better evidenced in very many ways in conjunction with the constant fluctuation of the men from one form of coolie labour to another and the accompanying migration from place to place, it may not be out of place to assume that the favourable moral influence of the work is not confined to this city only, but has also penetrated to many remote parts of China.

In consequence of the number of public ricsha licences issued by the Council being now unlimited, there are already thousands of additional public ricshas, with an average of three men to each in the 24 hours plying for hire, which makes conditions of wage earning harder all round for the pullers.

The Mission will continue to give assistance as far as possible where required, and still ventures to say that as long as the "North-China Daily News" continues this great assistance and the Foreign Community of Shanghai res-

SILVER.

The price yesterday was 33 7/16d. ready and 33½d. forward, showing a fall on last week's prices of ⅛d. and 1/16d. respectively. India has been reported as buying on most days and China sold a little. Stocks of sycee and dollars have increased by Tls. 22½ lakhs and $6½ lakhs respectively during the week. Bars in stock, 3,362, including silver yen 10 lakhs. The price of dollars has kept very steady during the week, and was quoted yesterday 71.5875.

EXCHANGE.

In ordinary times the fluctuations in the local gold bar market are a fair reflexion of our exchange market as a whole. This last week, however, these fluctuations seem to have had very little effect on sterling or gold dollar exchange, and have centred practically entirely in the yen market. Local transactions were again chiefly inter-bank and on account of speculators, whose position is estimated as oversold about £500,000.

Exchange closed off last week at T.T. 3/3d., where it remained until Tuesday, when it went up to T.T. 3/3½d. There was a steady market all day on Tuesday until just before closing, when weakness set in. On Wednesday the opening rate was 3/3⅛d., with a further drop to 3/3d. shortly after opening. At this level it remained till the afternoon session on Thursday when a further drop of ⅛d. to 3/2⅞d. was recorded. The market is very quiet with sellers T.T. 3/3d. March, 3/2⅞d. April/June. G.$ T.T. 69¾ ready and forward to December.

London Silver

Reporting on the London silver market on February 6 Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. said:—

The approach and incidence of the Chinese New Year (February 5) has tended to deprive the market of animation. After purchases had been completed for last week's steamer, India has been inactive. America has been a moderate seller. Some buying emanated from China on Monday and imparted a steady tone, supplies not being large. The price for cash delivery has remained unchanged for a longer period than usual, having been fixed at 33 5/16d. from January 31 to February 5 inclusive. To-day India bought on balance and the quotation rose 1/16d.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Depreciation of the Yen Tending to Weaken the Local Yarn Market.

Mar. 15.

The drop in the yen exchange seems to be the principal factor in the local markets this week. It has undoubtedly affected the outlook of the yarn dealers, causing them to reduce their offers for the local product, and accordingly limiting business.

The piece goods market has hardly been active during the week, and with a further reduction in certain auction and other values the outlook is not what would be called satisfactory.

While a small amount of silk has been purchased by Lyons, exports generally are stagnant.

PIECE GOODS.

Thanks to the shortness of stocks and easy monetary conditions, clearances of piece goods have been very good during the past week. In contrast with the situation prevailing prior to the China New Year dealers seem to be very well off financially, with the result that as soon as goods arrive they are being cleared. Generally speaking dealers are making their offers on a lower scale than latterly, but even so a certain amount of business has passed with Manchester, and it is reported that one or two good lines in imitation Venetians and black Twills have been booked at about a shilling under the quotations of a month ago. Szechuan merchants are understood to have taken further quantities of White Shirtings, but their offers have been very low. The cuts that have been made and the very moderate volume of business that has taken place with Home are not hopeful signs.

In woollen goods the market continues to be very quiet. While deliveries are good no new business has been recorded. The Home market continues firm, and the recently prevailing high rates are being maintained.

As far as the auctions are concerned there is little change to report from a week ago. The slump in Italians has continued, and the fall has been even more accentuated than a week ago. Since the drop started the fall this year has amounted to 13 per cent., while during the same period last year it was 8 per cent. As the stock of Italians is so very much smaller than a year ago, it is possible that we are seeing a much sharper but shorter drop than in 1923, and prices may already be near the bottom. Auction deliveries have been good during the week and the purchases made have been by dealers in possession of genuine trade orders, the speculative element being still largely absent from the auctions. The recent fall in cotton does not seem to have perturbed the dealers greatly, as in view of a probable shortage before next crop they anticipate higher rates before very long.

Chinese dealers in Korean varieties are again showing anxiety because of reports that a preferential tariff in favour of Japanese products is to be introduced for Korea. In 1922 a report to a similar effect was very strong indeed, but until now nothing more has been heard of it. It is again to the fore, although no particulars of the duty to be imposed are forthcoming, and Korean merchants have been hurriedly clearing all cargo in consequence.

COTTON AND YARN.

China Cotton—A fair demand for cotton has taken place on the part of the mills during the week, and towards the close prices have firmed up. The Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange quotations are higher by Tls. 1½ to Tls. 2 compared with a week ago. The rates current there are:—March 44.35; April 43.90; May 43.40; June 43; July 42.45; August 42.10. Spot quotations are as follows:—Tungchow 44; Shanghai 42; Shensi 43½; Hankow 41.

Yarn—Until Thursday the yarn market was showing increased strength, but owing to the depreciation of the yen some weakness has since developed. Chinese consumers apparently believe that owing to this movement in exchange Japanese yarn will be able to find a good market here, and accordingly are hoping for lower prices. The Szechuan merchants have bought certann quantities, but on the whole they are waiting in the expectation of a substantial reduction in the freights rates to Chungking. They are working on the strength of a report that rates will come down from about Tls. 18 to Tls. 10 per bale. On the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange prices advanced on buying by the provinces, but later declined owing to the drop in yen. The quotations on the Exchange are:—March 173.90; April 171.70; May 168.80; June 167.80; July 166.90; August 166.10. Local grey cloth has been quite active, especially drills which are wanted by Tientsin for army uniforms. Newchwang has not yet come into the market to any extent. Prices are on the whole firmer.

SILK.

Lyons continuse in the market, making small purchases of low grade steam filatures and Szechuan filatures at declining prices.

The Yokohama market has had a severe setback.

America remains out of the market.

PRODUCE.

The Home markets for seeds and groundnuts are stagnant, mainly owing to the unsettled position of the franc. There is evidence of increased interest in general produce, but lack of supplies continues to hinder business. There seems little prospect of anything but hand to month trading for some time to come.

Cotton Production in Indo-China

Paris, Mar. 10.

The Colonies Committee of the Senate, inquiring into the question of production of cotton, today heard Colonel Bernard with regard to the climatic and other advantages afforded by Indo-China, where the Society for the Study of the Cultivation of Cotton is successfully experimenting on intensive lines, as the British are doing in India. He said that Cambodia cotton presented the characteristics of American cotton.

M. Hirsch, the President of the Niger Cotton Company, describing the results obtained in French Sudan, affirmed that it was possible to count on a yield of 400 kilogrammes of cotton to the hectare. The company's cotton fields, where cultivation began three years ago, now cover over 3,000 hectares.—Reuter.

COMPANY MEETINGS

THE KROEWOEK JAVA PLANTATIONS

Annual Meeting

The 14th annual general meeting of the Kroewoek Java Plantations, Ld. was held last Friday afternoon at the offices of the secretaries and general managers (Messrs. J. A. Wattie & Co. Ld.). Mr. A. J. Welch presided, supported by Messrs. W. W. Cox, R. G. MacDonald and H. M. Tibbey (directors), and Mr. C. J. L. Stewart, secretary, the attendance representing 6,763 shares.

The notice convening the meeting having been read, the Chairman said:—

Gentlemen,—Before proceeding with the formal business of this meeting, I wish to express, on behalf of the Board, our sorrow at the great loss we have sustained through the death of Mr. J. H. McMichael who died on January 28, 1924.

Mr. McMichael was one of the original directors of this company, always took the keenest interest in its affairs and the benefit of his experience and advice will be greatly missed by those of us who remain. I am sure you will join with me in heartfelt sympathy with his relatives in their sad bereavement.

The report and accounts having been in your hands for the prescribed period, I propose, with your permission, to follow the usual custom and take them as read.

THE COFFEE CROP.

You will have noticed from the report that the areas under rubber and coffee respectively are somewhat different from those shown last year. In the first place the shade from the rubber trees has now become so dense that the coffee on the bushes that were interplanted amongst the Hevea could no longer ripen and consequently the bushes have all been removed and the timber will be used for firewood. Secondly, it was decided to cut out the Hevea on certain small areas of very steep and wind swept slopes on the higher portion of the estate where the trees were making no progress and to replant the areas, which are some 11¼ acres in extent, with coffee for which the soil and altitude are suitable. This work was all completed before the end of the year.

At the end of the year 1,540 acres of the area under rubber were in tapping and 113 acres were immature; this latter area consists of numerous small patches which were planted in 1915 and 1919.

As you are already aware this company, in common with the vast majority of British owned estates in Java, has agreed to restrict its output voluntarily on the same lines as pertain in the Straits and Ceylon. In conformity with this policy, we harvested 583,881 lb. during the year, but, had there been no restriction, we could easily have harvested 700,000 lb. without straining our trees in anyway.

Tapping on this estate has always been of the very highest order and the bark renewal and reserves are excellent.

No signs of any fresh diseases have appeared and apart from sporadic appearances of stripey canker and brown bast, which are promptly and efficiently dealt with, the estate is practically free from disease.

As regards coffee, the bushes interplanted amongst the Hevea have been entirely cut out and from now onwards the crops will be obtained from the permanent coffee area, the outturn from which should tend steadily to increase as the areas that are still immature come into bearing.

Labour has been more than sufficient throughout the year so it has been possible to demand a very high standard of work from the tappers and only to retain the most expert.

PRODUCTION COSTS.

In spite of the heavy restriction of the output of rubber, it is satisfactory to note that our cost of production, at 5½ pence per lb. again shows a large reduction as compared with the previous year. I don't think, however, that we can look for much further reduction, if any, until such time as we are permitted to increase our output and thus reduce the cost per lb. of our overhead expenses.

If you will now turn to the accounts, you will see that the Dutch company made a profit for the year of Guilders 177,110.32 or say roughly Tls. 88,000 and the Shanghai company made Tls. 11,350.95 so that the combined profits amounted to practically Tls. 100,000 or Tls. 1.80 per share.

Capital expenditure was negligible and the accounts are so straightforward that I can find no items that require special explanation.

The undivided profits are sufficient to have allowed of a considerably larger final dividend being paid, than the one tael per share recommended, but, although the price of rubber is now almost double what it was before restriction was enforced, the rubber plantation industry is not yet out of the wood and it is impossible to tell what the trend of prices will be for the next year or two, so your Directors considered that it was wisest to recommend a moderate dividend, thus consolidating the company's finances and putting it in a position to meet any eventualities that may arise.

If you agree to the directors' proposals the two companies combined will start the new year with their liquid assets exceeding cash liabilities by over Tls. 62,500 or in other words, the reserve of Tls 50,000 and the premium on shares account, Tls. 9,380 appearing in the balance sheet of the Shanghai company are more than covered by the combined surplus of liquid assets.

LIFE OF A RUBBER TREE.

As regards the appropriation of Guilders 40,000 to reserve account out of the profits of the Dutch company, I have, on more than one occasion in the past, pointed out that a rubber tree is a wasting asset, the duration of its commercial life depending to a large degree upon the treatment it receives.

Up to the present, it has not been possible to determine what the average period of productivity is, but it is certain that trees cannot go on living and yielding latex for ever. The trees on Kroewoek have never had anything but the very best treatment so that their useful life should be considerably longer than that of trees on many other estates, but even they must cease to be productive sooner or later and the present appears to your directors to be an opportune moment to start accumulating a reserve against the day when it will become necessary to replant our rubber areas.

In conclusion, Gentlemen, I must say that it is only through the unceasing efforts of our manager, Mr. Westendorp, and of our Sourabaya agents that we find ourselves in this very satisfactory position after the times of stress that we have been through so recently and I am sure that you will join with me in voicing our heartiest thanks to these gentlemen for the very able manner in which they have conducted the affairs of the Estate.

There were no questions, and the following resolutions were formally carried:

That the directors' report and statement of accounts for the year ended December 31, 1923, as presented be passed. Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. W. W. Cox.

That a final dividend of Tls. 1 per share, making Tls. 1.50 per share for the year, be paid. Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. H. M. Tibbey.

That Mr. W. W. Cox be re-elected a director of the company. Proposed by Mr. A. K. Craddock, seconded by Mr. R. G. MacDonald.

That Messrs. Lowe, Bingham & Matthews be elected auditors to the company for the ensuing year. Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. W. W. Cox.

THE SHANGHAI TUG & LIGHTER CO.

Shareholders' Annual Meeting

The twentyfirst annual general meeting of shareholders in the Shanghai Tug & Lighter Co., Ld., was held at the offices of the agents, Messrs. Wheelock & Co., on Monday. Mr. J. Prentice, the Chairman, presided and there were also present Messrs. H. M. Tibbey, J. H. Dollar, H. W. Lester, W. J. N. Dyer (directors), T. W. Mitchell (secretary), B. Firth, H. J. Clark, W. R. McBain, W. Wakeford Cox, H. B. Ollerdessen, J. H. Teesdale, W. G. Pirie and S. A. Sleap, the total of shares represented being 6,239. The secretary read the notice convening the meeting and the auditors' report.

The Chairman—The report and accounts for the year ended December 31, 1923, having been in your hands for some time, with your permission we will take them as read.

The result of the year's working, although not as good as that of the previous year, we consider has been very satisfactory and feel certain you will agree with us. The amount available for distribution, after the payment on August 9 last of an interim dividend of 3½ per cent. on the preference shares and 10 per cent. on the ordinary shares, is Tls. 138,423.59, which we recommand be dealt with as follows:—

	Tls.
Pay a final dividend of 3½ per cent. on preference shares	17,500.00
Pay a final dividend of Tls. 4.50 per share on ordinary shares	90,000.00
Add to general reserve	7,348.28
Carry forward	23,575.31
	138,425.59

You will have seen by the profit and loss account that Tls. 30,000 have been written off for depreciation. Repairs, etc., to the fleet have been charged as usual to working account. Your directors wish to record their appreciation of the services of the foreign staff and the Chinese office staff during the year and later a resolution for the payment of a bonus to them will be proposed.

According to the Articles of Association, Messrs. H. W. Lester and H. M. Tibbey retire, and offer themselves for re-election. The auditors, Messrs. Lowe, Bingham & Matthews, retire and offer themselves for re-election.

No questions were asked and the formal resolutions were carried unanimously.

Mr. H. W. Lester—I wish to propose that a bonus of 20 per cent. be given to the staff. Messrs. Wheelock & Co. inform your directors that the staff have worked well and are fully deserving of this bonus, whilst you have heard the Chairman state that he considers the report and accounts very satisfactory, so I hope that you will pass this resolution.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Tibbey and carried unanimously. Mr. W. J. N. Dyer returned thanks on behalf of the staff.

The Chairman announced that dividend warrants would be posted that evening.

SHANGHAI-SUMATRA TOBACCO CO., LD.

Good Prospects for Selling 1923 Crop: Annual Meeting

The 22nd annual meeting of the Shanghai-Sumatra Tobacco Co., Ld., was held on Tuesday at the offices of the general agents, Messrs. George McBain. Mr. R. S. F. McBain presided and was supported by Messrs. John Prentice, A. W. Burkill, W. R. McBain and J. Elmore.

The notice convening the meeting having been read the Chairman said:—

Gentlemen, the report and accounts having been in your hands for some time past I will, with your permission, take them as read. I will however read you the auditors' report:—

We have obtained all the information and explanations we have required. The balance sheet, which is in accordance with the books, accounts and vouchers of the Company in Shanghai and the signed statements received from the Estate is, in our opinion, properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Company's affairs according to the best of our information, and the explanations given us, and as shown by the books.

Lowe, Bingham & Matthews,
Chartered Accountants.

I am sorry that the year's working again shows a loss amounting to Tls. 23,016.14, and together with the amount brought forward from last year the general profit and loss account shows a debit of Tls. 253,018.33 to be carried forward to a new account. Our 1922 crop of tobacco gave very disappointing results in spite of the fact that it was reported by our manager to be of very good quality. Your directors have been very anxious about the position and caused careful inquiries to be made in Sumatra and Amsterdam. Our manager, Mr. Cochrane, was on leave during part of last year and took the opportunity to visit Amsterdam and to attend some of the sales. He was thus enabled to get in closer touch with the market, and to find out the buyers' latest ideas of what is required in the various markets. His visit will, I feel sure, be of much practical value to us.

We were able to make arrangements with Mr. W. Percy Pinckney—a retired planter with many years experience in Sumatra as manager of different estates—to take his place during his absence, and our best thanks are due to Mr. Pinckney for placing his great experience at our disposal. He has put in a great deal of very hard work for us and his high ability and great enthusiasm have, I feel sure, been of great value and encouragement to the assistants on the estate. To us his great value is apparent as the sandleaf which he has produced has already been reported on from Amsterdam as "fine," and it is I am inclined to believe through his efforts that this success has been attained. I think that the estate will benefit considerably from the work done and the advice given by Mr. Pinckney and we shall convey to him this appreciation of his efforts on our behalf.

He strongly recommended that we should become members of the Planters' Society and we therefore approached the Deli-Maatschappij about the matter, and they offered to give us all possible assistance if we decided to join. Eventually your directors decided to apply for membership on the terms indicated by the Deli-Maatschappij, which made it possible for us to make the changes with regard to labour that were necessary in order to comply with the conditions of membership of the Society.

1923 CROP PROSPECTS.

We have also arranged with the Deli-Maatschappij to inspect our tobacco estate regularly and give us the benefit of their advice. The inspection will be made by one of their inspectors and I think I can safely say that we shall have the benefit of a very valuable opinion, and I have every hope that we shall derive great benefit therefrom. In return for this they will receive 5 per cent. of the net profits, but there will be no fees charged in the event of the estate not yielding a profit. I do not want you to think that we have lost confidence in our manager by doing this, and I would therefore explain that in companies like the Deli-Maatschappij and Deli-Batavia, etc., many good managers are working with advantage under the inspection of men of longer experience and undoubted ability in tobacco production.

I am glad to be able to inform you that there are very good prospects of selling our total 1923 crop at a very good profit. In fact a telegram was despatched last night which will probably close the deal, and I hope therefore that we shall be in a position to give you the details in a day or two. This will go a long way towards wiping out our indebtedness and we shall thus be placed in a good financial position, a situation which you will welcome as much as your directors do. After these sales there will only be a few hundred bales of common stuff to sell.

There are these indications that the market for tobacco in Amsterdam will be good this year, and Germany is reported to be buying again, but on the whole we do not think that we are in a position to take any risks and we feel sure that it will be your wish that we should not do so.

SATISFACTORY RUBBER POSITION

The rubber estate working account shows a profit of Tls. 89,581.77, and I think this may be regarded as quite satisfactory. Our manager is to be congratulated on having improved conditions on the estate considerably during the year and he now expects to be able to produce rubber at a slightly lower figure than he estimated last year. His estimate is 680,000 lb. at 1/1 G.O.35½ at the estate.

OIL.

I am sorry that I have no further information to give you with regard to oil, but the position in Sumatra for the production of oil generally has improved during the year. The B.P.M. have given us no indication that they are likely to do any work on our concessions in the near future, and I think you would be wise not to count too much on any results in this direction.

The health throughout the year on both estates has been good, although an epidemic of malaria was experienced. This was dealt with quite successfully, and only lasted about two or three weeks, and the effect on the working of the estate was almost negligible.

The formal resolutions were then duly passed.

CLUB AND SOCIETIES

CHINESE Y. M. C. A.'s ACTIVITIES

The Annual Meeting: An Ever Widening Field: Bigger Accommodation Needed

The annual meeting of the Shanghai Y.M.C.A. took place in the directors' room of the building on Szechuen Road on the 4th instant. A large number of members were present to hear the reports and elect directors in accordance with constitutional requirements.

Mr. Anson T. Wong was elected as temporary chairman and Mr. A. T. Y. Chow as secretary. Reports were given showing the progress of the work for the past year. At no time have the educational, physical, social and religious features of the "Y" programme been more largely used than during the past year. The membership at the present time stands at 4,117, of which 2,728 are men and the remainder belonging to the boys' division. This includes representatives of all provinces.

The staff include 27 secretaries and 44 teachers. During the past year Mr. C. G. Hoh has served as General Secretary in the absence of Mr. S. K. Tsao who, for health reasons, has been absent from Shanghai.

SHANGHAI'S 15,000 STUDENTS.

The student department with a staff of five secretaries carries on its work almost entirely outside the building among the 15,000 students of middle schools and colleges of Shanghai which, while not usually considered as an educational centre, has as many students in schools of higher learning as any city in China with the possible exception of Peking. The Association assists to stimulate voluntary student activities in 25 middle schools and colleges with a total of 9,980 students. It also is working in nine higher primary schools where some such activities as the Association promotes seem much needed. The student bureau assisted 300 students, including the Tsinghua party, in their arrangements to go abroad.

The industrial department is experimenting with an educational programme in four industrial concerns in Shanghai, seeking in cooperation with

The greater part of business transacted on the local Stock Exchange during the past week has been for March Settlements. The tone of the market is dull. With the fall in the price of the raw material Rubber shares have further weakened and few transactions are being recorded, sellers being unwilling to part with shares at present low prices. Cottons are easier with little business passing.

London market quotations for stocks are a little easier, Bonds remaining firm, and the following are the latest prices cabled to us:—

LAW REPORTS

A COLLISION ON THE RIVER

International Law and Question of Damages: Supreme Court Decision

An Admiralty case in which the China Merchants and the China Navigation Company are interested was the subject of a ruling by his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner in H. M. Supreme Court on Saturday. An action was brought by the China Navigation Co., Ld., owners of the str. Woosung, for limitation of their liability to £8 a ton of damage done by the Woosung on September 9 last, when she ran down and sank the China Merchants S. N. Co.'s hulk Kiangning at Kiukiang, resulting in very heavy loss to the latter company, and in respect of which collision the China Navigation Co. admitted they were solely to blame.

The defendant company recently applied to the Court in Chambers on an interlocutory summons that the service of plaintiffs' writ and all subsequent proceedings should be set aside on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction under the Foreign Jurisdiction (Admiralty) Order in Council 1910, to try an action involving a claim for limitation of liability for damage done in a collision between a British ship and a Chinese hulk, their contention being that the Republic of China has no reciprocal law of limitation, and therefore that if the action had been one by a British ship against a Chinese ship in a Chinese court, the latter ship would have been made liable for the damage found due without being entitled to claim a limitation of her liability, and that therefore the action was one which was not in accordance with the comity of nations.

The subject was argued at length in Chambers, by Mr. R. E. S. Gregson for plaintiffs and Mr. J. H. Teesdale for defendants, and the Judge reserved his decision.

Sir Skinner Turner's ruling on Saturday was as follows:—On September 9, 1923, the British str. Woosung, registered at the Port of London, collided with the Chinese str. Kiangning at Kiukiang, causing considerable damage. The owners of the Woosung admit that their ship was solely to blame for the collision and they have therefore begun this action under our Admiralty jurisdiction to obtain a decree limiting their liability. The owners of the Kiangning appeared under protest and took out a summons to set aside the writ and all proceedings under it on the ground that this Court has no jurisdiction to make any such decree by reason of the fact that no such law is known to Chinese jurisprudence and that therefore there is no reciprocity between the two Powers, and that in this absence of reciprocity no decree can be made.

Our Admiralty jurisdiction is now based upon the Foreign Jurisdiction (Admiralty) Order in Council. 1910, and it has been suggested that that Order altered the law administered in our Court by stating that this Court must pay "due regard to International Law and the Comity of Nations": Art. 4 (3). But these words are not new at all. They are taken from Sect. 2 (2) of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty. Act. 1890, 53 and 54 Vict. c. 27, and that section was applied to this Court by the Consular Courts (Admiralty) Order in Council 1894 and continued by the China Order in Council, 1904, Art. 100 (2).

It is clear, then, that our jurisdiction has been exercised in Admiralty on the same principles certainly since 1894.

I have been unable to trace the origin of these words in any other statute or in a judgment of the High Court in England, but I take it to be a statement of the general principles on which the High Court of Admiralty proceeds in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

It has not been contended that in a proper case this Court has not jurisdiction to make a decree limiting liability. Such decrees have been made in this Court in the case of the Hangchow (two British steamers in collision), the Newchwang (also two British steamer in collision) and the Empress of India (British steamer and Chinese cruiser in collision) and no question as to jurisdiction arose in any one of these cases. Further the matter was considered by Sir H. de Sausmarez in the case of Taining (collision between a British steamer and a Chinese steamer). In this last named case, a decree was ultimately refused on the ground of the ownership of the British steamer; but the matter of jurisdiction was gone into very fully by the learned Judge on a summons similar to the one now before me. The judgment on this summons is reported in 96 "North China Herald" on p. 54, and it is clear that the learned Judge, who refused to stay the action on the summons, was ready to make the decree even though it related to a collision between a British steamer and a Chinese steamer. The judgment in the action itself when the decree was refused for the special reason above-mentioned is reported in 96 "North China Herald" on p. 338. In this case of the Taining the matter of reciprocity was expressly dealt with in the judgment, and it is clear that the Judge was satisfied that there was some means whereby the owners of a Chinese vessel could obtain some form of limitation of liability. I read the following from his judgment:—

> "It has been argued for the defendants that it would not be equitable to limit liability in this Court when only one ship is subject to its jurisdiction and the other ship might therefore, if found to blame in the Court of its own nationality, be held to the whole of its liability without limit. There are two answers to this, first that the law of practically all nations is to limit liability in some way or other, and second that English law is the law of this Court.
> "On the authority of "The Seringapatam" (3 W. Rob: 38) this Court has insisted on reciprocity between the two ships before it, and it certainly would not limit the liability of the British ship if the liability of the Chinese ship was not to be equally limited."

and that is the only meaning that can be put upon his language.

As far, then, as the decided cases in this Court go, I have three cases in which such a decree has been made and one was in relation to a collision between a British steamer and a Chinese steamer (cruiser) and I have a decision in another case where the jurisdiction to make such a decree in a case of collision between a British steamer and a Chinese steamer was considered and expressly affirmed.

It seems to me that in administering the Admiralty jurisdiction of this Court "in like manner and to as full an extent as the High Court in England," I am bound to follow the practice at home. I find this is laid down in Marsden's Collisions at Sea; 7th Edn. at p. 228.

> "Until the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 there was frequently great difficulty in cases where one or both the ships in collision were foreign in determining whether the Municipal law limiting owners liability was, or was not applicable. At the present day no such difficulty can arise. Whether the ships are both British or both foreign, or one British and one foreign, and whether the collision occurs in British waters or on the high seas, the limit of owners liability is the same, namely that fixed by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894."

It seems to me then that by the decisions of this Court and by the law administering in England in a like case a decree such as is asked in this case can be made. It was expressly decided in The Amalia. 1. Moo. P. C. N. S. 471. that a statute enacting such a law is not a breach of International law.

As regards the Law of China as administered in her Courts, I gather that it is not for me to receive evidence of it, as if it were foreign law to be provided before me. I have therefore not read the affidavit of Mr. Ting filed on this point; but it is not suggested by the owners of the Woosung that they are any way desirous of answering that affidavit, nor do they suggest that there is any Chinese Statute or Decree dealing with this matter. I am satisfied that there is none, but I am far from being satisfied that there is no means whereby some form of limitation of liability can be obtained. It is stated by many writers that by the maritime law the shipowner's liability for collision is limited to the value of ship and freight and, says Marsden, (7th Edn. on p. 170), this it is believed is the law in most if not all foreign countries at the present day. I do not doubt that under some such law as this the Courts of China would limit liability, realizing as they most certainly would that the rest of the maritime nations also limit liability. And this is the only explanation that I can put upon the judgment of Sir H. de Sausmarez in the Taining. And it must be remembered that a Chinese steamer would get the benefit of our law of limitation in our Courts in England. However, I do not think this matters. This Court administers the Law of England, and it seems to me that upon principle and authority this motion must be dismissed and the action must proceed.

I should like to call attention of the judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Wild Ranger, 32. L. J. P. M. & A. 49. Where he dealt with tht question of International Reciprocity in relation to this very question of limitation, as it then was. It was there held that a foreign ship could not obtain in our Court a decree of limitation of liability, even though she could obtain one in her own national Courts. This was before the present state of our law under which British and foreign ships can equally obtain such a decree: and it was argued that the doctrine of International reciprocity demanded that under the circumstances a decree of limitation should be made in favour of the foreign ship found to blame."

The motion was accordingly dismissed with costs, and, by consent, an order for pleadings was made.

ALLEGED BANK PASS-BOOK FORGERY

Young Sikh on Trial at Supreme Court: Prosecution's Story of alliged Swindle

A Sikh named Sadara Singh was indicted before Judge Sir Skinner Turner and a jury in H. M. Supreme Court on Tuesday on charges of uttering and forging a bank pass-book receipt and drawing out a deposit of $550, the property of a fellow Sikh, Soucha Singh. The accused was alleged to have obtained the money by an ingenious swindle made possible by the remarkable trustfulness of Sucha Singh's nature.

Mr. H. P. Wilkinson (Crown Advocate) and Mr. E. T. Maitland (Police Prosecutor) prosecuted, and Mr. L. K. Kentwell defended.

Prisoner pleaded "Not Guilty."

Mr. Wilkinson, opening the case for the Crown, said that Sucha Singh received a sum of money in gold dollars from the United States. Having an account with the American Express Company Banking Corporation in Shanghai, he placed the equivalent of the sum received in Mexican dollars—$550—in the savings bank department. He received a pass-book fully entered up in exchange. A day or so after this he went to the accused, his friend, and asked him to look after the book. Sadara Singh agreed. Some days later accused went to the bank, pretended to be Sucha Singh, and said he had lost his bank pass-book. After the usual questions he was given a duplicate book. With this duplicate book he was alleged to have gone back to the bank and to have drawn out all the money deposited to Sucha Singh's account, again pretending to be the depositor. Shortly after this Sucha Singh received the original book from the accused and went to the bank with it to deposit a further sum. He was then met with the statement that his account had been closed.

The Crown Advocate went on to review the evidence to be called, and concluded by explaining to the jury that the real point they had to decide was as to whether Sadara Singh was or was not the man who closed the account.

THE WHITE TURBAN.

Sucha Singh gave evidence bearing out the Crown Advocate's story. He added that he was employed at a Chinese mill in Chapei as a watchman. The money was sent to him by a cousin in America. The original deposit was made on January 9. It was on February 13 that Sadara Singh gave him the book back, and the following day he went to the bank and was told the account was closed.

Replying to Mr. Wilkinson, witness said he was wearing a white turban on both occasions when he went to the bank. Accused (who was wearing a brilliant purple turban in Court) according to Sucha Singh, also had a white turban originally. They both dyed their turbans purple at the same time.

Cross-examined, witness agreed that he had said he came to Shanghai from Mexico when he gave evidence in the lower Court.

Mr. Kentwell—Why did you trust the accused with your bank book and $550?

Witness—Because he had a relative in my village.

Asked who taught him to write his name in English, witness said another Indian was his instructor and it took him two hours to learn.

Re-examined, witness said Sadara Singh gave him the bank book back because he was afraid he might lose it.

BANK'S WITNESS.

The next witness was a shroff in the American Express Company Banking Corporation. He spoke to opening the account for Sucha Singh and giving him the original book. He also closed the account on February 11 of this year. On the last occasion, when the Indian signed the receipt, witness instructed him to write a second signature, since the first did not correspond with the specimen signature.

Asked by Mr. Maitland whether he could identify the man who closed the account witness pointed to the accused. He went on to say that he picked out Sadara Singh among a number of other Indians at the Kung Yik Cotton Mill, where he worked.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kentwell witness admitted that he was not quite certain of him.

Further questioned, witness said he did not remember everything that he said in the lower court.

His Lordship (interposing)—"Ah! but we do, we do. We have it all here."

Witness further said that Mr. Riggs, the cashier at the Bank, put his initials to the signature "Sucha Singh," on the receipt.

His Lordship—How many Indians have you with accounts at the bank?—Two or three.

Have you a watchman there, an Indian?—Yes.

How long have you been in the banking business yourself?—Three years.

CLERK'S OMISSION.

Mr. Ho Wen-tang, a bookkeeper at the bank, said he issued a duplicate pass-book to a man who said he was Sucha Singh on February 4. He produced a visiting card with the name Sucha on it, and on consulting with Mr. Burgess, of the bank also, he issued the book.

Cross-examined witness said he did not pay much attention to the Indian who closed the account. He forgot to write "duplicate" on the new book.

His Lordship—When you issued the duplicate book was any signature taken from the applicant?—No.

Mr. Donald S. Riggs, cashier of the bank, was the next witness. He said that before the pass-book was issued originally a specimen signature would have to be obtained.

His Lordship—If the word "duplicate" had been written across the second book, would the money have been paid out on February 9 or 10?

Witness—Well, we should have used more discretion in paying out.—Mr. Riggs went on to say that he saw the Indian sign his name a second time when he asked to close the account. He was quite sure that the accused was the man who drew the money out. A few days later Sucha Singh went to the bank with the second pass book to put in some more money and was then told the account was closed. They had an Indian watchman at the bank, but he was off duty when the transactions took place.

On the resumption in the afternoon, the cross-examination of Mr. Riggs was begun. Replying to Mr. Kentwell witness said he did exchange a few words with the Indian who drew out the money He admitted that the shroff to whom the request was made would have had a longer time to observe the Indian than would witness. It depended, he said, on how observant was the shroff.

Det.-Sub.-Inspector Yorke gave evidence of arresting Sadara Singh at the Kung Yik Cotton Mill When apprehended accused said: "The other man has $180, where did he get it?" Nothing of an incriminating nature was found in the man's box. The sum of $209 was found on his person.

R. C. Bridger; finger print office, Shanghai Municipal Police, produced enlarged photographs of the various signatures of the accused and Sucha Singh, made both in the lower court and on the original passbook and the receipt.

Mr. Kentwell, opening the defence, said their case was that the accused never went into the bank, and right up till yesterday he did not know where the bank was. They would seek to prove that on the morning he was supposed to be at the bank, actually he was working and could not possibly have been elsewhere.

The accused was then called. He said he had been with the mill for the past six years and was now drawing $28 per month. Sucha Singh, he said, was deported from America and went to see witness on the advice of somebody else.

His Lordship remarked that they should not put the worst interpretation on to the word "deported."

Witness went on to say that he was on duty in the mill at the time he was alleged to have been at the bank.

NOVEL METHOD OF IDENTIFICATION.

At this stage of the proceedings another Chinese witness from the Bank came into the Court—he had been sent for—and his evidence was interposed. Before he came to Court, the accused was allowed to sit down unobtrusively amid some 50 other Indians in the body of the Court. The Chinese was asked to pick out the man who came into the bank and drew the money.

The witness scrutinized all the Indians in Court for some minutes, but although the man was in the third row of the seats, he failed to recognize him. Asked "what thing?" he replied, "Perhaps not here."

AN "EVIL FACE AND WICKED EYES."

In the witness box again, witness said three Indians came in together, one of whom had "an evil face and sly, wicked eyes." He stared at witness all the time he was in the bank.

Mr. D. H. Hood, accused's direct superior, said he had been at the mill five years, during the whole of which time the accused had been employed there. For one year he had been employed in witness's department as a sizing clerk—the only Indian clerk in the sizing room. He was the only man in the department witness could talk to since he alone could speak English. On February 11,—the day he was alleged to have gone to the bank,—he was in the mill.

interested employers to promote a programme in which, the men themselves take the main responsibility. At present such is carried on in a large printing establishment, a dye factory, an iron workers establishment and an export company. In addition a rather extensive work is done in Chinese buildings on one of the many aspects of it being where a programme of lectures, entertainments, popular education and health activities is being well received.

RELIGIOUS WORK.

The Shanghai Association has one of the largest programmes of religious work of any similar organization in the world. Not to go into details the report shows that there were more than 1,000 per week in attendance at religious meetings during 1923 and 2,306 men and boys were enrolled and in regular attendance upon 113 Bible classes.

The Association Evening and Day classes enrolled 2,047 students during the past year. These included the High School of Commerce as well as the Evening Schools. In the latter hundreds of young men and in business take the opportunity to study English, shorthand, typewriting and other subjects that will better prepare them for usefulness in a modern business community. The latest addition to the educational programme is an Extension day and evening school in Frenchtown that enrols nearly 200 students.

The gymnasium of the Association is the centre of a programme of play and physical education which includes all lines of indoor and outdoor sport. The enthusiasm is indicated by the fact that one of the most popular classes meets three mornings each week from 7 to 8 o'clock. Basket ball leads all other games in popularity, but the gymnasium and athletic field are rarely without occupants and it would seem that the enthusiasm for indoor and outdoor sport among the Chinese had come to stay.

The popular education programme, designed to teach illiterates to read and write 1000 characters was launched in Shanghai during the past year and promises to open the way for hundreds to learn to use their own language. This movement has proven much more popular than the attempt of a few years ago to institute phonetic script as a substitute for the complicated Chinese hieroglyphic.

THE FINANCIAL SIDE.

The financial statement for the year under review indicated that the sum of $169,579.45 had been received in income from the building, fees from classes, membership dues and contributions. The amount expended was $168,801.34, leaving a balance on working for the year of $778.11. The directors aim to keep the current fees at a point where the average young man in business can afford to enjoy them. This requires that a considerable sum be secured each year in contributions, this amount in 1923 being $44,460.02. This was given by individuals and by firms, a large percentage coming from the Chinese themselves for whom the work is mainly established. Foreign firms, whose employees enjoy the Association activities also contribute liberally. Careful scrutiny is exercised over expenditures and the accounts are audited by Mr. J. Trevor Smith.

The buildings in Szechuen Road are now inadequate for the demands of the expanding work and it is hoped that within a short time money may be available for the branch building the land for which has been purchased and fully paid for on Boulevard Montigny, near Rue de Consulat in the French Concession. This situation will make possible extending the activities of the Association to the western and southern sections of the city including the native city. Work will go forward on a modern building for this site as soon as the directors have secured further contributions amounting to Tls. 150,000. This will ensure a modern plant that will cost not less than Tls. 300,000.

The directors of the Association for the coming year, including those elected Tuesday evening at the annual meeting are as follows: Dr. T. H. Lee, Dr. Fong F. Sec, Dr. E. S. Tyau, Dr. W. L. New, Revs. T. C. Wu and Z. T. Kaung, Messrs. S. U. Zau, L. T. Yuen, A. T. Wong, A. T. Y. Chow, K. S. Lee, T. Y. Chang, N. L. Han, K. F. Chang and Walter H. Chen.

THE AMERICAN LEGION (FREDK WARD POST)

Annual Meeting: Monument to Gen. Ward and Donation to Boy Scouts

The annual meeting of the American Legion (Frederick Ward Post) was held on Monday at the American Court for China, with Mr. C. S. Franklin, Commander, presiding, supported by Mr. T. H. Wright and Mr. Gardiner Crane.

In presenting his report for the year, Mr. Franklin said that the outstanding feature of the year's work lay in the erection of a monument to General Ward, leader of the "Ever Victorious Army" at Sungkiang, and a donation of $300 to the Boy Scouts of that place, who are taking care of it. A contribution of $100 to the American Civilian Relief was also made, while tiffins to Admiral Phelps and Sir Robert Ho Tung enlivened the season concluded, Though it was a matter of regret that the tiffin to M. Wilden, French Consul-General, had to be postponed, the Commander's toast to Admiral Gilley last April was an international event of point. The celebrations on Armistice Day were fittingly observed with their Allies, while at the unveiling of the War Memorial last month, they were represented and placed a wreath. Condolences were also sent to Mrs. Harding and a flag presented to the American School. The Legion was represented on the Committees of all American functions during the year, including the Cunningham dinner, July 4, and the Washington Ball.

Mr. Franklin recommended that the organization join with the other veterans in providing watchmen for the War Memorial and that greater co-operation be tendered the other Allied organizations.

The resolution from the Canton Post, recommending to the Naval Department not to send first enlistment men to China, was ordered to be returned to that post with a vote of disapproval.—Proposed by Mr. L. Lehrbas, seconded by Mr. C. S. Franklin.

Upon a suggestion from the Peking Post that resolutions be adopted favouring Congressional assistance to American schools in the Orient, the matter was discussed, and it was finally resolved, on a motion by Mr. S. Chiat, seconded by Mr. Lehrbas, that the executive committee should forward a general statement of their approval of financial aid from any American source.

The following officers were elected:—Commander, Mr. G. Crane; Vice-Commander, Dr. T. B. Dunn; Adjutant, Mr. L. Lehrbas; Treasurer, Mr. R. S. Couvain; Service Officer, Mr. T. Wright; Sgt.-at-arms, Mr. L. G. Husar; Membership Officer, Mr. H. Hill.

In accepting the chair, Mr. Crane said that he hoped for a spirit of co-operation within the Post and a closer co-ordination with other local organizations and was cordially grateful for the honour done him.

THE UNION CLUB

An Encouraging Report at the Annual General Meeting

The annual meeting of the Union Club was held on Wednesday evening in the Club rooms on Hankow Road. Mr. V. G. Lyman, acting president, presided and was supported by Messrs. T. G. Drakeford, J. B. Powell, R. Calder Marshall, Chu Pao-san, Chang Nich-yun and Chun Shut-kai.

In addressing the meeting the Chairman said:—

Reference to the president's address given at the last annual meeting shows that it contained a somewhat pessimistic strain, and it was even suggested that the continued existence of the Club was somewhat at stake unless conditions should improve.

This feeling is easily understood when it is recalled that, financially, the Club had been going behind, to the extent of about $5,000 each year from the time of its organization, and of course, the permanent continuance of this state of affairs could not be contemplated in any very happy vein.

Much to the satisfaction of the committee, therefore, and equally, we feel sure, to that of the members, you have before you this year for the first time, a report which we consider to be of a most encouraging nature. The working account shows a loss of but $657.12 as against $5,299.71 for 1922 and this indicates to the committee that from now on the figures will be on the right side. It may be mentioned that this improved condition has been brought about by the practice of economy without in any way militating against the usefulness of the Club or the comfort of its members. Future committees will doubtless endeavour to follow this same line and with relief from financial anxiety, greater zest will be indicated in, and time given to, the development of the Club in the carrying out of the purposes for which it was formed.

The Commitee feels that the Club is serving an increasingly useful purpose and that the need of having a common meeting ground where they can foregather is constantly becoming more important to representative Chinese and those of English speaking nations. I take it that there is no other similar institution for business men in existence, and therefore its position is unique. At the same time it holds forth a wonderful opportunity for the development of a closer understanding, a deeper sympathy, between the men of the East and of the West who compose its membership.

THE NEW PREMISES.

It is of special interest to all members to know that the Club is removing into more commodious quarters next month. These are located in a new modern type building on Avenue Edward VII, between Szechuen and Kiangse Roads, where we have the entire top floor with largely increased space and conveniences over those made use of in the present building. The new quarters have been arranged solely for Club purposes, and with increased comfort and other advantages which the Club will then offer it is anticipated that there will not only be an increase of members, but a larger attendence from day to day of the present membership.

The fellowship dinners and tiffins have been maintained during the year and these have been of much interest. The number of those who attend remains somewhat stationary. To those who have not attended we can only say that a most delightful function of the Club is being missed and the Committee can only hope that an increased interest in this function will be manifested during the present year.

THE MEMBERSHIP.

The records of the Club show that there were four more members at the end of 1923 than there were at the close of the previous year, and while this does not show any special gain yet it shows that we have not suffered any loss.

There has been some growth in the Associate Membership, the figures being 18 as against 11 a year ago. It would seem that up to the end of the year the provision for associate membership whereby share-holding members are privileged to nominate to this membership men from their respective firms, has not been very fully availed of. I am pleased to inform you, however, that there is evidence of an early increase in this branch of the membership which entails no expense for admittance and the subscription for which is but $5 per month.

The membership at the end of the year stood as follows:—

Resident members	175
Associate ,,	18
Honorary ,,	45
Absent ,,	25
A total of	263

Much to the regret of your Committee, Mr. Wilson, your president, toward the end of the year, was obliged to resign on taking his home leave. Mr. Wilson displayed keen interest in the affairs of the Club, was most efficient in the duties of his office, and freely rendered very valuable technical services in connexion with securing and planning our new quarters.

I do not think it necesesary to refer in further detail to the report that has been placed before you and will conclude by requesting on behalf of the Committee you are about to elect the benefit it will derive from your helpful and sustaining interest.

On a motion by Mr. Lyman and seconded by Mr. Drakeford the report and accounts were adopted.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The following were elected to serve on the committee for the year 1924:—

Messrs. T. G. Drakeford, R. Calder Marshall, A. St. C. Campbell, V. G. Lyman, J. B. Powell, O. G. Steen, Chu Pao San, Chun Shut-kai, T. D. Zar and Pan Ching Poo.

On the proposal of Mr. Drakeford, seconded by Mr. Calder Marshall Mr. Lyman was elected President; Mr. Drakeford was elected foreign Vice-President on Mr. Lyman's motion seconded by Mr. Calder Marshall, while Mr. Chu Pao san became Chinese Vice-President. Proposed by Mr. J. B. Powell seconded by Mr. Chun Shut-kai.

On the motion of Mr. Calder Marshall the meeting tendered a vote of thanks to the committee for their splendid work particularly in that they had put the Club on a sound financial footing.

Union Club Proprietary

The Union Club Proprietary Ld. was next called into session, by the President, Mr. P. W. Massey, who was supported by Messrs. A. Brooke-Smith, J. B. Powell, T. G. Drakeford V. G. Lyman and Chu Pao-san.

The President said:—

Gentlemen, As the report and accounts for the year ended December 31, 1923, have now been in your hands for some time, I shall, with your permission, take them as read.

You will observe that the balance at credit of profit and loss account, after writing off 10 per cent. for depreciation against furniture, etc., only amounts to Tls. 536,61; this with the amount of Tls. 110.53 carried forward from the previous year, makes a total of Tls. 647.14 standing at the credit of profit and loss account which we propose to carry forward to next year's account.

With regard to the item of Tls. 18,331.28 appearing as a debt owing to us by the Union Club of China, it is certain that the Club at the present moment cannot meet this indebtedness, and until they can show a profit on their working account, this item is bound to increase. I can assure you, gentlemen, that the Club Committee have the matter very much at heart, and the accounts this year show that they have reduced the expenses quite considerably, and are looking forward to showing a working account next year with a balance on the right side.

I again state that the purpose of this Company is to sponsor the Club, and until such time as it is able to pay its way, it will be the duty of this Company to back it up. We, however, feel sure that the removal of the Club to its new premises will be a change for the better.

I do not think that there is anything else in regard to the accounts that needs any explanation from me, but before formally proposing their adoption I shall be pleased to answer to the best of my ability any questions which any of you may desire to ask.

The following resolutions were unamiously passed:—

That the report and accounts as presented be passed: proposed by Mr. P. W. Massey, seconded by Mr. Chu Pao-san.

That Messrs. E. F. Mackay and T. G. Drakeford be re-elected directors, proposed by Mr. Massey and seconded by Mr. A. Brooke-Smith.

That Messrs. Lowe Bingham and Matthews be re-elected auditors for the ensuing year at a remuneration of Tls. 50, proposed by Mr. Massey and seconded by Mr. J. B. Powell.

AMERICAN RETURNED STUDENTS CLUB

Annual General Meeting

The third annual meeting of the American Returned Students' Club was held on Wednesday evening at its headquarters, above the Chinese Industrial Bank in Nanking Road. Dinner was first served to the fairly large attendance of members.

In the absence of the President, Mr. H. Y. Moh, who is away in Chengchow on business, Judge T. S. K. Loh presided and appointed Mr. Fred C. Sze to act as temporary secretary on account of Mr. K. S. Tsiang being unable to attend. The chairman had to report, with much regret, the compulsory absence of his colleague in the Vice-Presidency, Dr. W. S. New, through ill-health, and on behalf of the Club, wished him a speedy recovery.

The chairman then dwelt at some length on the steady progress that the Club has made since its organization about three years ago and remarked on the excellent spirit with which 80 "reliable" members had shouldered the finances of the Club Realizing the necessity of raising a foundation fund, he urged every one present to approach all fellow returned students, resident or non-resident, for their moral as well as financial support.

Mr. T. C. Yeh was then called upon to make the treasurer's report, which was accepted as read upon the motion of Mr. H. C. Mei. Brief reports were also made by Mr. Wm. K. H. Yen, representing the House Committee, and Mr. Y. M. Kuo, representing the Membership Committee.

Mr. S. D. Ren gave, on behalf of the Nomination Committee, a list of candidates for the various offices for the next term, and after the inclusion of a few more nominees from the floor, the following officers were elected:—

President, Dr. W. S. New; Vice-Presidents, Judge T. S. K. Loh and Mr. N. L. Han; Secretary, Mr. Fred C. Sze; Treasurer, Mr. T. C. Yeh; House Manager, Dr. L. S. Woo.

Prior to the drawing of two bonds issued by the Club, Mr. N. L. Han remarked that the Club's credit was good since the bonds have been regularly drawn. Mr. K. S. Lee was then asked by the chairman to draw two numbers which happened to be consecutive. They are Nos. 52 and 53. Before the adjournment the Chairman announced that the first executive meeting will be held next Tuesday at noon, at the Club.

SHRINERS' ANNUAL MEETING

The Nomad Oasis (Shriners) held their annual meeting on Tuesday night at the Masonic Hall. Mr. J. Harold Dollar (President) presided and was supported by Messrs. J. Eichwald, J. Potter, C. J. Irons, C. Wentworth, E. H. Himrod, C. Johnson, T. Porter and W. D. Inman (Committee).

In his annual report the President expressed his pleasure at the success of the past year and cited the report of the treasurer as a favourable financial index. The social and business meetings had been characterized by a marked attendance which he hoped would continue through the ensuing year. A short comment on the prospects of the Ceremonial for 1924 was adduced.

The officers of 1923 were re-elected en bloc and consist of Messrs. J. H. Dollar, President, J. Eichwald, Vice-President, C. J. Irons, treasurer, and J. Potter, secretary.

The meeting adjourned after a discussion of the Hykes Memorial proposal at the American School and the entire body attended the dinner given at the Parisien Hotel.

Road, said the accused gave him an order for three suits and an overcoat on September 5. He wanted the overcoat and one suit before going down to Hongkong and witness arranged this for him. He was to pay for the lot by cheque when he returned from Hongkong. He went to that colony and returned—witness was not sure on what date—and called for the other two suits. Witness asked him for a cheque, but he requested that the suits be sent to his address, and said he would send the cheque later. He did not do so, and the other two suits were not sent. Early in January he received a letter from Bowler pleading that his work for the "North-China Daily News" in Hongkong had been unsatisfactory and his expenses heavy. The letter added that he had secured a job with the Asia Life Insurance Co., Inc., and would receive his first month's salary at the end of that month, when he would pay one third of the debt. He would pay the rest the following month. However, nothing was paid. He had formerly represented he had Tls. 2,000 to come from the "North-China Daily News."

LOOKING FOR A ROADSTER.

Julien Heimendinger, manager of the Auto Castle Garage, Avenue Joffre, said Bowler went to the Garage about August 25 and said he was looking for a roadster. He chose a Buick six-cylinder, priced at Tls. 1,250. He went away and said he wished to make arrangements for the purchase. He came to the garage the next day, said he had Tls. 2,000 to come from the "North-China Daily News," and would pay for the car before the end of the month.

Witness gave him driving lessons every morning for some days afterwards, and provided him with two new tyres at a cost of Tls. 50. A shroff was sent to Bowler on several occasions during the following three weeks asking for the money and he was repeatedly put off. Then came a day when witness went round himself and was told to come back at eleven o'clock the next morning. He did so and was informed Bowler had gone to Hongkong the previous day. Witness made inquiries at the "North-China Daily News," but nothing was known there regarding the car.

ALLEGED SALE OF CAR.

Further inquiries were made and they were able to get the car back from the Central Garage. A day or so after this they were approached by a Dr. Lyons, who said that the car was his; he had bought it from Bowler. Witness told Dr. Lyons that Bowler himself had never paid for the car, and he did not hand it over.

Replying to the Magistrate, Mr. Maitland said Dr. Lyons had since left Shanghai and his evidence could not therefore be procured. He understood the defendant and Dr. Lyons had both been living at Shepherd's Hotel.

Mr. J. T. W. Brooke, who was in partnership with Mr. R. W. Davis of the "North-China Daily News" in the compilation of the "China Architects and Builders' Compendium," said Bowler was engaged by them to secure advertisements on a commission basis.

Replying to Mr. Maitland, witness said he did not think it at all likely that Bowler had Tls. 2,000 due to him from this commission on August 27. The total value of the advertisements he managed to get was somewhere in the neighbourhood of Tls. 9,000, of which he was to receive roughly 15 per cent. commission, Tls. 1,300.

Cross-examined by Mr. Reader Harris, witness said Bowler had done very well in Shanghai at this work, but very badly in Hongkong. He was not paid by the "North-China Daily News," but by Mr. Davis and himself.

This concluded the case for the prosecution.

DEFENCE OPENED.

Mr. Reader Harris, in his address to the Bench, pointed out that there were two classes of offences brought against defendants. One was that of obtaining credit by fraud other than false pretences,—an offence under the Debtors' Act. The other class was that of obtaining goods by false pretences, under the Larceny Act.

There were three cases in the first class, and his submission was that there was no evidence of fraud whatsoever. If these three cases did constitute fraud, then there were a great many other people in Shanghai who should be in gaol—indeed there was no gaol large enough to hold them. It had been represented that the fraud lay in Bowler's stating he had Tls. 2,000 to come from the "North-China Daily News." It was denied that he ever did say this, but even if he had it could only have been an exaggeration of fact. When he was working on the conpendium in Shanghai he did very well indeed, and he anticipated doing equally well in Hongkong. With this anticipation he ordered these various goods and articles. Unfortunately, however, he did very badly in Hongkong and his expenses in that Colony eat up all the money he had already earned. When he got back to Shanghai he was employed for two months with the Asia Life Insurance at no salary, after which they agreed to take him on the permanent staff. He was expecting, therefore, salary for his latter work with the Company, but the Hudford Motors people raised a disturbance with his employers and he was dismissed. The result was he had not the money to come he was expecting.

There was one other very important matter. Two big insurance companies intended to put through a big insurance deal whereby they saved the superannuation to their employees by giving them endownment policies. This deal involved between one million and two million dollars and would have meant a large amount to defendant as commission. It was this amount he was expecting with which to pay his debts. He could not put it through, however, because of his dismissal, and he could not mention the scheme to his creditors because it was private, and if known would at that time have aroused considerable interest in some 20 or 30 other insurance companies—would now in fact.

Defendant gave evidence bearing out Mr. Reader Harris's statement. He described his connexion with the "China Architects and Building Compendium" and the non-success which attended his efforts in Hongkong. He was quite under the impression that he was employed by the "North-China Daily News" and not privately by Messrs. Davis and Brooke. He was paid by Mr. Davis with "North-China Daily News" compradore orders, and had cards given him inscribed "North-China Daily News."

Bowler went on to describe his return to Shanghai and his employment with the Asia Life Insurance Company.

The big insurance deal mentioned was one whereby the staffs of the companies were provided with an endowment policy which provided each man with $500 on attaining the age of 60 years. Supposing the deal had been put through he would have made about $50,000 commission, from one company alone. He never sold Dr. Lyons a car.

Cross-examined by Mr. Maitland, witness admitted that it did appear now he was not really employed by the "North-China Daily News" but simply by Messrs. Davis and Brooke.

The case was adjourned till next morning.

The Charges Dismissed

The charges against Norman W. Bowler were dismissed by Mr. G. W. King at H.M. Police Court on Thursday afternoon. In discharging the defendant, the Magistrate described him as "an extravagant young ass" who had lived beyond his income. The charges could not be proved. He would have had no sympathy from him, said his Worship, had Bowler found himself within the walls of the British Gaol.

Bowler again went into the box and the morning was occupied with a lengthy examination of defendant by the Magistrate.

In the course of this examination defendant stated that he was 23 years of age and came to Shanghai from Amoy. On arrival he had not very much money, nor did he come to a job; he was just looking for work. He first engagement was with Dodwell & Co., with whom he stopped for a few days only, after which he was given the commission job with Mr. Davis.

The Magistrate—We have heard you were doing pretty well at that, but why did you get a car?

Bowler (after a pause.)—I thought I would like one, that is all.

The car would have cost just what you had earned would it not?—Yes.

Then how did you propose to deal with that?—By continuing to work.

In other words you were going to live up to and over your income? Defendant made no answer.

You come to Shanghai, a young man engaged in a commission business which you know cannot be permanent, and then you go and buy a car valued at Tls. 1,000. Do you think such a thing justifiable?—It might not have been a wise thing to do, but I cannot see that I was not justified.

"HAD NO COMPETITION."

Then again, why did you go to Hudford's and get a car there. You had already one car taken away because you failed to pay for it. Your position at the time was not sound and although you had permanent employment with the Asia Life you were only on probation, and had not much money to draw?—I thought the business I had on hand would mature. I knew at the time I had no competition.

With regard to this insurance scheme. Can you assure me that you had any reasonable thought the deal would go through. You have told me you are a young man, 23 years of age; there is a good deal of competition in insurance to be met with. Do you honestly think that you who had just come to Shanghai could put through a deal involving such huge sums better than older and more experienced men? Was yours the only brain that could conceive the idea?—(Witness) No I do not think that exactly. The Asia Life were thinking of issuing a new type of insurance policy on January 1, and I saw a way whereby these policies could be made to serve as a group insurance policy for a large number of employees in such a way that superannuation would be saved. That is all I did, particularly, beyond approaching certain people regarding the business. They were interested and stated that they had in fact thought of something like it before, and there was no reason why I should not be the man to put it through for them.

A LITTLE MENTAL ARITHMETIC.

But where does your $50,000 come in?—That is the commission on the insurance. The company employs about 4,000 people and they would each be insured for $500; the 4,000 multiplied by 500 would be two million dollars. The premiums on the two million dollars would be about $1.50 per month on each man,—$6,000 per month. The first year's premiums would, of course, have to be paid up in one sum. Multiply your $6,000 by 12, take away 50 per cent. and you have my commission, roughly $40,000.

Then (continued the Magistrate) this idea came to your mind when these new policies were to be issued?—There are in Shanghai no companies which will issue what we call in insurance, group policies, where Chinese are concerned owing to the fact that the mortality rate of the Chinese is so uncertain. Then—.

"Really," interposed the Magistrate, "I think the China Mutual have been running for years on their knowledge."

Yes, but I do not think they have ever issued a group policy—that is a policy covering a number of employees, without examination. I believe it was once done by a Chinese company at one of the cotton mills, but it is at all times a hazardous experiment. If the companies would go in for these policies it would mean a tremendous amount of business in Shanghai for us.

But if the companies have not done it in the past, why should you think your scheme would be accepted?—Because of the nature of the Asia Life's new scheme. They were bringing out a new policy for a very much smaller amount than any other company had ever done before in Shanghai. The medical examination too, was not so severe as for the ordinary type of insurance policy. I think the scheme is possible, and I would not be surprised if the Asia Life are doing it right now.

Further questioned as to whom he approached, Bowler stated that he saw Mr. C. V. Starr, president of the company, who greeted the idea favourably.

This completed the Magistrate's questions.

At the request of Mr. Reader Harris, who said he wished to call Mr. Starr, the Magistrate adjourned the case until the afternoon.

On the resumption, Mr. Reader Harris said he had approached Mr. Starr who had replied that he had already been asked to give evidence for the prosecution and refused, and therefore he did not think it would be proper for him to give evidence for the defence, without being subpœnaed. As he did not particularly desire an unwilling witness Mr. Reader Harris said he had let the matter drop. He observed, however, that Mr. Maitland had brought in Mr. Hearne, manager of the Manufacturers Life Insurance, Ld.

INSURANCE MANAGER'S ADVICE.

Mr. Arthur George Hearne was then called. Examined by Mr. Maitland he stated that he was manager of the Manufacturers Life Insurance, Ld., for Shanghai and district. Bowler was introduced to him by Mr. C. V. Starr in February, and he did mention a scheme for insuring all the employees of a big firm. Witness was interested, but pointed out to Bowler that it was rather difficult to close a big deal of the sort, and advised him to work a few smaller cases first before embarking on anything so big, in order to earn his bread and butter. The scheme was one that might succeed or it might not and in any case it would take some time. Witness was not working on it himself and did not intend to do so. He had to make his money by quicker returns than would be got that way. He could not say whether it was really a sound proposition or not because he had not interviewed any of the people with whom Bowler was interested. He had two or three interviews with the accused and they made an appointment to go round and see one or two people on a Saturday morning, but although he waited in his office all the morning Bowler did not turn up and so he dropped the matter.

Mr. Maitland asked witness whether the scheme was so sound in his opinion that he would make an advance on it, and if he ever had made any advances to Bowler.

The reply was that Bowler had asked him to make advances on the scheme but he had refused and reiterated his advice to the young man to first try and put through some smaller cases which witness would close for him. That would be better than trying to handle a deal of the nature suggested.

NOT A "WILD CAT SCHEME."

The Magistrate (to witness)—There would be a possibility of money being made in a scheme like this supposing you got the right people interested? It is not entirely what you might call an "up in the air" scheme?—It is certainly not a "wild cat scheme" and money could be made out of it. Indeed, it is being done in many parts of the world to-day.

The Magistrate, before counsel addressed the Bench, intimated that in three of the charges he held no case could be substantiated. Therefore they could leave those right out. The Hudford Motors and Mrs. Wallace's were the only charges they need argue upon.

Mr. Maitland first dealt with the case of the car obtained from the Hudford Motors. Bowler purchased the car in December. Mr. Hearne had told them that this insurance scheme would take some time to put through, and they had it in evidence that he was still thinking about it in February. Therefore when he gave for the car a post-dated cheque in December he could not possibly have had any expectations of money coming from that source with which to meet the account. It had also been stated in evidence that Bowler had given the motor people to understand he had Tls. 2,000 due from the "North-China Daily News." This statement was manifestly untrue because during the whole of the time he worked for Messrs. Davis and Brooke the sum total of his earnings was Tls. 1,300. Out of this he had to live and clothe himself between the months of July and November.

Then there was the case of Mrs. Wallace. He had lived at the house for over a month and during that time paid nothing for the room, board or garage. He had given her two cheques, both of which were dishonoured.

Mr. Reader Harris argued that there was no false pretence in giving a post-dated cheque. The document was really more in the nature of an I.O.U., for when it was given no representation was made that there were funds in the bank to meet it. This was, of course, always provided the cheque was on a bank in which an account was held. People in Shanghai used them every day. Then they had the evidence which showed that the accused really was engaging in the insurance scheme they had heard so much about, and he submitted that when he bought these various things he did so in all good faith fully expecting the money to come in from the commission he was to receive. In doing this he was, perhaps, rather foolish and unduly optimistic, but they had to remember he was a young man, and perhaps inexperienced.

"EXTRAVAGANT YOUNG ASS."

His Worship, summing up, remarked that as he had elected to deal with the case summarily it was his duty to address himself as he would to a jury. There was a considerable amount of difference between life in England and life in Shanghai, and he had to consider this when applying English Law in Shanghai.—"In England you cannot get credit unless you are exceptionally well known. On the other hand you can get credit in Shanghai as a rule and not as an exception. Take this young man of 23. He came here to no definite position, he came in the smumer, and in July he does very well in this commission business. Instead of behaving reasonably he goes and buys a motor-car. He lives and dresses up to his income. In fact one can say that he has been altogether an extravagant young ass, but so far he had done nothing criminal. But when he finds the money going it does not bring him up with a round turn, but instead he goes to Case and orders suits; there again you have the difference between Shanghai and England. He gets credit. He makes no fraudulent representation and the goods are delivered. After his journey to Hongkong he comes back to Shanghai and gets employment. Then he starts on a real career of extravagance. He gets a car at Hudfords and gives a post-dated cheque for $2,000. . . If I seem harsh in speaking of him as an extravagant young ass I think that I am justified. Three of the charges I hold cannot be substantiated."

His Worship went on to review the evidence on the other two charges, concluding with the statement that if a jury had been sitting he believed, though reluctantly, that they would have held there was a doubt in the case and dismissed the charges. If Bowler had found himself between the walls of the Amoy Road Gaol the Magistrate would have had no sympathy for him. As it was it was his duty to discharge him. The cases would be dismissed.

AN application, in which Yao Pah-ling was the plaintiff and S. G. Halse the defendant, was made to his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner at H. M. Supreme Court on Monday, for a declaration that Consular Lot No. 9520 is registered in the books for the registration of land at H. M. Consulate-General in the name of Noel Charles Minchin Home, deceased, in trust for the plaintiff and for an order that such lot be transferred into the names of R.F.C. Master and M. R. Harris. Mr. M. B. Brown explained that he appeared for both plaintiff and defendant. It was purely a friendly action and was brought because Mr. Halse, who was shortly leaving Shanghai, wished to obtain the protection and a declaration of the Court. Mr. Brown said he would be able to satisfy the Court that the property actually was held in trust for the late Mr. Home. The case was set down for hearing on Thursday next.

Witness was always walking round and usually had occasion to speak to him several times.

Cross-examined by the Crown Advocate, witness said there were two other gates which only led out to the Creek and boats.

The trial was adjourned till next morning, bail being allowed.

A Verdict of Not Guilty

At the conclusion of Wednesday's hearing the jury found Sadara Singh not guilty of the charge brought against him and he was accordingly discharged.

The principal witness for the defence on Wednesday was Mr. Burgess, formerly assistant cashier with the American Express Co. He said that on a date at the end of January an Indian came to see him, presented his ordinary calling card, on which was printed Sucha Singh, and asked to withdraw his money. Witness did not keep the card.

Mr. Kentwell—Can you identify the prisoner as that Indian?—(Witness)—No.

Mr. Burgess went on to say, in reply to further questions, that he was asked to go to the mill to try and identify the Indian who visited the bank. In witness's opinion that Indian was not in the group.

Questioned by his Lordship, witness said he had nothing to do with the paying out of the money. He did not hear any discussion until after it had been discovered that apparently the wrong man had been paid.

NOT A GUILTY ACTION.

Mr. Kentwell, in his closing speech for the defence, described the case as a curious one. First of all he reminded the jury that it was no concern of theirs what where the methods of the bank. Going back to the first date of importance, January 8, counsel asked: Why had accused returned the pass-book on Feruary 13 if he had then drawn out all the money. Had he had a guilty conscience he would certainly have put off the complainant as long as possible. He could have put him off for a considerable time, but this he did not, and it was quite natural that suspicion should have fallen on Sadara as he had the original pass-book.

For the Crown, Mr. Wilkinson reminded the jury that if they brought in a verdict of not guilty it would mean that what Mr. Riggs had said was entirely wrong. It did not interest the bank as to who the man was. It happened that this mistake had been made, and counsel would therefore ask them to attach due and proper weight to the identification of Mr. Riggs and the Chinese shroff.

BANK AND DUPLICATE PASS BOOK.

His Lordship, in his summing-up, said there was only one real point in the case. If prisoner were the man who signed the blue form, he had committed a forgery; further he uttered it by handing it to the bank and getting money in exchange for it, and if he had done that it was with intent to defraud. There was no doubt that the case was a curious one. Not only had the letters were complicated by the the forged document, but mat-handing out by the bank of a duplicate pass-book. Had the word "duplicate," however, been written on it, the bank would have been much more careful when paying the money out. It was strange that that had not been done; it was strange that the pass-book was handed out to some Indian on January 25 on apparently very little proof that the other book had been lost, and there had been no identification of the individual who asked for it except the production of a printed visiting card. As for the money which had actually been deposited at the bank by Sucha Singh, as had already been pointed out, he would not lose it whether the prisoner was found guilty or acquitted.

There was one curious omission in the case for the prosecution. There was not a rag of evidence nor any suggestion to show how Sadara Singh was sufficiently alive to the signature on the specimen card, if Sadara were the man who went to the bank. His Lordship reminded the jury that there was no hostility between Sucha Singh and the prisoner. They were friends and prisoner quite voluntarily returned the pass-book. Furthermore there was no suggestion that Sadara was in any want of money. As regards the evidence of identification, the jury had to be careful, and the Judge reminded them of the famous case at Home where a man had been convicted on evidence of identification, but after five years' imprisonment was found not to have been guilty and given a free pardon.

After an absence of half an hour the jury returned with a verdict of not guilty, and the Judge discharged the prisoner. In thanking the jury for their attendance, his Lordship said the case had not been an easy one to try, and he was bound to say that the difficulties fully justified the verdict brought in. He directed that the jurors should be exempted from further service for a year.

A BURIAL PLACE IN YUYUEN ROAD

Interesting Points Raised in Court

In H. M. Supreme Court on Thursday, His Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner heard the case of Yao Pah-liang v. S. J. Halse, in which the plaintiff sought a declaration that British Consular lot No. 9,520 registered in the books for the registration of land at H. B. M. Consulate-General at Shanghai in the name of Noel Charles Minchin Home (now deceased) was held by the said N. C. M. Home in trust for the plaintiff, and also asked for an order that such lot be transferred in the names of R. F. C. Master and M. Reader Harris. Mr. M. B. Brown appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. Halse conducted his case in person.

In opening the case Mr. Brown explained that the land in question was situated in Yuyuen Road and for many years had been the graveyard property of the Yao family. In 1918 it was desired to register the lot as a British consular lot, and the Chinese title was accordingly [illegible] and eventually the land was registered in the name of the China Land & Building Co., Ld. For some reason that was not made clear, no declaration of trust was ever given. The next thing that happened was that that company went into liquidation. In July, 1919, the lot was accordingly transferred to Mr. Home, but again no declaration of trust was made. Mr. Home died early in 1920, his executrix being his mother in England. His estate in Shanghai was wound up by Mr. Halse and Mr. S. B. Neill, and in the probate papers the land was not included in Mr. Home's estate. The present action was for a declaration that the lot in question was beneficially owned by the plaintiffs, and in support of this he would call evidence to show that state of affairs.

A DIFFICULT POSITION.

Mr. Halse said that the plaintiff was in his present position owing to his own fault. Mr. Home died in January, 1920, and his estate was wound up in the spring of 1921. At an early stage the question of this lot was taken up, the administrators being satisfied that it was not the property of Mr. Home. In spite of repeated requests the plaintiffs would not take up the matter with the executors who told them that what they wanted was reasonable evidence that the land was theirs. They wanted some documentary evidence in the form of a receipt for the title deeds.

His Lordship pointed out that in a case of this sort it would be the correct course to advertise for any other claimants to the property in question, but there was also the point whether Mr. Halse actually had the power in such a case to make the transfer.

In giving evidence Mr. Halse said he was not faced so much with a doubt as to whether he could sign a transfer but a conviction that he could not. When Mr. Home died his mother, as executrix, forwarded a power of attorney. This lady died a few months later, and Mr. Douglas Ralph Home, her son, became her executor. It was possible that he had sent out a second power of attorney from England, but witness could not be certain. He also had since died. As there were two deaths to revoke his power of attorney, Mr. Halse doubted his ability to sign a deed of transfer.

Evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was then heard, bearing out counsel's statement as to ownership.

In giving his decision the Judge said:—"There will be judgment for a declaration that the plaintiff, as the representative of the Yao family, is the beneficial owner of the land, that the defendant is the duly appointed administrator in the jurisdiction of this Court of the estate of N. C. M. Home, deceased, but he is expressly claiming no interest in the land, and he is still entitled to sign on behalf of the estate."

DRAMATIC SEQUEL TO ROWARTH CASE

Witness's Alleged Perjury: British Police Court Charge

A further development occurred in connexion with the Rowarth case on Tuesday afternoon, when one of the witnesses, William Henry Goulbourn, (married), chartered accountant, of 65 Haskell Road, appeared before Mr. G. W. King, at H. M. Police Court to answer charges of perjury. The charges set out that defendant, being a person lawfully summoned as a witness in a judicial proceeding on June 28, 1923, knowingly and falsely swore in H.B.M. Supreme Court that one Edith Judith Rowarth did not leave her daughter's house before 8.30 p.m. on the evening of May 4, 1923,—contrary to Section 1 of the Perjury Act. Prisoner, it is further alleged, with others not in custody, between May 4 and June 29, 1923, conspired with Cecilia Sequeira, a Portuguese subject, to defeat the ends of justice by keeping a material witness in hiding and from appearing at the trial of Rex. v. Rowarth, on a charge of attempted murder.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, Police Prosecutor, offered only evidence of arrest and asked for a remand in order that two other persons involved might be apprehended.

His Worship remarked that perjury was obviously an offence which could not be dealt with summarily, and provided a primâ facie case were made out there would have to be a commital.

Det.-Sub. Inspector Quayle gave evidence of arresting Goulbourn at the offices of the Union Insurance Society of Canton, 4 The Bund. When the charge was read over to him he made no reply.

The case was remanded till Tuesday next at 10 o'clock, bail being allowed, in the sum of $500 in two sureties.

A PROBLEM ON NATIONALITY

An interesting problem of nationality arose in H.M. Police Court on Monday morning when an Egyptian came before Mr. G. W. King charged with being drunk and disorderly.

The Magistrate said that the question had arisen as to whether the defendant, one M. Suliman, alias Sulivan was really entitled to British citizenship. The rules and conditions under which Egyptians were recognized were peculiar. During the war Egypt was a British protectorate and its people therefore British subjects. Now that protectorate no longer existed and special conditions had been drawn up regarding the people. He adjourned the case till the afternoon for inquires to be made.

Inquiries were made accordingly and the Consular authorities refused to recognize Suliman as British. He was, therefore, sent for trial at the Mixed Court.

NORMAN BOWLER AT H. M. POLICE COURT

Alleged Serious Frauds: Story of Purchase of Motor-car: His "Fad" for Furniture

Serious allegations of fraud were preferred against the young man Norman W. Bowler on Monday when he made his appearance on remand before Mr. G. W. King on the charges of obtaining from Dodge & Seymour, Ld., a motor-car valued at Tls. 1,500 by false pretences, credit to the amount of $357.11 from Mrs. Wallace, 14 Route de Grouchy, $1,053.93 from Arts & Crafts, Ld., and $330 from Jack Case, by fraud other than false pretences.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, Police Prosecutor, now appeared to prosecute and prisoner was represented by Mr. M. Reader Harris.

At the outset of the proceedings the Magistrate intimated that he intended to try the case summarily. He understood the motor-car had been returned, while the furniture was still in existence and could be given back to Arts & Crafts, Ld., little the worse. By this means the amount of the alleged frauds would be considerably reduced and would bring the case within the jurisdiction of his Court.

Mrs. T. M. Wallace said she kept two paying guests at her home in Route de Grouchy, and on January 15 defendant was one. He took two fully furnished rooms, with board, and leased a garage. He was to be charged Tls. 180 for board and lodging and Tls. 10 for the garage. On February 27 he left her to go to the Victoria Nursing Home. He had previously said he was with the Asia Life Insurance Co. She tendered the account half way through the month and he put her off, stating that he was busy and rather pressed owing to the Chinese New Year. She approached him a day or so later and he gave her a cheque for $357. She presented the cheque to the bank and it was returned because there were "not sufficient funds" to meet it. She spoke to Bowler again and he then said he had cabled his father in England and expected money at the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank any day. On February 5 he told her that if she presented the cheque at the bank again it would be met. Her husband went to the bank, but the cheque was returned. He left them on February 9 and they saw him the following morning, but he again failed to pay. He put her off on other occasions and once offered to guarantee that the landlord should have his rent by February 22. When February 24 arrived, however, neither she nor the landlord had been paid, and today he owed her $358.

A FAD FOR FURNITURE.

Mrs. Wallace added that defendant brought a certain amount of furniture and fittings with him, including a writing desk, an arm chair, a desk chair and certain electrical fittings. He remarked to her that he had a fad for that sort of thing.

Mr. Donald S. Riggs, of the American Express Company Banking-Corporation, said Bowler opened an account with the Bank in June, 1923. On January 7 he had a balance of $39.53. On December 14 the account had actually been closed, but the $39.53 was a cheque they had in hand to his credit. On January 14 the sum of $300 was paid in by Bowler and accepted in error by a Chinese receiving clerk. The Bank had wished to close his account of their own accord, though witness did not know why.

CHEQUES RETURNED.

Replying to Mr. Maitland, witness said that had a cheque of Bowler's for Tls. 1,500 been presented on January 15 it would not have been met. Several cheques were handed in and returned for sums larger than the amount to his credit. At the present time there was a balance of $1.75 to his credit.

Mr. F. B. Bills, manager of the Hedford Motors, said Bowler came to the garage on December 22 and bought an Essex car for which he tendered a cheque for Tls. 1,500, post dated. When the date fell due, January 7, the cheque was returned. He accepted a post dated cheque because Bowler said he had some money due from the "North-China Daily News," enough to cover the price of the car. As he had a good appearance and good address witness believed him. On January 15 he obtained another cheque, but this was no good either. Pressed for the money he finally returned the car.

QUICKEST DEAL EVER PUT THROUGH.

Cross-examined witness said the deal, when made, was the quickest they had ever put through.

Mr. A. Taylor, of the sales department of the Hudford Motors, also gave evidence. He stated that they allowed defendant credit because he said he had commissions from the "North-China Daily News," a well known and respectable firm.

Mr. R. W. Davis, Managing Director of the "North-China Daily News," said Bowler was employed on a commission basis by the paper. He obtained advertisements for the Christmas issue. On December 22 he had been paid all that was owing to him, and was no longer employed. He was only working on the Christmas issue, for about a fortnight or a month.

Cross-examined, witness said Bowler was given visiting cards in one corner of which—given purely as an address—was the title "North-China Daily News." He went to Hongkong for the firm, and drew during the time he was away $600 for expenses. In addition to being employed with the "North-China Daily News" itself he was also employed to aid in the assistance of the compilation of a compendium by Messrs. Davis and Brooke. He had no money due from either the paper or the compendium on December 22.

Mr. Mitchell Berry, salesman of Arts & Crafts Ld., described how defendant, in January, purchased furniture for his flat to the value of $1,053.90. Arts & Crafts were decorating the flat partially. The furniture was supplied on the strength of Bowler's position with the "North-China Daily News." A settle ordered by Bowler worth over $200 was stopped on Wednesday morning when they knew he was in difficulties.

At this stage the hearing was adjourned until Wednesday.

Bowler's Business Prospects

At Wednesday's hearing evidence was given concerning a two million dollar insurance scheme.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, Police Prosecutor, announced that there was one more charge to be added, namely, "that on August 27 of last year defendant did unlawfully obtain at Shanghai a motor-car and two tyres valued at Tls. 1,300 by false pretences, the false pretences consisting of untrue statements that he had the sum of Tls. 2,000 due to him from the "North-China Daily News."

The Magistrate raised some objection to this charge being added at the last moment. He pointed out that at the first hearing of the case he had taken into consideration the fact that the motor-car and furniture had been returned to their original owners, thus bringing the value of the alleged frauds down, and agreed to try the case summarily. Now came this further charge putting up the value of the money concerned considerably and leaving the Magistrate in a somewhat embarrassed position. He asked what guarantee he had that the police would not keep on bringing forward additional charges, in which case he would have to commit the case to the upper court, even though he had pledged himself to try the case summarily.

The only course he could see would be to take the cases separately and this would probably be harmful to the defendant.

Mr. Maitland said the police had only heard of this last charge on the previous day. They could not possibly have included it before.

Mr. Reader Harris (defending) strongly objected to the cases being tried separately. It would mean, he said, that if acquitted of these other charges his client would simply be re-arrested on leaving the Court.

After further discussion the magistrate agreed to take the cases together.

A PIECE GOODS TRADE MARK

Successful Action by Bradford Dyers' Association: Injunction Against a Chinese Company

We give below the full text of an important Mixed Court judgment on the subject of trade mark infringement, and delivered by Mr. A. J. Martin, British Assessor, and Magistrate Kuan. The case originally came forward in November last and the plaintiffs were the Bradford Dyers' Association Ltd., who took action against the Lee Wo Dying and Weaving factory for an injunction restraining them from infringing a special piece goods trade mark. Plaintiffs' petition was granted.

Counsel engaged in the case were Messrs. Hansons, and Messrs. Platt & Co., for plaintiffs, and Messrs. Krisel & Krisel for defendants.

In this case the Plaintiffs, the Bradford Dyers' Association pray for an injunction restraining the Defendants, the Lee Wo Dyeing and Weaving Factory from using as their trade name the characters (麗華染織工廠) or any variation thereof of which the characters (麗華染) form part, and from fixing or attaching, or causing to be fixed or attached, to any cloth of the Defendants or otherwise employing, or circulating, or causing to be employed or circulated, any label, ticket notice or advertisement in which the trade name of the Defendants is represented by the characters (麗華染織工廠) or any variation thereof of which the characters 麗華染 form part.

The Defendants in reply allege that they were [illegible] and in good faith carrying on business under the name Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang (麗華染織工廠).

The facts of this case as given in the evidence are as follows:

The Plaintiffs are an Association of over 40 Dyeworks, whose business is dyeing and finishing piece goods. The Association opened an office in China in March 1902, its object being to advertise and extend the sale of the products of the Association.

One of the first steps of the Association was to adopt a Chinese Hong name, and the name adopted was Lee Wo Jan Fang Kung Ssu (麗華染坊公司) i.e. Lee Wo Dyeing Company. This Hong name was registered in London under the trademark Act in 1902 and with the Imperial Maritime Customs in Shanghai. The character Lee means by itself "beautiful" and the character Wo by itself "flowery" or "beautiful." In combination they were used as a Hong name in the same way as Ewo (of which E 怡 means harmony and Wo 和 means harmony) has been adopted as the Hong name and all piece goods have been imported wrapped in paper stamped with the Hong name since 1902.

The Association started an advertising campaign and from 1905 they employed runners to distribute samples and advertisements to all places of importance in China where piece goods are sold. Their records show that Wusih was included in the places visited by their runners as far back as 1905. In 1910 Plaintiffs sent signboards all over China and 17 of these were sent to Wusih. There has been a continuous advertising campaign and a considerable increase in business and an improvement in the quality of goods taken by the China Market until the Plaintiffs' Association handled 60 per cent. of the dyed piece goods imported into China and 75 per cent. of the dyed goods coming from England. Plaintiffs state that they receive letters from all over China expressing approval of their goods.

In August 1923 the Manager of the Plaintiff Association was shown patterns of Defendants piece goods containing the Hong name Lee Wo Jan Chin Jung Ch'ang (麗華染織工廠). Mr. Allen the Manager of the Plaintiffs' Company stated that he could not distinguish his patterns from those of the Defendant Company.

The name of the Bradford Dyers' Association does not appear on the cloth dyed by the members of the Association but the letters B D A appear on the cloth while the Defendants have a trade mark representing Two Flying Boys. A representative of the Defendant Company came to see Mr. Allen in August and maintained that as their cloth was stamped with the sign Two Flying Boys there would be no confusion and refused to discontinue the use of the characters. (麗華染).

The Defendants are a partnership. There was a partnership running a factory called Kuan Hua Pu Ch'ang. In 1917 this business was divided and some of the partners established a new factory under the name Kuang Hua Pu Ch'ang, while other of the partners, of whom Mr. Ch'en Ching T'ang was one, established the Defendants' business under the name Lee Wo Pu Ch'ang. Mr. Ch'en stated that at the time the name Lee Woo was adopted he did not know of any firm in any line of business which had the name Lee Wo and that he did not know the Bradford Dyers' Association were known as Lee Wo until he met Mr. Allen in August 1923. The name Lee Wo Pu Ch'ang (Lee Wo Cloth Factory) was changed to Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang (Lee Wo Dyeing and Weaving Factory) in the same year 1917.

Mr. Ch'en testified that the Defendant Company did not dye or finish any cloth at all. Their only business is weaving cloth. They sometimes buy white yarn and dye it, and sometimes buy coloured yarn and sometimes send white cloth manufactured by them to other people to be dyed. The name Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang (Lee Wo Dyeing Factory) was adopted in order that people might know that they produce coloured cloth. Factories entitled Pu Ch'ang would be understood to produce white cloth only.

Defendants admit that Plaintiffs have spent money advertising the name Lee Wo but maintain that Lee Wo is merely a descriptive term and as such there can be no exclusive right to the use of it. The Court is of opinion that Lee Wo is not a merely descriptive term used for describing goods but is a Hong name and as much the Hong name of the Bradford Dyers' Association as Ewo is of Jardine Matheson & Co. or Wayfoong is of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.

The Plaintiffs have made no allegation of fraud against the Defendants, and the only issue is whether the adoption and use by the Defendants of the name Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang is likely to mislead purchasers into believing that they are purchasing the goods of the Bradford Dyers' Association (Lee Wo Jan Fang Kung Ssu).

The Court is of the opinion that the adoption by the Defendants of a name of which the first three characters Lee Wo Jan (麗華染) are those of the Plaintiff Association is bound to mislead purchasers into believing that they are purchasing the goods of the Plaintiff Association.

Mr. K'u Tsu Pu, Manager of the Ta Feng Piecegoods Company and President of the Freign Piecegoods Guild, who was called as a witness for the Defendants, admitted that if last summer he had heard anyone speak of Lee Wo He would have thought they referred to the Plaintiffs and that if both Plaintiffs and Defendants were dyeing works there would be confusion. He also admitted that two or three years ago he had objected to another firm adopting the name Ta Feng, because his firm and the other firm both dealt in woollen goods, although his firm is a wholesale firm and the other firm was a retail firm.

Mr. Wu Ching Hao, President of the Piecegoods Union, giving evidence for the Defendants, stated that the Defendants' products being native products could be easily distinguished from the products of the Plaintiffs, but when confronted in Court with patterns of Defendants' and Plaintiffs' products was quite unable to distinguish which was which.

A Postcard addressed to the Defendants has been delivered to the Plaintiffs and the Court is of opinion that the similarity in the two names is sufficient to account for the mistake.

The Court is satisfied that the adoption by the Defendants of the name Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang cannot but mislead innocent purchasers into believing that they are purchasing Plaintiffs' goods and therefore gives judgment for the Plaintiffs and grants the injunction prayed for and further orders that defendants deliver to Plaintiffs within one month all labels tickets notices and advertisements in which the trade name of the Defendants is represented by the characters (麗華染織工廠) or by any variation thereof, of which the characters (麗華染) form part.

THE QUESTION OF FRAUD.

Fraudulent intent on the part of the Defendants has not been alleged and it is not necessary to decide whether or not the Defendants adopted the name to which objection has been taken with intent to deceive. But after hearing the evidence in the case it is difficult for the Court to believe the statement of Mr. Ch'en Ching T'ang a partner in the Defendants' factory, that when in 1917 the name Lee Wo Pu Ch'ang was adopted as the name of the factory and when later in the same year the name was changed to Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang the defendants were unaware of the existence of the Bradford Dyers' Association. In as much as the Defendants state that they do not dye any cloth it is difficult to believe that the word "Jan" was incorporated in its name without intent to deceive. Furthermore the Defendants have furnished clear evidence of intention to mislead in a letter which they addressed to the Wusih Chamber of Commerce after the first hearing in the case with a request for assistance. Their letter was published in the "Sinwanpao" on December 12, 1923 and the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce wrote a letter which was forwarded to this Court and which we feel sure they would not have written if they had not been mislead by the statements of the Defendants nor if they had been in possession of the facts as disclosed at the trial of the case.

It is significant that in writing to the Wusih Chamber of Commerce the Defendants did not venture once to call themselves the name Lee Wo Jan Chih Kung Ch'ang, their use of which name has led to this action, but call themselves Lee Hua Pu Ch'ang, or Lee Hua Cloth Factory.

ROBBERS SENTENCED

Ten and Five-Year Terms for Members of Dangerous Gang

Three men alleged to have participated in an armed robbery on Chaoufoong Road on February 17, on the premises occupied by a pawnshop, were brought to trial at the Mixed Court on Monday morning before Mr. Martin and Magistrate Kuan. Third accused was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment and the other two to five years each.

The chief witness called by Chief Det.-Insp. Cruickshank was a young shop assistant who told the Court that he with others were at the shop at seven o'clock as the men came in. Two came right inside, while the third stood on guard at the door. The one carrying a pistol broke a window with the butt end of it.

Several watches were produced and one identified as having been stolen.

The Inspector—Are any of the robbers in Court?—There they are (pointing to first and third, who stood in the dock).

Are you sure?

Witness walked to the dock and pointed directly at the first and third. "The third accused carried the knife," he said.

Witness afterwards expressed doubt that first accused was in Court, but remained positive in the case of the third prisoner. The robbery had been committed by tall men, witness added.

All three prisoners were put into the witness box and questioned by the Magistrate.

Before giving their verdict the Bench asked Chief Insp. Cruickshank whether he had any comments to make, to which he replied. "We have not got the principals of the gang, but it is obvious to the Court that these men are implicated, and we may eventually get the ringleaders. The third accused is a crafty one with brains, though he prefers to assume the rôle of a simpleton."

Passing sentence of five and 10-year terms, the Bench ordered the confiscation of the automatic pistol and the wrench used as a dummy gun.

THE THEFTS FROM THE KASHGAR

Further Evidence Against Accused

Further evidence was heard at the Mixed Court on Wednesday morning in the charges against nine defendants, who are accused of having stolen 14 boxes of cloth and the contents of sundry broken boxes from the P. & O. S. Kashgar on January 8. Det.-Insp. Reeves prosecuted for the police, Mr. Mancel Reece appeared for the complainants while Dr. Fischer and Mr. J. R. Brown acted for certain of the prisoners.

One of the accused denied signing a certain statement which implicated him, and said that if he had known what was contained in the document he would never have affixed his signature and further that he did not understand at a previous hearing the questions put to him incriminating him, or he would not have admitted what he had. He denied all charges completely. Another called from the dock to the box admitted signing a statement and said it was correct. He had only seen two boys carrying out two rolls of cloth from which he got six yards which he sold to the tea seller. He did not know whether two rolls or 200 were taken, nor did he know any of the accused.

Det.-Insp. Reeves told the Court that he had talked readily at the Station and proved very willing to tell what he knew. He had identified Sz from among five others as being the receiver of some of the goods, but at yesterday's hearing he said that no one else was present when he was asked to point out the receiver. The fourth accused told him about Sz, so he knew all about him. They had been arrested on the same day in Chinese territory but he had not met him until they had been in custody two days.

The man charged with receiving, denied the charge completely and said that the fourth accused was angry with him because of a fight that they had had last summer when the latter had tried to borrow $10 from him during a gambling game and he refused to lend it. He said that he had been away from home for 10 days at the time of the robbery because his wife had gone to her people to have her eyes examined and as he had no one to cook his rice, he had gone to his brother's to live. His home was two roads from the river. It was put to him that his wife was dangerously ill at the time so he said that he was away only a part of the time. Later, he said that she was away 14 days, then admitted, as the prosecution showed that she had stayed in the next house, that such was true.

The hearing had not concluded when the Court adjourned.

CHILEANS AND EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY

Privileges Asserted in Mixed Court Case: Two Defendants

The question whether Chileans are entitled to extraterritorial privileges was argued at the Mixed Court on Thursday, when a man named Yip Ching-ho was charged before Mr. Jacobs and Magistrate Kuan with malicious prosecution.

Dr. Sellett said that though he had tried to get correspondence from official sources on the subject of the actual treaty he had been unable to do so. Therefore he must perforce submit the treaty itself. The interest of his client was not so great as that of the Chilean Consul, who was not represented in Court. The treaty in question was signed on February 18, 1915 and Art. 11 was as follows:—"The Government of China and the Government of Chile shall have the right to appoint Diplomatic Agents, Consuls-General and Consuls shall enjoy the same immunities...as are and may be conceded to the Diplomatic and Consular Agents of the most favoured Powers."

Continuing, Dr. Sellett said the Swiss treaty of 1918 which contains an identical article (Art. 11), concedes rights of extraterritoriality, but that this treaty contains an explanatory declaration which being drawn up later might imply the same rights to the citizens under the Chilean treaty.

The Bench reserved their decision until Tuesday, stating that a message had just been received from the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs that a telegram had come from Peking which had a bearing on the point in question.

MIXED COURT PROCEDURE

Chinese Lawyer's Plea on Behalf of Defendants Seriously Charged

An interesting suggestion is made to Magistrate Kuan, Senior Mixed Court Magistrate, in a letter from a Chinese lawyer, Mr. Sung Sz-siang, concerning the defence of prisoners charged with high crimes and misdemeanours. He points out that in the Mixed Court these men are not allowed a free legal advice and attendance, and as the most of them are ignorant and illiterate they are not able to put forward their defence in the manner it should be put forward, and it may sometimes happen that an innocent man is convicted. The letter goes on to remark that according to Article 178 of the Penal Code prisoners charged with offences punishable by imprisonment of the Third Degree are entitled to a lawyer provided at the expense of the Court. Similarly the privilege is extended in nearly all foreign countries and is sanctioned by a Presidential Mandate of July 1 in the 11th year of the Republic (1922). He is of opinion that the same privilege should be extended to Mixed Court prisoners and asks Magistrate Kuan to forward the suggestion to the Consular Body for approval.

IMPERIAL WIRELESS

Marconi Co.'s Plea for Unity of Control: Post Office Duties Not Clearly Defined

London, Mar. 7.

The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company have addressed a letter to the Premier, expressing the hope that the Company will be allowed an opportunity of stating their case before the Government come to a decision on the recommendations of the Imperial Wireless Committee.

The Company state their reasons for the request, including a suggestion that it is essential, in order to secure real efficiency, that all long-distance stations in the country should be worked under one administration.

The Company hope that the Government will be willing to refer to arbitration two points on which agreement with the Post Office has not been reached (whether the Post Office shall own and operate all Empire wireless stations in Britain or, alternatively, whether exception shall be made in the case of Canada and the existing competition between the Post Office and the Anglo-Canadian wireless be continued) and allow the agreement, which could then be completed within 48 hours, to be proceeded with. Otherwise, the Company suggest an arrangement for joint working between the Government and the Company on lines similar to those introduced in Australia.—Reuter.

THE INDIAN BUDGET REJECTED

Government Proposals Overthrown by Swarajist Opposition

Nagpur, Mar. 9.

The obstructionist tactics of the Swarajists in the Central Provinces Legislative Council have culminated in the total rejection of the Budget. A salary of only two rupees a year for Ministers was voted, whereupon Mr. B. P. Standen, the Finance Member, declared that the Governor would have to take over the transferred Departments.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 10.

The Calcutta correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" understands that the sanction of Lord Olivier, the Secretary of State for India, for the dissolution of the Central Provinces Legislative Council has already been sought. —Reuter.

Delhi, Mar. 10.

In the debate on the budget proposals in the Legislative Assembly to-day the Swarajists inflicted a series of defeats on the Government by refusing the Customs grant of 75 lakhs of rupees and successively rejecting by narrow majorities the Government's proposals regarding the income tax, the salt tax and opium.

Moving the rejection of the Customs grant Mr. Motilal Nehru declared that while Indians welcomed the change of vision evinced in the recent speech in London of the Secretary of State for India, Baron Olivier, the British Government's reply to the demand for a responsible Government was wholly unacceptable. Sir W. L. Hailey described the motion as an effort to bring constitutional government to a standstill.—Reuter.

FRANCE'S FINANCIAL MEASURES

Government's Grave Concern Regarding the Collapse of the Franc

London, Mar. 6.

After the recent temporary recovery the franc to-day reached the new low record of 108. The Belgian franc was quoted at 124½. —Reuter.

London, Mar. 7.

French francs to-day touched a fresh low record of 113.75 and closed at 112.05.

Belgian francs, after depreciating to 130½, closed at 127¾.—Reuter.

New York, Mar. 7.

The French franc fell to-day to 3.77½ cents and the Belgian franc to 3.29⅛ cents. There was heavy liquidation of French Government bonds.—Reuter's American Service.

London, Mar. 7.

Many reasons are advanced for the sensational fall of the franc which is causing consternation in France. The fundamental weakness is attributed to, inter alia, the Ruhr policy and the French Government's refusal to impose adequate taxation owing to the disinclination of the people to bear it.

The Bank of France declares that the increase of 1,000,000,000 francs in the note circulation, which was largely the immediate cause of the collapse, was chiefly due to a general increase in prices necessitating more money for business or alternatively less trade. This statement is regarded as indicating a policy of greater inflation with consequent perils.—Reuter.

Premier's Threat to Resign

Paris, Mar. 6.

The Finance Committee of the Senate having rejected the three main provisions of the Finance Bill, namely, reduction of expenditure by decree, increase of taxation by 20 per cent. and introduction of a system to prevent evasion of the income-tax, M. Poincaré told the Committee today that he would resign unless it changed its view by Tuesday.

Mar. 7.

The Senate to-day passed the Electoral Reform Bill which generally maintains the present method of voting. This is regarded as indicating that the Senate will not defy M. Poincaré with regard to the Finance Bill.—Reuter.

M. Poincare's Challenge

Paris, Mar. 7.

There was a great excitement late this afternoon in the lobbies of the Chamber of Deputies when it was learned that M. Poincaré had sent his seconds to the Royalist Deputy, M. Delaunay, owing, apparently, to M. Delaunay having used the word "felony" in an interjection during a speech by M. Poincaré in the Chamber.

The seconds, consisting of the Minister of War and the Minister of Colonies, agreed with M. Delaunay's seconds, after a half-hour's conference, that there was no cause for a duel.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 9.

In view of the position of the franc the Senate Finance Committee is speeding up consideration of M. Poincaré's fiscal measures with the object of presenting a report to the Senate as early as possible. The Committee yesterday accepted the principle in the proposals that the State [illegible] article preventing creation of fresh civil service posts and the article increasing all taxes by 20

Dutch Firm's Speculations

London, Mar. 8.

The flight of the franc continued this morning, the quotation falling to 117. The Belgian franc was quoted at 131.

The position as regards the franc is causing interest and anxiety in the City, where it is realized that the effects would be far-reaching and disastrous if the currency met the same fate as several other continental ones. Great bear operations are attributed as an additional cause for the fall. The centre of the movement is alleged to be in Holland. A prominent exchange broker declares that one Dutch House has made over £1,000,000 by manipulating the market in francs since September.—Reuter.

Meeting of Financiers and Ministers

Paris, Mar. 9.

President Millerand, M. Poincaré, M. de Lasteyrie, the Minister of Finance, the Manager of the of Finance, and several prominent financiers conferred at the Elysée this morning with regard to the measures necessary to improve the financial situation and restore the franc. The Government intend to impress upon the Senate the urgency of passing new financial measures, rapidly reducing expenditure and ending the loan policy. It is understood that the Bank of France will continue to associate itself with the Government's efforts.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 10.

The Senate Finance Committee examined Premier Poincaré's financial proposals the whole of yesterday afternoon. They passed a number of articles, but amended others. The Committee has up to the present approved the Frs 4,000,000,000 increased taxation, but remains hostile to investing the Government with power to form regulations having the force of law.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 10.

The financial situation is engrossing the public virtually to the exclusion of everything else.

The conference at the Elysée, mentioned earlier, was a council of war unprecedented in French history, marking the grave concern with which the Government contemplates the collapse of the franc.

The measures discussed, it is believed, include reduction of fiduciary circulation, which has practically touched the legal limit of Frs. 41,000,000,000, reduction of expenditure in the devastated areas, increase of the discount rate and heavy buying of francs, but, as secrecy is essential for the success of the counter-offensive, no official details have transpired.

Later.

The Cabinet has approved the measures decided upon at the Elysée yesterday morning for the restoration of the franc. M. Poincaré will make a question of confidence of the passage of the taxation bills before the Senate without essential modifications. The debate is expected to begin on Thursday and conclude on Saturday.—Reuter.

The Exchange Market.

London, Mar. 10.

Nervousness and weakness today continued to characterize the exchange market. The French franc improved to 113.75, but fell back to the record low level of 119.50. The Belgian franc rose to 127 and closed at 133.50. Spanish pesetas were quoted at 34.80. Sterling on New York receded to 4.26⅜.—Reuter.

Rumoured Loan by Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co.

New York, Mar. 11.

Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co. refuse to comment on rumours that they have offered France a three months' credit of $50,000,000 at 6 per cent. interest with the object of stabilizing the franc. This is regarded in financial circles as indicating that arrangements for such a credit are pending.

The "New York Times" says that a wide canvass of financial circles elicited the almost uniform opinion that the psychological moment for such an operation has arrived.—Reuter's American Service.

Paris, Mar. 11.

There is reason to believe that the Government are considering the postponement of the elections for six months or a year in view of the alleged offensive against the franc. It is reported that President Millerand favours the idea.

Mar. 12.

The Senate Finance Committee has now voted the whole of the Government's new finance measures with certain amendments, including articles tightening up the present financial laws. Large consolidation operations are contemplated. The Bank of France is negotiating with a view to obtaining large credits.—Reuter.

Increased Revenue Returns.

Later.

The revenue returns for January and February show a surplus of Frs. 905,000,000 as compared with the same period last year.—Reuter.

Credits From Great Britain and America

London, Mar. 12.

The improvement of the franc, which is now 108, is attributed partly to an arrangement in London for acceptance of a credit of £5,000,000 in favour of the French Government. The credit, in which a number of leading London banks and financial houses are participating, will run for 12 months, and will be covered by a deposit of National Defence Bonds and backed by a guarantee by the Bank of France.

Later.

The French franc to-day steadily appreciated to 102.90 and closed at 105.37. Belgian francs rallied to 120.75 and closed at 125.25.—Reuter.

New York, Mar. 12.

American bankers, headed by Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., have established a credit of $100,000,000 in favour of the Banque de France.

The French loan is fully secured by gold in the vaults of the Banque de France, which is acting for the French Government. It will be used to stabilize the French exchange and for other purposes. It is understood that the duration of the loan is one year. The statement does not mention the exact amount of the loan or the rate of interest, but quotes the Governor of the Banque as giving a pledge that complete measures will be taken to better the financial situation.—Reuter's American Service.

Paris, Mar. 12.

The Left Parties have decided that, if the Government prorogues the Chamber instead of having a general election, all the Left Senators and Deputies will resign en bloc and submit the case to the country.—Reuter.

FRESH TENSION IN PALATINATE

Germany Indignant at Allied Schemes of Military Control

London, Mar. 7.

The Inter-Allied Mission has again been despatched to the Palatinate as a result of certain disquieting events. There is still much tension in several centres there in view of alleged French reprisals and arrests of anti-Separatists.—Reuter.

Berlin, Mar. 8.

The Allies' Note regarding military control of Germany is the subject of very indignant comments by the Nationalist press, which demand its rejection regardless of consequences, declaring that the Note is a violation of the Treaty of Versailles. The moderate journals, although disappointed, recognize that abrupt rejection would do Germany more harm than good.—Reuter.

Three Deaths in Strike Riot at Duesseldorf.

London, Mar. 7.

A French source at Duesseldorf states that following the disturbances at the Badische Aniline factory at Ludwigshafen on Wednesday 3,000 workers stormed the factory. German police fired on the demonstrators and three were killed and 52 wounded, of whom 31 are in a serious condition. Four police were wounded. The police requested the French military officials to intervene and the French commander assumed control of the German police and sent a detachment of troops to the factory, who restored order without firing a shot.—Reuter.

Note: The employees of the factory struck on March 5, refusing to work nine hours a day.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 8.

M. Poincaré in the course of a three-hour speech in the Chamber of Deputies last night reiterated that France would only give up the Ruhr proportionately to payments and after total payment. He had strong hopes that French policy would not be contradicted by the Committees of Experts. If unity of the Allied front were re-established, Germany would carry out her obligations and there was every chance that a general settlement would speedily be put into operation.

French Policy Expounded.

The Foreign Office has issued a Yellow Book dealing with the inter-Allied negotiations regarding French security. It is a voluminous collection of letters and documents covering the period from January, 1919, to December, 1923. It does not reveal any secrets but throws light on the abortive Anglo-French negotiations for a treaty of alliance. Marshal Foch's memorandum urging the organization of the Rhine as a military frontier is among the published documents.

The Book is apparently designed to demonstrate, in view of the possibility of a fresh conference, that all the French Government's aims since the armistice have been dominated by the same preoccupation, namely, to ensure the security of France against possible German aggression once and for all, but without annexation of any part of Germany, which has not been contemplated. It is emphasized that the policy of the successive French Cabinets has been consistent and unvarying on this matter.—Reuter

France's Protective Measures to Prevent Aggression

London, March 10.

Strong sympathy is extended on every hand with France in her desire for security as brought out in the Yellow Book, issued by the French Foreign Office, dealing with the Inter-Allied negotiations regarding French security.

It is recognized that France is reasonably apprehensive of aggression from a rehabilitated Germany, but nevertheless the British disinclination to enter into a military alliance in accordance with the French views is defended, and at the same time it is pointed out that the occupation of the Ruhr and the Rhineland has no more solved France's fear of Germany than it has solved the reparations question. It is emphasized that security is more important than reparations and hopes are entertained that the discussions between M. Poincaré and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald will lead to an agreement on this predominant consideration. —Reuter.

GENERAL ELECTION IN GERMANY

Reich's Request for Freedom of Speech and Liberty of Press in Rhineland

Berlin, Mar. 9.

In view of the approaching general election, the Government of the Reich have appealed to the authorities in the occupied territories for liberty of the press and freedom of speech throughout the occupied zones in order to ensure uninfluenced voting.

The Government have asked permission for speakers from occupied Germany to address meetings and that the 140,000 inhabitants expelled from the occupied regions, two-thirds of whom are voters, should be allowed to vote.

It is stated that the inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission is likely to grant freedom of the press "as far as the safety of the occupation troops permits." —Reuter.

GERMAN GOLD NOTE CREDIT BANK

Sterling Denomination

Berlin, Mar. 9.

In the Budget Committee of the Reichstag to-day, Herr Schacht, President of the Reichsbank, outlined the plan for the establishment of a new Bank of Issue or a German Gold Note Credit Bank, an institution to be purely German and managed by the Reichsbank. The resources will be 500,000,000 gold marks, and the notes will be in the denomination of the

FOREIGN TELEGRAMS

SINGAPORE BASE SCHEME HELD UP

Decisive Statement by Prime Minister Acquiesced in by Admiral Beatty: Expense too Great under Present Conditions of Finance

London, Mar. 8.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald and Admiral of the Fleet Earl Beatty, the First Sea Lord, met yesterday when the Premier explained that the Cabinet had decided that the Singapore Naval Base scheme could not proceed in the present state of the nation's finances. Earl Beatty made it clear that the Admiralty accepted the decision. This disposes of the possibility of Naval resignations.

The Government's decision is obviously regretted by the "Times," which sets forth at length the naval and commercial qualifications possessed by Singapore, says that happily at present there is no probability that any warlike action will be necessary in Far Eastern waters, but it is pure folly to suppose that no conflict will ever occur amid so many ambitions prevailing there. Britain might not be directly involved but British shipping will probably be the first to suffer. The paper says that, if there is to be no immediate progress in the work undertaken at Singapore, there must at least be no irrevocable reversal of policy.

The discontinuance of work on the Singapore base is regarded as quite justified by the "Observer." It thinks that until the naval outlook is both technically and strategically more clearly determined and more urgent deficiencies, such as the hopelessly unbalanced condition of the home air defences, are made good, it is practicable to wait, say seven years, and do the work in three years, instead of carrying out the original proposal of spreading construction over 10 years.

The Southern Dominion's Duty.

Addressing a distinguished company at the annual dinner of His Majesty's Civil Service, including the Duke of York, the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Viscount Chelmsford, the Deputy Leader of the House, Mr. J. R. Clynes, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Philip Snowden, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. J. H. Thomas, Admiral of the Fleet Sir Doveton Sturdee declared that Singapore was the gateway to the Pacific.

He thought that they ought to defend it and the Australians, New Zealanders and everyone interested in China trade should help them (Cheers.)

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, subsequently proposing the toast of the Civil Service, remarked amid laughter that he could not say that he quite agreed with everything Admiral Sir Doveton Sturdee had said. Referring to the press reports about Admiralty pressure with regard to the Singapore scheme, he remarked that when he saw Admiralty officers, in whom they had the greatest confidence, used as pawns in a political game, he thought it his duty as the head of the Government to protest (Cheers). The Civil Service was responsible for advice and the Government was responsible for policy. Any newspaper attacks must therefore be directed against the latter.

Civil Service Compliments.

In conclusion the Prime Minister paid a high tribute to the loyalty and whole-hearted devotion shown by the Civil Service since Labour's advent into power.

Sir Oswyn A. R. Murray, the Permanent Secretary of the Admiralty, responding, remarked that the tendency of the present Ministry to decide important questions for themselves made for good administration and prompt decisions.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 11.

An announcement of the Government's decision not to proceed with the Singapore base is expected to-morrow, when the Earl of Balfour will also raise the question in the House of Lords. —Reuter.

BRITISH AIR FORCE ESTIMATES

Progressive Development of Force: Home Defence Requirements

London, Mar. 6.

The Army estimates for the year 1924-5 total £45,000,000, as compared with £52,000,000 last year. The establishment, excluding India, consists of 152,000 men, as compared with 154,000.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 7.

The Air estimates for the year 1924-5 total £14,511,000, an increase of £2,500,000 as compared with the current year.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 7.

In regard to the Air estimates for 1924/5, which total £14,511,000, it is announced that the cost of the Air Force in Iraq and Palestine has been decreased by over £1,500,000.

The increase in the estimates by £2,500,000 as compared with the current year is due to expansion of the home defence Air Force, increased requirements of Navy and Army co-operation and replenishment of material.

Eight new regular home defence squadrons will be completely formed in 1924/5, bringing the number allotted for that purpose to 15 by April, 1925.

The estimates also provide for the initial equipment of six more squadrons, which at present have been arranged to be formed in 1925/6.

Air units working with the Navy will be increased by five flights and the strength of the air units working with the home Army will be increased by the equivalent of one squadron.

The personnel will be increased by 2,000 to 33,000.

No provision is made for the development of airships, but the Government is considering the matter.

The total Air estimates must be expected to increase for some years but, unless further expansion is imposed upon Britain, part of the increase will not be recurrent.—Reuter.

Orders Totalling £4,500,000:

London, Mar. 11.

Introducing the Air estimates in the House of Commons to-day, Mr. W. Leach, the Under-Secretary of State for Air, said that negotiations were proceeding for the purchase of six new aerodromes. The total of flying hours had increased 50 per cent. during the year and the increase overseas was still higher. The ratio of accidents throughout the whole Force was steadily falling.

Our orders to the aircraft industry this year, he said, would total £4,500,000. A new type of machine for naval co-operation and Army co-operation was being developed and experiments were also being made with metal construction on a very large scale, which should greatly lessen deterioration. The scheme for the subsidy of £1,000,000 to be spread over a period of ten years to the Imperial Air Transport Company was being faithfully carried out. The Government felt that the Burney airship scheme needed still more examination and Lieut.-Commander Burney would have full opportunity of laying his views before the Cabinet committee considering the question. They, therefore, did not feel justified in asking any money this year for airships.

In conclusion Mr. Leach emphasized that disarmament was necessary but that it must be [illegible] and he laid stress on the Government's policy of good-will. Reuter.

THE BRITISH NAVAL ESTIMATES

Big Reduction in Expenditure as Compared with Pre-war Standards

London, Mar. 13.

The Navy estimates for 1924/25 amount to £55,800,000 a reduction of £2,200,000 as compared with the present year. The estimates include £1,800,000 for the commencement of five cruisers and two destroyers.

The figure is approximately equivalent to an estimate of £34,500,000 before the war, and, hence, the scale of expenditure of the Navy has been reduced much below the 1914/15 standard, being equal to the expenditure in 1903/04, before the expansion to meet the German menace.

The personnel provided for is 100,500 as compared with 90,500 for the previous year.—Reuter.

BRITAIN'S FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mackay Treaty and Abolition of Likin in China: The Customs Treaty

London, Mar. 12.

In the House of Commons today at question time, Mr. P.J.H. Hannon, Unionist Member for the Moseley Division of Birmingham, suggested, in the interests of British exporters, that the British Legation in Peking should be instructed to co-operate with the other Legations to ensure ratification of Article 8 of the Mackay Treaty.

Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied that, if Mr. Hannon referred to the fact that this Article, which provides for the abolition of likin, had not been carried out by the Chinese authorities, he could assure him that His Majesty's Government was fully alive to the importance of the matter. They were at present consulting His Majesty's Minister in Peking with regard to the best means of dealing with the question at the special conference to be held in pursuance of the Nine Power Customs Treaty, but it must be realized that great difficulties existed owing to the present disorganized conditions in China and the Central Government's lack of control over many of the provincial authorities.

The Government, Dominions and the Singapore Base: Chinese Customs Surtax

London, Mar. 10.

In the House of Commons today, at question time, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald said that the Government were communicating with the Governments of the Dominions and India on the subject of the Singapore base. He hoped to be able to indicate the policy of the Government at an early date, certainly before Easter.

Mr. W. A. Chapple, Liberal Member for Dumfries, asked the reasons for the delay in carrying out the Washington Agreement in favour of a special conference to deal with the levying of an extra 2½ per cent. duty in China. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald replied that the special conference could not be summoned until the Nine Power Treaty signed at Washington, which provides for it, was ratified by all the signatory Powers.

The Postmaster-General, replying to a deputation from the printing trades, expressed the opinion that the restoration of the penny post would be the most practical solution of unemployment in the printing trade. TROUBLE IN THE IRISH NATIONAL ARMY

Wholesale Demobilization of Officers and Consequent Dissatisfaction

London, Mar. 10.

Wholesale demobilizations in the Irish National Army, culminating in the discharge of over 900 officers during the past week, have led to serious troubles in several military centres. A number of demobilized officers in Templemore went off with machine-guns, rifles and ammunition. An armoured-car was sent to round them up.

Two officers of high rank addressed a letter to the President, charging the Government with failure to interpret the Treaty in accordance with the spirit of the Irish people, with the result that the military are endeavouring to arrest them for insubordination. They complain that the latest lists of the demobilized contain too many officers who participated in the Anglo-Irish struggle.

There is great military activity in Dublin, where guards have been doubled and leave has been cancelled.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 10.

The military authorities in Dublin state that the search for the two officers, Messrs. Tobin and Dalton, has up to the present been without result. Lorries full of soldiers have again appeared and are patrolling the streets of Dublin.—Reuter.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE A MODEL TO EUROPE

Mr. Thomas on Mutual Trust as Solution of All Quarrels

London, Mar. 7.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in a speech at the first of a series of monthly luncheons inaugurated by the Overseas League during the period of the British Empire Exhibition, declared that the Government wished to obtain confidence throughout Europe similar to that uniting the British Empire, in which, he declared, whatever differences there were between Britain and the Dominions, neither would think of adding a copper to their armament burdens because of those differences, and in which each relied on the inherent common-sense and justice of the others. The Government did not believe in a solution of the difficulties of Europe by force but by common-sense, justice and arbitration.

Referring to the Colonies and Protectorates, Mr. Thomas laid stress on the fact that Britain was the trustee of millions of people in these territories. The Government had accepted this responsibility and it intended to see that the trust was not abused.

In conclusion the speaker urged a policy of industrial peace in Britain, the great essential of which, he affirmed, was confidence on both sides.—Reuter.

ASIATIC CREWS ON BRITISH SHIPS

Employment of Lascars on Vessels Trading Between Great Britain and India

London, Mar. 11.

In the House of Commons today, Commander Kenworthy (Liberal) called attention to the fact that five vessels sailing from Hull for the East now carried coolie crews instead of whites as formerly. He asked whether steps could be taken to restrict employment of Asiatic crews to vessels trading east of Suez only.

Mr. Sidney Webb, the President of the Board of Trade, replied that four of the five vessels named were trading regularly between India and Britain and carried Lascar crews like other vessels employed in this trade. There was nothing unusual or irregular in this method of manning such vessels. Commander Kenworthy's suggestion would require legislation which would be controversial. He was certainly unable to undertake to introduce it, but the points would be borne in mind.

Replying to Sir James Hope Simpson, Liberal Member for Taunton, Mr. Webb agreed that Lascars were citizens of the British Empire in the sense that they were citizens of India.

Mr. J. Sexton, Labour Member for St. Helens, declared that the wages paid were not commensurate with good citizenship. Mr.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

BRITISH ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES

Government's Motion for Adjournment Defeated: Acceptance of Previous Army Estimates: No Decrease in Strength: A Parallel of Inventions

London, March 13.

In the House of Commons today, a Government motion to suspend the 11 o'clock rule in order to debate the Army estimates because business was behindhand was defeated by 234 votes to 207, but the defeat was not regarded as vital within the terms of the statement which Mr. MacDonald had made more than once and Mr. Stephen Walsh, the Secretary of State for War, proceeded to introduce the Army estimates.

Mr. J. R. Clynes, the Lord Privy Seal and the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, explained that the course proposed was an alternative to taking the private Members' time. He admitted, in response to pressure, that a Labourite back-bencher's motion to reduce the personnel of the Army by 150,000 men would be debated after eleven. This evoked Conservative and Liberal protests which culminated in a challenge and division.

The only effect of the defeat is that all the time available to private Members will be taken up by the Government in order to overtake the business that must be completed before March 31. A number of Liberals voted with the Government hence the announcement of the figures evoked an outburst of enthusiasm from the Conservatives and cries of "Resign".

Later.

Moving the Army estimates for the year 11924 5 providing an expenditure of £ 45,000,000, the Secretary of State for War, Mr. Stephen Walsh, explained that the estimates were prepared by the previous Government, but he was satisfied that they were framed with due regard to economy and the needs of the country. He declared that, if the German menace had disappeared, it must be remembered that our distant possessions could not be left defenceless. (Opposition cheers.) The difficulties we had to contend with in Egypt, Iraq, India and the East would not at present warrant a decrease in the strength of the Army. There were signs of improvement in recruiting. He said that the policy of substituting machines for manpower required a highly equipped research department, which was one of the finest it was possible to organize.

The motion relative to pensions grievances of certain ranker officers was defeated by 220 votes to 201, after Mr. Stanley Baldwin had endorsed Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's suggestion for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the whole matter

Lieut.-Colonel Page Croft, Conservative Member for Bournemouth, pointed out that, compared with 1914, we had reduced our trained forces by 250,000 men. No other country had done anything like this.

Major C. R. Attlee, Under-Secretary of State for War, replying in the course of the debate, declared that we were well up to the standard of other armies in regard to inventions.

The debate was then adjourned.—Reuter.

The Navy Estimates

London, March 13.

The Navy Estimates memorandum states that the general strategic position now permits a return to more normal conditions than the retention of most of the more modern vessels in Home waters, which was necessary for many years prior to the late war.

In the Mediterranean two destroyer flotillas will be replaced by more modern vessels and the Fleet in the Mediterranean will be gradually brought up to the following, the Atlantic fleet being correspondingly reduced; seven battleships, two light cruiser squadrons, four destroyer flotillas, two depot-ships, two aircraft-carriers, one repair-ship, one submarine flotilla and one submarine depot-ship.—Reuter.

THE NAVAL BASE AT SINGAPORE

Earl of Balfour's Arguments Against the Postponement of the Scheme

London, Mar. 13.

In the House of Lords, the Earl of Balfour asked for information in regard to the Singapore scheme and moved for the papers. He contended that the abandonment of the projects would be a disastrous mistake, which would have an echo throughout the Empire and the consequences of which could hardly be calculated. He laid stress on Australia's, New Zealand's and India's reliance on the British fleet, which would be useless in certain contingencies, however improbable, without a base.

The speaker declared that he could imagine no worse economy than one which rendered the fleet inefficacious in the greatest oceans of the world and in connexion with the existence of a very important part of the Empire. He emphasized the defensive nature of the scheme, which would safeguard peace, and termed fantastic the notion that a base 3,000 miles from Yokohama could menace our Japanese friends.

The First Lord of the Admiralty, Viscount Chelmsford, announced that the Government hoped to be able to make a statement of their policy in both Houses on March 18.

The House then adjourned.

Oil Storage at Sarawak?

In the House of Commons, replying to Sir William Davison, Conservative Member for Kensington, who asked whether the question of providing oil storage for the Navy in Sarawak, rather than at Singapore, had been considered. Mr. C. Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary for the Admiralty, pointed out that under the terms of the Washington Treaty no coast defences or fortifications could be established there in peace time. They would therefore rely primarily for defence on the presence of the British Fleet. Sarawak was not a suitable position for oil fuel storage for the Fleet.—Reuter.

Ex-Caliph's Strong Protest and World-wide Appeal

Territet, Mar. 12.

The ex-Caliph has addressed a message to Mussulmans throughout the world, protesing against the abolition of the Caliphate by the impious decision of the present majority in the Turkish National Assembly. He describes the measure as a fundamentally sacrilegious one and null and void.

The ex-Caliph states that the Moslem world unanimously approved his election a year and a half ago and it alone is entitled to pronounce upon the question, and consequently invites the most authorized chiefs and representatives of Mussulman communities throughout the world to communicate proposals and concrete contributions as early as possible for the assembling of grand religious inter-Islamic congress, which he proposes to convoke at the most opportune time and place in order to adopt the decision required by the situation.—Reuter.

AMERICAN OIL LEASE INVESTIGATION

Mr. Doheny's Loan to Mexican President: The Oil Station at Pearl Harbour

Washington, Mar. 7.

Mr. Ira Bennett, editorial writer of the "Washington Post," testified before the Oil Committee to-day that the word "principal" which he used in his telegrams to Mr. McLean, did not mean President Coolidge but Senator C. Curtis.

Mar. 8.

Before the Oil Committee to-day, Senator Curtis denied Mr. Bennett's statement that the word "principal" in the telegram referred to him.

The Committee later, while investigating the Attorney-General's administration, subpœnaed witness from the Southwest to be asked about American oil interests promoting the present revolution in Mexico. Senator Wheeler stated that he expected to prove that Mr. Doheny, Mr. Fall and Mr. Sinclair had participated in a conspiracy to further the revolt.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Mar. 10.

Later.

The disaster to the Calais-Ventimiglia express occurred at the Grands Violets halt, where trains have recently been diverted to les Brotteaux. The killed have up to the present not been identified.—Reuter.

A Confusion of Orders.

Paris, Mar. 11.

The famous London specialist, Sir St. Clair Thomson, was hurt in the head and foot in the Grands Violets disaster.

The accident, which occurred in the middle of the night, was apparently due to the driver jamming on the brakes when he discovered danger. The train was then doing 60 miles an hour. The driver, who was late, seems to have been confused by his orders regarding the use of a short alternative route.

The sleeping car next to the engine, which was almost entirely filled with English people, was split to pieces. The dining car and another coach plunged into the wreckage.—Reuter.

Nine charred bodies have been removed from the Utah Fuel Mine.—Reuter.

Salt Lake City, Mar. 10.

A fire, which broke out yesterday evening, greatly hindered the efforts of the rescuers in the Utah Fuel Mine. The fire was extinguished late last night. Seventy-five rescuers are exploring the mine and have found about 30 dead.—Reuter's American Service.

Castlegate, Utah, Mar. 11.

Seventy-eight bodies have been recovered from the Utah Fuel mine.

Mar. 12.

A hundred and thirteen bodies have been been recovered from the Utah Fuel Mine. It seems definitely certain that 173 persons perished as a result of the explosion and fire.—Reuter's American Service.

ITALY AND THE VATICAN

Dispute Said to be Settled

London, Mar. 11.

The "Daily Express" publishes the terms of an alleged agreement settling the dispute between the Pope and the Italian Government. The terms provide for the surrender of the whole Vatican Hill to the Vatican, which at present only holds a part. This gives the hill the status of an independent country. The Government will build at their own expense a palace or a series of houses for the accommodation of the College of Cardinals. The Holy See will hand over the scattered properties where the Cardinals are at present housed.

The Pope's independence will be guaranteed by the League of Nations.—Reuter.

Rome, Mar. 12.

The report of an agreement between the Pope and the Italian Government, published in the "Daily Express," is denied in authoritative quarters, though it is pointed out that the relations between Church and State are most harmonious.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 13.—The "Morning Post" asserts that the Government announcement with regard to Singapore will be made on March 18 on the naval estimates debate.—Reuter.

BRITISH HEN OR CHINESE LIZARD

Full Name and Address on Imported Foodstuffs

London, Mar. 7.

The House of Commons to-day passed the second reading of the Merchandise Marks Bill, providing for the compulsory marking of frozen or chilled meat, bacon, ham, eggs, poultry, dairy produce, honey and oatmeal with the name of the country of origin. Liberals and Ministerialists combined against the Conservative supporters of the Bill but failed to defeat it.

Rear-Adm. Sir Guy Gaunt, Conservative member for Buckrose, Yorkshire, moving the second reading in an amusing speech, appealed to the House to think of a poor little Yorkshire hen laying an egg daily and trying to keep a household together against a Chinese lizard thousands of miles away.—Reuter.

TUTANKHAMEN S TOMB

An Official Display with Sacrifices in the Ancient Manner

Luxor, Mar. 6.

Tutankhamen's tomb was reopened this afternoon, when about 200 distinguished personages, including Lord Allenby, Egyptian Ministers, foreign diplomats and members of Parliament, who were admitted as guests of the Egyptian Government to view the gold-covered coffin. The guests travelled in special trains. The elaborate ceremonies included the slaying of two bulls, as a sacrifice, in the centre of Luxor, as was customary in the days of the Pharaohs. The streets were decorated. There was a banquet in the evening, followed by a fête and fireworks.

Neither Mr. Howard Carter nor any one of his staff was present.—Reuter.

Cairo, Mar. 11.

Negotiations for a peaceful solution of the Luxor dispute have failed. It is understood that the Government have withdrawn their offer of a new concession to Countess Carnarvon.—Reuter.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN GERMANY

General Strike in Shipyards

Berlin, Mar. 6.

A number of employees of the Baden Aniline Dyeworks at Ludwigshafen struck yesterday, refusing to work nine hours a day. The strikers to-day forcibly entered the works and ejected those working. Police were summoned and were fired on. There were a number of casualties on both sides in the ensuing fight.

A general strike is in progress in the shipyards at Hamburg, Bremen, Luebeck and Stettin.—Reuter.

Berlin, Mar. 10.

The Hamburg dockers have decided to strike to-morrow.—Reuter.

Hamburg, Mar. 11.

The dockers struck this morning for higher wages. Work in the harbour is completely at a standstill. A British steamer from India was able to unload only one-tenth of her cargo of 2,400 bags of rice.—Reuter.

Berlin, Mar. 11.

The dock strike at Hamburg has extended to Bremerhaven. The dockers at Bremen have decided to join.—Reuter.

It is understood that the engagement will shortly be announced of the Hon. John Cecil, First Secretary of the British Embassy, and Miss Cornelia Vanderbilt, the only daughter of the late Mr. George W. Vanderbilt. Miss Vanderbilt's mother was one of the famous Dresser sisters.—Reuter's American Service

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

Dominion Politics and British General Election: Labour Jubilant Over Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's Rise to Power: The State Elections: Australia's Huge Loan Conversions

From Our Own Correspondent.

Melbourne, Jan. 31.

If it is true that a nation is happy which has no history, possibly Australia may be considered happy—at least pro tem.—because she has no politics. One gets ever nearer to the conclusion that our politics are all make-believe, and when we see such men as Lord Chelmsford, once as Governor of Queensland, fighting the Labour leader, Kitson, to a standstill, now holding office as First Lord of the Admiralty in a Socialistic government, we can honestly rub our eyes and ask whether we sleep or are visions about.

Naturally the Labour party in Australia is joyous, even triumphant, about the win to office, if not to power, of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. It sees in his advent to the Premiership the triumph of those great principles for which the proletariat has fought and bled for generations past. Of course the proletariat has done nothing of the sort, because it did not exist as an animate body, and certainly never worried its head about any principles. But it seems that one-fifth of the electors of Britain support the so-called Labour Government and the majority of the four-fifths are either unwilling to agree amongst themselves or willing to give Mr. MacDonald a chance. Which chance he will take and "dig in." Labour may be disposed to Pacifism, but it knows how to apply all the best military tactics to carrying out its plans.

This is not a diversion from Australian politics, but a brief reference to a position with which Australians are quite familiar. The Freetraders and Protectionists fought in Australia, and, Labour conveniently sinking the fiscal issue, secured the balance of power. From that day until the war Labour practically governed this country. The war created a new issue, and Labour split, but already the temporary Nationalist party is itself divided, and nothing but a temporary coalition maintains Labour in Opposition. The present cabinet seems to have all the faults and few of the virtues of the old Nationalist cabinet. Its Press sponsors either ignore it or warn it in a humble way not to make a fool of itself. The cable columns of the newspapers are full of encomiums of the work of the Australian Prime Minister, Mr. S. M. Bruce, in Britain. Mr. Bruce may have done excellent work, but to most it seems that he contributed to the wrecking of the Government in offering the Dominions preference, and at the same time promoted the cause of the Labour party to which he is naturally anathema.

LABOUR AND STATE ELECTIONS.

Politically the Labour party has every reason to be optimistic. It has got its opponents divided, and they decline to see the position. In Western Australia the State elections for the Assembly may be over before I write again. The contest is going along merrily, but there is a relatively small section which puts forward primary producer candidates on its own—a forlorn hope, which is quite capable of upsetting the applecart of the astute and progressive Sir James Mitchell.

In South Australia the elections are still a month or two ahead, but already Sir Henry Barwell, the Conservative Premier, is finding himself faced by two parties—Labour and the Primary Producer. Even Victoria is by no means safe, seeing that in the bye-election now on the Farmers' Union has deliberately put a man forward in opposition to the Government candidate.

In Tasmania the Labour Government has been confirmed in office by the votes of its own followers, coupled with those of sufficient Conservatives. The ministry of Sir George Fuller in New South Wales will be defeated the day the third or Progressive party makes up its mind to translate its hostile criticism into something which the Labour party can support, while as we know Queensland seems bound to support still a Labour government, which is certainly not of the Red variety and one expects daily to hear that it has broken away and become an agricultural ministry.

In Federal politics Labour has merely to sit down and wait. The present so-called composite ministry has not yet declared itself, nor can it do so until Mr. Bruce returns from England. It may then be possible for the Nationalist and Country parties to find common ground upon which to work, but if they do so the result must finally be to drive the ex-Labourites, who are members of both those parties, back into their original folds.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE.

It is not necessary to say that the chickens should never have been hatched to remark that they are now coming home to roost. Australia has floated loans, and signed chits. She now has to meet them. The outward sign is some perturbation on the part of the Commonwealth Treasurer. In about three months he will require £19,000,000 to cash the balance of the war gratuities granted to the soldiers. Therefore it is argued that he should have priority before States borrowers. Obviously the States have other views, seeing that between them they have this year to redeem £37,000,000 in London and £31,000,000 in Australia, and in 1925 another £36,000,000, mostly in Australia.

Dr. Earle Page, the Treasurer, has succeeded in getting a Loan Council established, but as that consists of himself and the State Treasurers it is clearly not his instrument. To-morrow this Council is to meet and the press has been handed out inspired paragraphs about what it is hoped it will do. Incidentally it may be mentioned that some of the State Treasurers have issued on their own account suggestions that unless they look after their own interests the Commonwealth Treasurer is not likely to help them. The Queensland Treasurer accuses Dr. Page of conspiring with New South Wales at the expense of the smaller States, and Sir Arthur Cocks, of New South Wales, asserts that he will fight Commonwealth taxation of interest on State-raised loans to the last ditch. The financial obligations of the next few years look somewhat horrifying on paper, but it is always well to remember that it is not the amount one owes but his ability to pay which counts. In 1922 Mr. Bruce, then Treasurer, said that of the total national debts of the Commonwealth and States, namely £784,000,000, there were probably tangible assets amounting to £450,000,000. Obviously these loans can only be redeemed by fresh flotations, and it is evident that this calls for a working arrangement between Commonwealth and States. It is for this purpose that the Loan Council—a purely advisory body—is meeting to-morrow.

ELIMINATING IMPERIAL GOVERNORS.

The Labour government itself proposed to reduce the Estimates by £1 in order to mark the opinion as to whether in future there should be an Imperially appointed Governor or an administrator. Mr. Lyons, the Premier, told the House of Assembly that the question was an open one, but seeing that a decision in favour of an administrator would save about £2,500 a year, and the state of Tasmanian finances is pretty desperate, the vote to reduce expenditure was carried by a majority of three or four. It seems a somewhat poor reason to give for the change—merely one of economy—and it by no means settles the matter, even for Tasmania. At the present moment the acting Chief Justice is Administrator, and he of course owes his appointment to the advice tendered the Imperial authorities by the Cabinet. In other words he is appointed to all intents and purposes by the Cabinet. If in the case of Tasmania the Administrator is not a partisan, in the recent case of Queensland, before the Imperial Government hurriedly sent Sir Matthew Nathan to Brisbane, the Administrator was a rank partisan, and packed the Legislative Council in direct opposition to the policy of the previous Governor and of all some governments. It is certain that we could not for long carry on our system of government in the several States if the Governor were always chosen by the Cabinet. A change of constitution will be necessary, and the difficulty of not having an Imperial Governor would be most easily met by placing the appointment of State Governors in the hands of the Governor-General in Council, in other words following the system of Canada and South Africa. Should the agitation in favour of sub-dividing the larger States bring about far-reaching territorial changes some such method of choosing the Governors or Administrators will be necessary.

At a recent Australian Natives Association annual conference two leading speakers advocated "decentralization," and this may be considered the voice of Victoria. In Sydney a New States League has been meeting and I notice the name of William Morris Hughes, the late Prime Minister, as one of the committee of the League. The movement seems to have some vitality in it, and the acting Prime Minister has promised that the question will be dealt with this coming session. How, is not at all clear.

QUADRUPLE MURDER.

Melbourne has not yet stopped talking about a shocking tragedy which took place in the fine Botanical Gardens—nearly 100 acres laid out in lawns, rockeries, flower-beds, shrubberies and miniature lakes, quite close to the city. The perpetrator of the killing was a youngish man, who had spent much time in Mexico and America, but was an Australian by birth. He served in the British Army during the war, and posed as an intellectual. He spent much money on books. He came into the city one morning and bought a repeating rifle, some 50 dum-dum cartridges and a bottle of gun oil. It was understood that he proposed to wander afield shooting foxes and dingoes for which there are given substantial bounties. He was a first-class shot. He entered the gardens at one end and dodging amongst the rockeries and through the shrubberies "potted" no fewer than five people—three women and two men. One woman may live but the other four are dead—three killed instantaneously. Whether the man was an epileptic, or whether he somehow came to his senses after the fifth hit, he turned and ran. He had plenty of cartridges left, but he threw the lot away with the rifle and the bottle of gun oil in some thick vegetation. The next day the rifle was found, the buyer traced, and the purchaser proved to be one Norman List, who had been visiting his father but had not been seen for two days. The search for him is still going on, but it is thought by many that he drowned himself in the River Yarra. Seeing that the Gardens are the pleasantest resort around Melbourne, and are frequented about sundown in the heat of the summer by mothers and their children, the event has occasioned much alarm. A couple of days later 40 police replied to a call within 10 minutes. It was stated that "the maniac has come back and there is more firing in the Gardens." It was only a lorry back-firing, but the incident is significant of the manner in which the tragedy has got on to the nerves of the good people.

CANBERRA THE NEW CAPITAL.

The Commonwealth Parliament and administration will soon be transferred to the new city of Canberra. The Federal Cabinet has held a meeting on the site of what will no doubt some day be one of the great cities of the world. There is not at present a great deal to show in the way of buildings but a tremendous lot of dead work, that is buried work, sewerage, water, and light supply has been done. There is to be a temporary Parliament House, which is to last throughout the 50 years before permanent buildings are erected, and of this the foundations are now laid. For accommodation one hotel is now being built to house 200 persons, and two more are likely to be started very soon.

SOME PROMINENT VISITORS.

The Japanese training squadron is still in Australian waters, and in Sydney especially the visitors have been having a very gay time. Sydney both as for weather and natural surroundings lends itself to the entertainment of visitors more easily than Melbourne. Possibly the people also are more genial and open-hearted, as becomes a city which at times is almost tropical in its climate.

Lord Leverhulme has been over to Tasmania, and talks as if he might put up a soap factory there. He also has now explained that he does not want us to import Asiatics, but West African negroes, who have no initiative and do little thinking. He believes they would make it possible for Australia to produce cotton to the value of £300,000,000 a year. He bases his opinion upon his own experience in employing 25,000 negroes in their own country. Even his hosts get restive under his persistency, and tell him that 98 per cent. of the people of Australia are white and intend to remain so.

The Earl and Countess of Cassilis, Lord and Lady Harrowby, and Lord and Lady Dunleath are also paying us a visit. The first-named is a Royal Arch Mason, and comes to attend the celebrations of the centenary of the Sydney Chapter.

SATISFACTORY SUGAR HARVEST.

Details are now to hand showing that the sugar season in northern New South Wales and Queensland has on the whole proved satisfactory. For Queensland alone the output was 262,975 tons, as against 283,785 for the year 1922. Seeing that last year was considered one of prolonged drought, the rainfall during the early part of 1923, when we expected the crops to be harvested a few months later, being about 50 per cent. below normal, the result is something of a surprise, especially as the area of cane cut was only 3,467 acres in excess of that of 1922. The return was 1.82 tons of sugar to the acre, which for an exceptionally bad year compares with 1.92 in 1922, 1.88 in 1920 and, for the ten-years average ending 1918, 1.99, and not greatly to its disadvantage. There is little question that the planting of improved varieties of cane, richer in sugar and more drought-resisting, had something to do with the fine return, but so far as the northern parts of the sugar districts went it seems certain that moderate rains falling at frequent intervals though giving a lower aggregate downfall yield better results in sugar than tropical downpours of great measurement.

THE RESTORATION OF HUNGARY

Premier Sees the King

Count Bethlen, the Hungarian Prime Minister, when in London, was received by the King. This is the first time since the war that an ex-enemy Prime Minister has been received at Buckingham Palace. Count Bethlen's amply-demonstrated good will in the negotiations now being conducted in London for an arrangement between Hungary, the League of Nations, and the Allies for the reconstruction of Hungary and for an international loan, has proved to be one of the most hopeful factors in the prospect of success.

At a session of the Hungarian Sub-Committee of the League of Nations he declared that Hungary would accept the League scheme without reservation. That called for some courage on his part. The League Finance Committee has taken its courage in both hands and in a report yesterday stuck to the full meaning of the original proposals, in spite of certain unofficial French attempts, made in the meantime, to influence it in another direction.

As a result of the evening session yesterday it appeared unlikely that the protocols will be signed here and now. Both the French and the Czecho-Slovak delegates made reservations which depend on the acceptance of the League scheme by the Reparation Commission. As no member of the committee objected to the scheme it may be hoped that the protocols will be signed after the Reparation Commission has approved the scheme. It is at any rate satisfactory that an agreed League scheme will now be submitted to the Reparation Commission.

The scheme involves the restriction of Hungary's reparation liability to an annual average sum of 10,000,000 gold crowns (£400,000) for 20 years, beginning in 1926. Count Bethlen's undertaking made yesterday to pay this sum is subject, of course, to the acceptance of the scheme by the Reparation Commission. Before the loan for Hungary, which is the other side of the medal, can be floated, the Allied Governments will have to decide whether they will agree to a modification of their liens on the Succession States on account of Liberation Bonds, that is that proportion of Austria's and Hungary's theoretic liability which was transferred to those States. On this there is little difficulty to be anticipated.

MOTOR CARS AT THE HUNT

Duke of Beaufort Takes Action

The Duke of Beaufort, who entertained the Prince of Wales for the Beaufort Hunt Ball, issued a notice with reference to the presence of motor-cars at hunt meetings, and incidentally gives a lesson on hunting field etiquette.

"I notice," he says, "that certain people who hunt are now in the habit of having their cars to follow the hounds all day with their grooms. I would point out that this is unnecessary and against the interests of foxhunting, and I must request that the practice cease.

"It is quite easy to leave the motor at a certain place, from whence it can be easily summoned by telephone or otherwise.

"I would also suggest that people coming to the meet in motor cars should be most careful not to interfere with the sport, and keep well behind the hunt. It is evident that a number of motors following the hounds too closely is prejudicial to sport.

"I notice, with regret, that the regulations sent out with regard to second horsemen, are not being attended to, and I further notice that they ride with the field instead of behind, and that going to the covert, going home, and frequently during the day, they ride in the fields. This causes inconvenience and damage to farmers.

"I must request particular attention to be paid to all regulations."

WHADDON HUNT DISPUTE ENDED.

The toast of "Good-bye to the Hunting Disputes" was drunk by farmers at the meet of the Whaddon Chase Hounds at Horwood when it was announced that Colonel Selby Lowndes had decided to withdraw his action claiming that he was elected Master last year.

A large field included Lord Furness, Lord Ivor Churchill, Lord Blandford, Lord Hillingdon, and the Master, Lord Dalmeny. Sport was only moderate throughout the day.

THE IMMORTAL POEM

AFTER THE CHINESE OF LI-TAI-PO.

I write a verse, then, with a pensive eye,
Watch, through my window, on the azure sky,
The bamboos that maintain a murmuring
Like the soft music of a babbling spring.
On the white paper how the letters glow
Like tiny plum-tree buds upon the snow.
The oranges of Kiang-nan awhile
Are perfumed; but their scent is volatile;
Women need love, as roses need the sun,
Or soon their sweet and scented course is run;
But thou, my poem, hast no need of these,
Nor yet of bamboo-voices in the breeze,
To help thee to outlive the centuries.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Glasgow Slums Huge Source of Revenue to Bookmakers: City of Gamblers and Socialists: Liberalism Losing Its Hold on Scotland

From Our Own Correspondent.

Edinburgh, Jan. 22.

If you want to get an insight into the underworld of Glasgow, borrow or steal the volume of evidence taken before the Select Committee on a Betting Duty. Picture to yourselves four streets of tenement houses, with a population of 10,600 working folk, supporting seven bookmakers or their agents, and yielding a revenue in bets of £300 a day!

Of course, a large part of this amount comes back in winnings, yet it seems incredible that four streets in Glasgow, in these days of depression, should be able to gamble on horse-racing to the tune of £300 a day.

It was explained that these four streets were not exceptional, that they were just four ordinary streets in a working-class quarter, and that all the streets in Glasgow of the same class gambled in the same way. All this was street-betting carried on in "closes"—and was, of course, illegal.

Glasgow seems to take to betting as thoroughly as it does to Socialism, and for the same reason—as a distraction from the dreadful monotony of modern industrialism. If you and I had to do the same job every day, over and over again, and live in a Glasgow tenement, we should bet when we could and drink all the whiskey we could get. Also, we should vote for any quack who offered us any avenue of escape from the dullness of our lives.

DAUGHTERS OF MR. MACDONALD.

A good deal of interest naturally centres in the daughters of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. They have been brought up most carefully by their father under a scheme which his wife outlined before she died, and have inherited her taste and his for reading of the solidly instructive order.

Mr. MacDonald never has had time nor much inclination to give to modern novels even when they are good, and Miss Isabel MacDonald and her sisters are better acquainted with Dickens and Thackeray and Scott than they are with Galsworthy or Conrad or Wells. They may have a nodding acquaintance with those writers, but certainly they have none with many another living novelist who makes many thousands per year.

The eldest girl, who is 20, has had the modern idea of carving a career for herself, but her father needs her at home and his wishes come first. She is a nice-looking girl with frank, kindly manners, and she is not too deadly serious to take an interest in a mild amount of party going and in dress. Her most constant companion is her father's private secretary, Miss Rosa Rosenberg, a clever and attractive young Jewess who is enthusiastically interested in her work and a model of discretion.

THE LATE MRS. MACDONALD.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, like Mr. Bonar Law, came to place and power too late for his success to be shared by a beloved wife. Mrs. MacDonald—she died in 1911—was Margaret Ethel, a daughter of the late Professor J. H. Gladstone, and a niece of Lord Kelvin. A woman of great charm and of remarkable ability, Mrs. MacDonald interested herself especially in work on behalf of children. Her husband's memoir "Margaret Ethel MacDonald," is a beautiful tribute to her memory.

SCOTLAND'S POLITICS.

The election returns for Scotland make interesting reading. In the 1906 election and in both the elections of 1910 the Liberals won 58 seats, as against the Unionist 11. In 1922 they had 28 seats to the Unionist 14, and in the recent election they got 23 seats to the Unionist 15. So that in the last 17 years the Liberals have lost no fewer than 35 seats in Scotland, whilst the Unionists have gained four. If one also takes into consideration the fact that at the last election the Unionists polled about 40,000 more votes in Scotland than the Liberals, one is justified in coming to the conclusion that the Scottish people are gradually turning down Liberalism in favour of either Socialism or Unionism.

UNION OF EXILED SCOTS.

The numerous London Scottish functions which of late years have become one of the characteristic scoial features of the winter season have great potentialities from the point of view of propaganda.

Their influence, however, is being concentrated this year on reforms, including primarily the enrolment in one or other of the 60 odd Scottish societies which exist in the Metropolis of every exiled Scot.

Statists who have been investigating the subject assert that of roughly 80,000 Northerners in London some 30,000 are members of no society at all. A lead in the campaign of conversion and recruitment is being given by the Highland Club, whose president in a statement expresses his determination to raise the membership from 300 to 3,000. Happily for the propagandists, there are many methods of appealing to the susceptibilities of the lachrymose and sentimental Scot and convincing him of the excellence of hyperborean Freemasonry, and those who know the national qualities predict that ere long the entire London Scottish community will be allied in one great confederation.

CHINA YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

For a number of years there has been in existence in Edinburgh a "School of Study and Training" under the auspices of the United Free Church of Scotland "for the better equipment of voluntary Church workers and to prepare men and women for appointments at home and abroad.

The classes for the present term (the 13th)included a series of ten lectures by the Rev. James Webster, D.D., whose death was referred to in this letter some time ago. Mr. Webster's place, however, will be taken by the Rev. George Douglas of Liaoyang, Manchuria, at present home on leave.

FREAK GOLF TEES.

Freak tees are not unfamiliar on the golf course. Whether or not the enormous mound which the very long handicap lady player takes comes under that category need not be discussed, but one knows the type of lady golfer who leaves behind her enough sand to serve the next half-dozen players. The patent rubber tee is seen even in championships, but the palm for finickiness in tees may be given to the man from a London club who played in a St. Andrews Championship, and brought north with him in a little bag a supply of sand from his own course, so that he would play off a tee made of sand of the identical consistency to which he was accustomed. Major H. D. Gillies, however, puts all such people out of court with the 9in. tees he has been employing. They are made of a stick of wood with rubber tubing at the top, and can be varied according to the wind from 3 inches up to 15. Hitting a ball off such a tee seems to belong rather to the category of Kirkwood's trick display than to serious golf. Major Gillies, anyway, has set people wondering principally whether it is all a joke, but he drives so well with them that on the principle of the French proverb, he is laughing best. The only possible theory behind it is that with such a tee you get a flat swing, and with a flat swing a low-flying ball. Before the war Major Gillies was a bigger personality in golf than he has been since. During the war, it may be recalled, he made a great reputation as a facial surgeon, and saved from permanent disfigurement many a wounded man.

SCOTTISH-CALIFORNIAN CHAMPION.

It's a far cry from Carnoustie to California, where Macdonald Smith, the Forfarshire crack, has been distinguishing himself by annexation of the championship against the pick of the world's golfers. Smith was the player who at Troon in June last startled the field by first breaking the record with a 69. He plays with clubs that are never cleaned, and stops his putter dead for a moment in the swing before he brings it forward to the ball.

SCOTTISH GIRLS 100 YEARS AGO.

Women who broke away from the iron-bound conventionality of the early Victorian era and drank ale to the detriment of their figures are described in the "Letters and Journal of Anne Chalmers," edited by her daughter. The letters start in 1828 when Anne, the daughter of Dr. Chalmers, Professor of Moral Philosophy, St. Andrews, was 15 years of age.

"Do you remember our biscuits and beer and the last feast we had?" she asks Anne Parkers, her friend, who later became Lady Cardwell. "I read somewhere lately of a young lady of 17 who had a large fortune, but who to her other charms added the faculty of being an excellent boon companion. In vain her friends tried to dissuade her, on account of her shape, from her ale-bibbing propensities. She said that by continuing she could only lose a husband, while a pot of good ale was the soul of her existence."

The lapses of Anne Chalmers from the conventions made her the despair of her friends. "I remember being told in a shocked way," Writes her daughter, "that at a dinner party she often went to sleep in the drawing-room, when with the ladies. She woke up, however, when the men came in, and they all clustered round her, eager to talk to someone so bright and amusing. That, of course, only added to the enormity of her offence."

A cousin meeting Anne Chalmers one day in Princes Street, Edinburgh, stared in astonishment at her weird combination of a green dress and a crêpe bonnet. "Anne, why are you dressed like this?" asked the cousin. "Because I am in mourning for Mr. J—," was the reply. "He was only a cousin's husband and no relation, so as I had the bonnet I am just wearing it."

Anne Chalmers disliked intensely the custom of calling people by their Christian names, and never called her husband anything but Mr. Hanna. When reproached by him for her coldness and lack of affection, she told him that she did not know him well enough to call him anything else!

MISCELLANEA.

In the course of a lecture in Glasgow, Mr. Walter de la Mare, the poet, referred to the march of what we call progress, and named one or two of its symbols. Neither a smile nor a disapproving grunt greeted his grouping of "aeroplanes, newspapers, and poison gas."

From photographic revelations of the picture papers it appears that the Duchess of Atholl and Mr. Walter Claude Mellor, of Chelsea, who is married to a daughter of the Earl of Galloway, now attire their London house with butlers and flunkies in full Highland costume. The opinion of counsel is that no legal steps can be taken to prevent this.

Professor R. W. Reid has been telling the members of the Aberdeen Anatomical and Anthropological Society that the size of a person's head is no guide to the intelligence of its owner. In other words a big head does not necessarily imply a big brain. That knocks another old tradition on the head. It used to be said that Aberdeen people took a bigger size in hats than any other town in the Kingdom, and — well, of course, the inference was obvious. And has it not been said, too, that when the late Mr. Gladstone wanted a hat that would really fit his head he sent to an Aberdeen hatter for it?

OUR PARIS LETTER

Government's Financial Project: The Profession of Being a Deputy

From Our Own Correspondent.

Paris, Jan. 31.

The Government now seems to be sure of a majority for the far-reaching financial proposals which it considers necessary for the preservation of the national credit or, to be more exact, the protection of the national currency against undue depreciation. This result has been obtained by means which must strike the foreign observer as curious, to say the least.

M. Poincaré attended a meeting of the various Republican groups which have hitherto supported him, and told them that those who voted for his financial proposals could rely on his support at the forthcoming general election. This was another way of saying: "If you vote for me now, all the local Government influence will be at your service in your constituency." Such a bargain seems perfectly natural to anyone acquainted with French political life.

To nine out of every 10 members of the Chamber, re-election is a matter of vital importance. They are men who have given up their original occupations and have taken kindly to politics. Some of them sincerely hope to render service to their country by framing useful laws and removing abuses. To many of these men, who were originally doctors, lawyers, insurance agents, tradesmen and so on, their election represents a rise in life of which they are very proud. If they are rejected and have no recourse but to return to their former comparatively insignificant positions, they must look upon themselves as discredited, if not disgraced.

A CAUSE OF HESITANCY.

They are naturally anxious to avoid such a misfortune by keeping their seats; but this year's elections will be no walk-over, and the opponents of the present régime are not too scrupulous over their choice of weapons. The deputies of the majority, who do not profess to be heroes, now find themselves required to vote for a great increase in taxation, new fiscal burdens and the abolition of thousands of jobs in the Civil Service. No wonder they hesitate! And no wonder they require from the Premier an unmistakeable indication that do ut des will be his motto, especially as they must be aware that even official support may not be enough to secure re-election for them. It all depends how the country takes the situation so suddenly sprung on it.

One view is that the French people, feeling that they are engaged in an economic struggle with not only their late enemies but their late allies, will agree to almost any sacrifice as a measure of war, in very much the spirit they displayed from 1914 to 1918. Another is that the electors will make M. Poincaré responsible for not foreseeing and providing against the present crisis, to which it might be replied that, but for the sensational fall in the franc, Parliament could never have been persuaded that the danger existed and, therefore, would not have tried to remove its causes. It is quite conceivable that the crisis is a blessing in disguise, but we do not yet know whether the electors are inclined to take this view.

A FINE SCION OF ROYALTY.

The Duc de Montpensier, whose death at the Château de Randan, in the Puy-de-Dôme, is just reported, was by far the most original and energetic representative of the former royal family since the time of Prince Henri d'Orléans, the explorer. The Duc de Montpensier, who was only 40 years of age at the time of his death, had his cousin's passion for travel and exploration, and he headed several expeditions in which hunting was combined with geographical investigations. His adventures were a fruitful source of gossip in the capitals of Europe. At one time he was planning an aeroplane tour of Siam; at another he was credited with a desire to have himself proclaimed King of Albania; at another he was proposing the organization in France of a body of volunteers to take over the transport services of the country in the event of a strike. He publicly disowned his cousin, King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, when that crafty politician sided with Germany against the Allies. On all his hunting expeditions he took cinematograph operators with him, as well as a big retinue, as he considered it policy to make an impression on the natives.

Another prominent Frenchman who has departed this life is M. Georges Breittmayer, who was a wonderful fencer and a great authority on everything connected with the gentle art of duelling. The most serious affair of honour in which he figured as principal occurred in 1911, when he was 50 years of age. His adversary was Comte Léon de Montesquiou, who, being a poet, had a considerable dose of susceptibility. He also knew how to handle a sword, and, though wounded in four places, he managed to score three hits on the formidable Breittmayer. The latter, though 53 when the war broke out, volunteered for service and distinguished himself as an aeroplane observer.

THREE THEATRES IN ONE.

One of the most interesting theatrical centres in Paris is to be found in the Avenue Montaigne, quite a long way from the boulevards. It has three theatres under one roof. The largest, called the Theatre des Champs Elysées, is used for opera and Russian ballet; the second, known as the Comédie, does very well for modern plays without too elaborate stage settings; and finally we have the Studio des Champs Elysées, for short plays. Under the enlightened management of M. Jacques Hébertot, these three theatres have among them provided the public with a remarkable variety of good things presented with a constant desire to obtain the best artistic results. This week the Studio is giving two plays by M. Jean Sarment, a young actor-dramatist who, in a different style, seems destined to become almost as celebrated as M. Sacha Guilty. His "Facilité" is a very clever study of the influence of milieu and the fatal facility with which a well-meaning person can fall from one compromise into another. His other play, of which the central figure is Don Juan, old and bereft of his power over the other sex, is less successful.

GLANDS MONKEY AND OTHERWISE

"Alice in Wonderland"—and Life

"If such changes can be produced, do not think it means an increase in longevity. All that it means is that the powers with which we are gifted will be utilized right up to the end; but we are not going to increase the span of life." This was the conclusion reached by Professor Winifred Cullis, in a lecture on "Monkey Glands and Others," delivered at King's College in connexion with the Scientific Novelties Exhibition. If we want to lengthen life, she explained, we must go to eugenics, as statistics showed that the children of long-lived parents had an expectation of years more of life than the average population. "If you want long life, choose long-lived parents," she said.

In the first part of her lecture Professor Cullis explained the position and functions of the glands of internal secretion, and said that their investigation formed one of the real romances of the last 20 or 30 years. They were of transcendant interest, and appealed more to the imagination than any other structures of the body. Giants and tall people were so because, at the time of growth, the pituitary gland was very active; a deficiency of the gland caused dwarfs. Experiments with this gland on animals had produced animals of great size, though not so large as those imagined in Mr. Wells's story; and, in an experiment on a boy, the result was that he grew two and a half inches in a single term. Professor Cullis compared these experiments to the experiences of "Alice in Wonderland," and said that these delightful stories suggested more truth than their authors knew.

"I sometimes wish," added the lecturer, "that some politicians were better physiologists."

CHINA COAST OFFICERS AND THE PIRACY REGULATIONS

Strong Objections by China Coast Officers' Guild and Marine Engineers' Guild: Full Correspondence with Government: Rules Said to Be Impracticable

OFFICERS' LIVES ENDANGERED AND NO INSURANCE

Shanghai, March 12, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—We are directed to hand you the following information, including correspondence which has passed between the Hongkong Government and these Guilds, on the subject of Piracy on the China Coast.

Following the piracy on board the str. Sui An on November 19, 1922, a Commission was appointed by the Hongkong Government to inquire into the outrage.

This Commission was composed as follows:—

Mr. J. R. Wood, Magistrate, President.

Mr. C. McInnes Messer, Col. Treasurer (formerly Capt. Supt. of Police).

Lt. Com. C. W. Beckwith, R.N., Harbour Master.

Mr. H. P. White, Director, Douglas S. S. Co.

Mr. P. M. B. Lake, Marine Supt. I-C. S. N. Co. (retired).

The Commission held 7 public sittings 4.12.22—13.12.22. at which all available witnesses were examined, and on 26.1.23. its Report was presented to H.E. the Governor of Hongkong.

This Report made, inter alia, the following recommendations:—

EXISTING REGULATIONS EXPERIMENTAL.

"The existing Piracy Regulations when originally passed were experimental in character. In the light of experience they have been only partially enforced though their form has not been amended. We think that it may be found more convenient to repeal the present Regulations and substitute others than to use them as a basis for amendment."

"It is a tradition in the Mercantile Marine Service that the Master and his officers shall defend their ship against piratical attack. The obligation to resist pirates is also imperative under the existing Piracy Regulations. In our opinion it is essential that this statement of duty should be maintained and emphasized. It should, we think, be the first regulation in any new series. The master and the other ship's officers must be relieved of all duty to exercise a discretion whether to resist pirates or not. Their duty must be clear. If they do not resist their conduct should be submitted to inquiry. It is therefore just and necessary that they should be given a scheme of defence which has a good chance of success and in which each master for himself has a personal confidence. Resistance to pirates once begun cannot be abandoned. It is then a fight to a finish without quarter. The officers must be placed in the strongest possible position for defence on board their ship. They should also be able to rely on the thoroughness of the precautions taken by the Police Department and upon the support of efficient patrols. With reference to River steamers we are of opinion that the hand of officers will be greatly strengthened in carrying out piracy regulations if owners were required to give a bond to the Harbour Master undertaking to pay to his order a sum not exceeding three months' salary of any officer who, in the event of his summary dismissal under a contract made in this port, may be able to show to the satisfaction of the Harbour Master that his dismissal is due in any substantial degree to his observance of the regulations. We also think that the present system under which officers are liable to dismissal on 24 hours' notice is unsatisfactory and that all officers on river steamers should sign on articles for not less than three months."

THE DRAFT REGULATIONS.

On September 4, 1923 the Hon. Col. Sec. forwarded the Draft Regulations for the consideration of the Guilds.

The Sections which most concerned the personnel of the vessels were:—

1.—"It is the duty of the master and other certificated officers to resist to the uttermost any piratical attack. This obligation is imperative and no discretion may be exercised as to whether to resist pirates or not."

2.—"The appointment or employment of any person as master of any British ship, or of any foreign ship holding a passenger certificate under section 10 of the Merchant Shipping Ordinance, 1899, or of any foreign ship holding a special licence under section 38 of the Merchant Shipping Ordinance, 1899, which is about to proceed or is proceeding on any voyage from Hongkong to Macao, or to any port or place on the Canton River or the West River, shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council who shall in his absolute discretion have power to refuse to allow the appointment or employment of any particular person."

3.—"Officers who for any reason are considered by the Governor in Council to be unfit to take part in the defence of the ship shall not be permitted to sign on the ship's articles, and if they have signed, they shall cease to be employed as officers on the ship."

5.—"The master shall have complete control of the ship and all on board, and shall not be dictated to or interfered with or suffer himself to be dictated to or interfered with in any way by the owners, agents, charterers, licensees, compradore, pilot or crew in any matter connected in any manner with the repelling of any piratical attack on or on board the ship or with the rendering of assistance to any other ship so attacked or which he may consider to be in need of such assistance."

7.—"When the master of any ship has any cause whatever to believe or to consider that any other ship may be in need of assistance in respect of a piratical attack it shall be his duty to approach such ship as closely as possible, to stand by it, to prevent the access of pirates to or from native craft, to assist in rescue work, to call other ships to the aid of the ship attacked, and to do all such other acts as may be necessary or advisable to assist the said ship in repelling the attack."

THE OFFICERS' OBJECTIONS.

On September 9 a combined meeting of both Guilds was held to consider the Draft Regulations and the following letter was addressed to the Hon. Col. Sec. on the subject; to which neither acknowledgment nor reply was received.

Sept. 12, 1923.

The Honourable the Colonial Secretary, Hongkong.

SIR,—We have to thank you for your letter of the 3rd instant, enclosing copies of draft Piracy Regulations, and now have the honour to report for the information of His Excellency the Governor, that we have taken every opportunity, by calling a meeting and by personal interview, to elicit the views of our members on the subject.

Generally, the Regulations as a whole are viewed by our members with great disapprobation, as being unjust, impracticable and, therefore, useless for the purpose for which they are devised.

We would first point out that we have season to believe (which is strongly supported by the wording of the document) that no active member of the Mercantile Marine has been consulted in the framing of the Regulations, which do not as a whole, or in any material point, coincide with the tenor of the suggestions put forward at an earlier date.

SECTION 1.

This section discloses a very grave misconception of the conditions under which piracy occurs on the Canton River delta and the China Coast generally.

In postulating that it is the duty of the master and other certificated officers to resist to the utmost any piratical attack it assumes that they have a crew of their own nationals under their command and that the pirates attack the vessel from the outside.

This is not the case, not only are these officers surrounded by an alien crew, but this alien crew may be, passively if not actively, part of the piratical gang. (Instance, the quartermaster of the "Sui An" leaving the wheel and jumping to the main deck for refuge).

The further and greater difficulty arises from the fact that none of these attacks are initiated from outside the vessel. Till the actual moment of launching the first attack the pirates are apparently peaceful passengers and are free to place themselves in any coign of vantage which they have ample time and opportunity to select, without let or hindrance and, possibly, with the connivance, if not actual co-operation of their compatriots who form the crew.

This is the position in which three, four or, at most five European officers find themselves when they are commanded, by persons who have not been, or ever will be so placed, to resist to the utmost, and gives reason for the pertinent question:—What is the utmost they can do? To which the obvious answer is:—Absolutely nothing.

"This obligation is imperative and no discretion may be exercised whether to resist pirates or not."

Imperative obligations admit of no discretion. Discretion is the quality without which no man can be an officer; the very idea of an officer without discretion is a paradox and, to say the least, ludicrous and absurd. The officer is the leader of others, the individual with the brain to direct the forces at his disposal and it is he who assesses the position and issues the executive commands.

SECTIONS 2 AND 3.

"Any particular officer considered unfit by the Governor in Council shall cease to be employed as an officer on the ship."

As the particular officer in question will hold a Certificate of Competency issued by the Board of Trade and will have no other vocation, what steps will be taken to permit him to obtain an honourable living?

It would appear that it is the intention of the Hongkong Government that Officers of the Merchant Service who were, during the War, ranked with and next to Officers of the Royal Navy are now to be treated with less consideration than the "ratings" in that Service.

This attitude is preposterous, and the Officers of His Majesty's Mercantile Marine serving on the China Coast demand fair treatment and the recognition of their status which is nowhere evinced in the document under review.

SECTION 5.

"The Master shall have complete control of the ship and all on board."

Without discrimination no man can control, without discretion no man can discriminate, hence it is impossible for the master to have complete control and a paradox is disclosed which places the master in a position of being unable to avoid the violation of some part of the Regulations.

SECTION 7.

"When the master—has any cause whatever to believe or to consider—."

But by Section 1 he has no discretion!

Further, we are directed to say that the officers of the Mercantile Marine on the China Coast will be delighted to assist in any measure which will tend to the extinction of piracy, or to consider any practical suggestions which may be advanced by their professional brethren. They do not, however, propose to allow their duty to be dictated or criticized by any person or persons who are not professionally connected with the active duties of the Mercantile Marine.

In conclusion it is submitted that piracy, fire and shipwreck are risks common to every person interested in the voyage and, as such, are insurable. The officers engaged on the China Coast fail to perceive why they should gratuitously shoulder the responsibility at the dictation of any person or persons who do not personally or in any manner share the risk which these Regulations direct that they shall take.

We have the honour to be Sir,
Your obedient servants,

CHINA COAST OFFICERS' GUILD,
Sgd. T. T. Laurenson, Assist. Secretary.

MARINE ENGINEERS' GUILD OF CHINA
Sgd. W. I. Stokes, Branch Secretary.

The list of piracies to date is as follows:

Sui An	Br.	19.11.22.
Fatshan	Br.	8. 2.23.
Wing Ping	Ch.	13. 3.23.

Sanning	Br.	23.10.23.
Hydrangea	Br.	27.12.23.
Tailee	Br.	21. 1.24.

Naturally, the publication of the Draft Regulations was followed by a considerable amount of comment and correspondence in the Press of the Colony as well as that in Shanghai.

Certain measures, (intended to make for a more rigorous adherence to the Regulations of 1914 which were then still in force), were initiated, but, being the butt of public criticism and condemned by the Commission, it was evident that they, both the old Regulations and the draft new ones, were not only inadequate but utterly at variance with the opinions of those most intimately concerned.

The Guilds, whilst watching the matter closely, concluded that their unanswered letter of 12.9.23 would take a certain amount of time to bear fruit and did not attempt to harass the Government by further communications. The murder, however, of Captain Willox of the Tailee, following so close upon the Hydrangea and Sanning outrages, emphatically demonstrated that the continued indifference of the Hongkong Government rendered it imperative that the seriousness of the problem be again submitted for their earnest consideration.

In response to the desires of a large section of members a combined meeting was held on Sunday, February 3, there being present 56 members of both Guilds, the outcome of which was the following letter, addressed to the Hon. Col. Sec.:—

The Honourable the Colonial Secretary,
Hongkong, Feb. 4, 1924.

Sir,—We have the honour to inform you that a combined meeting of members of the China Coast Officers' Guild and the Marine Engineers' Guild of China was held on Sunday the 3rd instant, at which were present 56 members, most of whom are engaged in vessels subject to the Regulations made under the Piracy Prevention Ordinance, No. 23 of 1914.

At this meeting convened for the purpose, the matter of piracy was exhaustively discussed and we were, by it, instructed to forward, for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor, the following resolutions:—

(1.) That, in so far as piracy prevention is concerned, the Police Department be relieved from all duties in regard to sea-going and river steamers whilst outside the waters of the Colony and concentrate its attention to detecting and preventing the embarkation of unlawful persons and/or firearms whilst these vessels are in Hongkong Harbour, unless some better method be devised.

(2.) That all arms and armed guards required by the Piracy Regulations be removed from every vessel and the absolute command thereof restored to the Master as laid down in the Merchant Shipping Acts, unless some better method is devised.

(3.) There shall be at once inaugurated a proper system of patrol in the Danger Zone.

(4.) That all vessels subject to Piracy Regulations shall have wireless telegraphy installed and under the control of a competent operator signed on the Articles.

(5.) That insurance be automatically effected for every Master, Officer and Engineer whose duty takes him into the Danger Zone.

(6.) That every case of piracy shall be the subject of inquiry at the Harbour Office (as soon as possible after the outrage) with the Harbour Master as President of the Court, which should consist of active Mercantile Marine Officers of both departments, with the addition of one active Naval Officer.

(7.) That a substantial reward be offered for information which leads to the arrest of any person implicated in any piratical attack.

(8.) That a reward should be paid in all cases of seizure of arms and/or ammunition.

(9.) That these Resolutions be at once presented to the Honourable the Colonial Secretary for the consideration of His Excellency the Officer Administering the Government, and a detailed reply requested in time to present to this meeting which stands adjourned till Sunday, February 17, 1924 at the same time and place for the purpose of receiving such reply.

As, in the interests of conciseness, it has been deemed advisable to make the Resolutions as brief as possible, it is considered necessary that the point of view of our members should be explained at somewhat greater length and we are instructed to submit the following objects and reasons:—

(The numbers refer to the Resolutions).

It is considered:—

(1.) That, as long as the Police Authorities have the control of a duty which is obviously outside the province of their proper activities, so long will the Naval Authorities refrain from taking any steps in a matter which is so essentially maritime and which cannot be efficiently directed under any dual control.

(2a.) That, as arms are indispensable to pirates for the prosecution of their nefarious designs, it is obvious that they will make them a principal objective, firstly to gain possession of the ship and, secondly to add them to their armament; it therefore strongly emphasises the contention that these arms are a danger and should be at once removed from the vessels.

(2b.) That the guards, who are neither sailors nor policemen, are not sufficiently intelligent to act in an emergency on previously formulated instructions without the steadying influence of a controlling European Officer. In no case has the initiative been taken by them, they have always declined combat and accepted the least painful of the alternatives of being disarmed or shot. It is obvious that this attitude in an emergency is a hindrance rather than a help to the already outmanned Master of the vessel in any attempt to retain control of his ship.

That the control, as established by the Regulations, is a divided one in which the influence of the Police is paramount, and to such an extent that the authority of the Master is largely discounted and is frequently sullenly resented.

That even when reports are made to the Officer Commanding Guards as to misconduct (sleeping on duty, drunkenness, disobedience of the orders of the Master and Officers) the penalties are ridiculously inadequate, and the little corrective effect they might have is rendered absolutely nugatory by the fact that frequently the same guard is returned to resume duty on board the same ship. His respect for the ships officers is in no way enhanced when his misconduct in condoned in this flagrant manner.

That a striking instance is afforded in the case when corrective measures (report to O.C.G.) were taken against one of the guards by the Chief Officer of a river steamer, which subsequently led to his death at the hands of the man he had reported; the said officer being fatally shot in the back whilst on the bridge at his post of duty, the murderer being allowed to escape.

(3.) That a system of patrolling the routes traversed by these vessels by armed craft equipped with wireless installations is the only means by which efficient counter measures can be taken.

That this is a duty which should be entirely in the hands of the Royal Navy which is the only Service adequately equipped to carry it to a successful issue.

(4.) That the installation of wireless telegraphy, although possibly expensive as to first cost, is nevertheless imperative and, if it tends to save life and property or check this crying evil, as it most assuredly will, no consideration of first cost should be allowed to weigh against this obvious factor of efficiency.

(5.) That the money paid by the shipowners for the services of the guards might be more suitably directed to the insurance of the lives and bodies of the European officers engaged in vessels subject to the Piracy Regulations. Under present conditions it is the lives and bodies of these officers which form the premium of insurance on the property of others. No form of recompense for bodily injury sustained is demanded by the Law and none has ever been paid.

When it is remembered that the least amount paid (in the case of vessels carrying four (4) guards is $1,200 per annum, it is clear that this amount would easily cover any premium on the life and limb of any of the officers engaged on that vessel. It would be an assurance to these gentlemen that they were some real value, rather than (as appears

"THE LINKAGE OF LIFE"

Notes of a Sermon Preached by the Rev. C. E. Darwent in Union Church, Tientsin, Sunday Evening, Feb. 3

Text:, Acts XII. 20. "Because their country was fed from the king's country."

I suppose that Professor J. Arthur Thomson is the most eminent naturalist that the British Empire possesses. One need therefore make no apology for taking a title and plenty of illustrations from a recent article of his on the title. It seems useless to read, if one does not use one's reading for the illumination of divine truth.

Professor Thomson says that "one of the central ideas of modern biology is that of the linkage of life." A very striking phrase. He quotes a fine phrase from old John Locke, the philosopher, now undeservedly under a cloud, to this effect, "Every part of nature is a retainer of some other part." A most remarkable prevision of modern thought. Every part of nature is like a retainer of one of the old barons; dependent on him. That is very fine. Professor Thomson says that "the new biology puts the correlation of organisms in the centre of its thinking," a Latinized way of saying that all things are related. The day when we were told that "nature is a bitter and ceaseless struggle" is past. Nature is not so "red in tooth and claw" as we were once told it was. Creatures do not spend their whole time in clawing one another, but spend a great deal of it in helping one another. This, by the way, is a lesson to all those who make it a reproach to the Church that she changes her viewpoint occasionally. They say she contrasts badly with the fixity of science. The answer is that science changes just the same, as we see here, yet loses none of her credit. Why should the Church of Christ?

WHAT COMMON THINGS DO FOR US.

Let us then look at some of Professor Thomson's cases of the "linkage of life." There is the bracken. We all know it. I believe we have it here in North China. Farmers at Home find it a plague, beautiful and paintable as it is in a wood or on a hillside, with its rich orange colour. Like sin, once in, it is hard to get out. Spraying with sulphuric acid is apt to spoil other things as well. So then, use it for bedding. Then cut it up and throw it into rivers. The catch of fish at once increases, for "the slow decay of the bracken promotes the multiplication of animalculæ, on which small crustaceans feed, and the fish feed on them." We all love the sight of the heather, whether of the purple Scottish, or of the more red English variety. Now it has always been a problem, how it is that the heather can get a living where other plants cannot. That is the fact, and we need not wonder, therefore, that in Scotland it is taken as a national emblem. It can live where other plants starve to death. It appears now to science that the heather has done a very wise and remarkable thing. It has established a working partnership with a fungus. Heather and fungus form a kind of firm, of which the fungus has the capital; "The fungus penetrates through and through the heather, through every root, and twig and flower and leaf," and "the heather is a dual organism, depending for its food on the fungus." It is not, observe, a case of the heather doing better with the fungus, but the heather cannot live at all without it. A "linkage of life" indeed.

The thistle is our, pleasant friend the cabbage, not often sung by poets, but whom the Chinese have found, without knowing why, to be a very good friend, for creeping beeps, far more so than fond of a bovine nature. Why is this? It appears that we need nitrogen, the atmospheric gas, in our food, if we are to be strong. Man can manufacture nitrogen by sending a terrific lightning flash of electricity through air, but he makes a tremendous and expensive bother over it. The cabbage, that is as high or higher than we are. I have read that the temperature of Lake Baikal governs the weather of the whole of this East of Asia; it is such a mighty expanse of frozen water, that it chills the warmer breezes from the south, and we do not get warm till Baikal is warm. So it is with us. We are all "fed from the king's country," not from ourselves. So many of the elements that build us up to true and noble man and womanhood come from others "from the king's country." That cannot but be a miserable and a low-toned life that is wrapped up in self, that has nothing higher than its own ambitions, its own interests, its own pleasures,

"For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves, and those who call them friends."

The wise man sees that he is dependent on innumerable regions of existence, for not only his well being, but for his very life, just as the heather depends somewhat unpicturesquely on the fungus. It is our interlinking with others that gives us most of the things that are worth having in life. "We are all members one of another," says Paul. And the world can never progress, as it might do, until we all realize that God has made the world so, that if we are weak and sefish and bad, we make the life of other people around us weaker, and cripple them. We are all "fed" from some "king's country" or other.

NATURE THE GREAT BINDER.

Nature is one "king's country." It is pathetic to see how dwellers in the centres of great cities feel that, even more than countrymen. As you run into London and look down into the hundreds of back-gardens of the streets of working-class houses, there is always some attempt to have a bit of nature; a greenhouse, a few flowers, some fowls, a bit of grass, anything alive and that will grow. These people cannot feed their souls,

"From old well-heads of haunted rills,
And the heart of purple hills," so they do the best they can on a few drabbled geraniums. God has made His works to be remembered," and there is dissatisfaction in the masses of our best governed cities because men are so far from the green fields. God has made us to be so constituted that no Free Libraries and clean streets compensate for God's beautiful world. Our fellowmen are a "king's country." How we are linked up with them! And that in ten thousand ways. When we think about it we ought to be thanking God every day for all we receive and have received from them; we ought to make it a point of honour to see to it, that other lives benefit by ours. There are the past generations. We call ourselves "the heirs of the ages" and so we are. What books, what inventions, what conveniences we owe to the men who have passed away; we have inherited the fruits of their toil and brain-sweat, their tears and martyrdoms. "What have we that we have not received?" What a "king's country" are "the times of long ago"! We do admit it as Lincoln birthday celebrations prove.

And the toils and thoughts and activities of mankind to-day are a "king's country" that feed us and serve us. We enjoy a voyage on a luxuriously appointed steamer, say on the Indian Ocean. Do we think of the engineers, who are not reclining on deck on long chairs, but are down in the heat of the engine-room? It may be that those things, that we all hate on account of the inconvenience they cause, namely strikes, have a divine mission to us; to make us see, often to our intense surprise, how we are linked up with other people to whom we seldom give a thought. I lost four days of my holiday in 1911 on account of a threatened railway strike. I had to get to Dover when the lines opened, in order to cross to France and be sure of reaching Genoa. Strikes may be "means of grace." And other nations are a "king's country." Europe is in a grievous condition: Russia, emerging, ruined, from chaos; Germany bankrupt; France on the way to it; more men under arms than before the war; how can we wonder at unemployment and general misery, and prophecies of coming catastrophe? Victors in the war and vanquished are inextricably linked up with one another, and we have to work together or go down together.

THE LINKAGE WITH GOD.

Finally, there is the appeal of religion in these words; "We are fed from the king's country," from God, from that eternal world, where are the springs of all healthy life. There are people who seem to think that if they decide to have nothing to do with religion, they have snapped and broken all the links connecting them and their well-being with God. A great mistake is that. The world can never be what it was intended to be by its Maker, until we all see that we are "fed from the king's country," fed with His grace, His love, His power, given through His Spirit. "Without me, ye can do nothing"; "the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." Things will all go wrong unless men keep the candle lighted from heaven. Christian people believe that once One came from "the king's country," "holy and undefiled," "made a little lower than the angels, because of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour, that by the grace of God He should taste of death for every man." He came, we believe, from the King of "the king's country," filled with the fulness of God, that this sinful struggling world, might also, if it will, be filled with the fulness of God. The "linkage of life" is a linkage with God.

TEN YEARS' ADVANCE BY KOREAN WOMEN

Tremendous Strides Made in Many Directions During Past Decade

By Mrs. Choi Lay.

In Korea the past 10 years have seen, as it were, the birth of the rights, freedom and activities of women.

First, they have obtained the right to an education. Old time Korean parents considered that they were under an obligation to educate their sons, but to keep their daughters at home. Now they begin to realize their duty to educate their daughters also. Even 10 years ago the number of girls in attendance at primary schools was only 3,886, those attending secondary schools 291; in 1922 there were 42,816 primary scholars and 2,284 secondary.

Second, in their marriage relationship women have a new liberty. Ten years ago outside of the capital a girl was expected blindly to obey her parents and to have no voice in her marriage arrangements. She was not permitted to speak to her husband before his or her parents, nor was she expected to converse with him before others until after the birth of a child. To-day she may speak freely with her betrothed, and indeed with one to whom she is not even engaged. She may now express her opinion with regard to the actual engagement, and may write to her suitor. Even in non-Christian homes and among the uneducated the consent of the girl is now sought. Moreover the right of a girl to remain unmarried is recognized. This is perhaps the greatest freedom of all, since a few years ago the very existence of an unmarried girl of 25 would have been impossible A girl, however well educated and competent, was not expected to appear in public, and if she did so, it was in the face of severe criticism.

A great change has come into the relationship of mother and daughter-in-law, a very great change. Formerly the mother-in-law was the mistress, the daughter-in-law the life-long, unpaid slave. Nowadays, a daughter-in-law, having reached years of discretion before she enters her new home, joins in the counsels of the home, and is its mistress.

With regard to the education of the children, the mother formerly had no voice; now, about this also she is permitted to express her opinion, though indeed as yet she has not exactly a free hand.

Again, in purchasing supplies, the men now permit the women of the household to make purchase instead of running out to buy things themselves.

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Social intercourse has made a decided advance in 10 years. Ten years ago most of the unmarried girls of the capital were still wearing skirts over their heads, married women, cloaks; they were not free to go about the streets by day, and were expected to travel in sedan chairs. The uncovered woman was the subject of insult and staring; to-day those who follow the old customs are those to be gazed upon! In the country the wide reed hats, which covered not only the heads but most of the bodies of the young ladies, have fallen into disuse. A girl was scarcely permitted to visit her friend in the neighbourhood, now she may undertake work which carries her through out the country without reproach. This is a remarkable advance.

In public gatherings the curtain which secluded the women has been done away with, and a speaker no longer has to walk from end to end of the platform to catch sight of both, while mixed choirs are very common, and women are encouraged to address mixed audiences.

Korean women are now interested in many educational projects. In both city and village Korean women are making themselves responsible for the entire running of night schools and kindergartens. They have undertaken also a few day schools.

BUSINESS AND POLITICS.

Ten years ago it was very difficult to get women teachers even for primary schools; now they are available for secondary schools also, but the demand is greater than the supply. In some girls primary schools the classical masters (old style Chinese scholars) are the only remaining male teachers.

Ten years ago the Korean women doctors had died and there were as yet no successors, there were but a few nurses, no maternity nurses. Now there are several woman doctors, and a fine band of young nurses linked together in an association. Then only widows or destitute people were available as nurses, now the applicants are respected and some nurses' training schools ask for secondary education.

Woman's part in business and commerce has had in the past 10 years perhaps as radical a change as in any other field. Then women were not allowed even to go shopping. Now there are several large stores managed altogether by women There are also several women bank clerks, a great number of girls are taking commercial courses. The increase in the number of women newspaper writers is remarkable. A large number of women and girls are employed in factories.

In politics, also, circumstances have combined to furnish modern Korean women with a poignant interest in political affairs.

Ten years ago work in the church was of necessity largely in the hands of foreign women missionaries, with whom were associated a few outstanding women, Now most of such church business is in Korean women's hands. These are making themselves responsible for a definite part of the church budget. The standard of education for Bible women is very much higher, and women deaconesses and Sunday school teachers are doing efficient work.

The growth of women's societies in the past 10 years indicates the social development of the Korean woman. Ten years ago women's societies did not exist. This year they are vigorous and important enough to have come to the notice of the Government, where 58 organizations are recorded. A notable feature is the linking together of a number of organizations under the Y. W. C. A. Through these various societies women are coming to realize their responsibilities and to fulfil their wishes and desires. Thus the Korean woman takes her place in the world.

The past 10 years, then may be regarded as the "infancy" of the Korean woman. What possibilities of growth lie before her in the next 10 years? That she may increase in wisdom and stature and in favour with God and man is my sincere payer.—"Japan Advertiser."

ment, and these, too, seem to have been taken as reasonable and necessary.

THE "DANGER ZONE."

29.—The term "danger zone" shall include the following:—

(1) All routes by water between the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in the Harbour and the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in or at any port or place of loading or discharge on the Canton River or the West River or any river or estuary in the province of Kuangtung or the province of Kuangsi.

(2) All routes by water between the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in the harbour and the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in Macao harbour.

(3) All routes by water between the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in the Harbour and the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in Kwong Chau Wan harbour.

(4) All routes by water between the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in the Harbour and the ship's buoy, berth, anchorage or wharf in Amoy, Swatow, Hoihow and Haiphong harbours and in or at any port or place of loading or discharge on the coast of the province of Kuangtung or the province of Kuangsi; provided that in the case of a ship on a voyage from Hongkong the danger zone shall not extend to a greater distance than 120 miles along any such route.

A ship which is within the extremes of the above limits shall, except when at its wharf or moorings in or at a port or place of loading or discharge, be deemed to be within a danger zone whether on a voyage from Hongkong or on a voyage to Hongkong.

30.—No ship shall leave the waters of the Colony except from the Harbour, and after leaving its wharf or moorings and while within a danger zone no passenger or thing shall be allowed to embark or be taken on board except in the saving of life or rescue work at sea.

GUARDS.

31.—Every ship shall carry at least 4 guards, and River Steamers on the routes given in 29 (1) and (2) shall carry at least six guards.

32.—The duties of the guards shall be as follows:—

(a) To assist the Police in searching the passengers and their baggage and goods, the crew and staff of the ship and their belongings, and the ship and its stores and equipment and cargo.

(b) To protect the bridge deck and the access from the bridge deck to the engine and boiler rooms.

(c) To endeavour as far as possible to see that no ammunition or arms are smuggled on board.

No guard shall be employed on any duty other than those specified above.

33.—Subject to the performance of the duties required of them by these regulations, and subject to the right of the Captain Superintendent of Police to direct them with reference to any search, the guards shall be under the entire control of the master of the ship, and shall take no orders direct from the owners, agents, charterers or licensees of the ship, and all orders given by the owners, agents, charterers or licensees to any guard shall be given through the master of the ship.

SEARCHING OF PASSENGERS AND CARGO.

The next seven Sections deal with cargo and the searching of passengers, and would seem to allow little loophole for any lethal weapons or doubtful characters to get on board without a grave risk of detection.

GENERAL.

44.—In the case of a piratical attack in the daytime repeated blasts shall be sounded on the steam whistle or syren.

45.—In the case of a piratical attack at night, rockets, blue lights and Verey's lights shall be fired.

46.—The owners, agents, charterers and licensees shall notify the Captain Superintendent of Police confidentially beforehand on any occasion when it is expected that treasure will be carried on a ship and on any occasion when there may be any reason to fear that a piratical attack may be attempted.

47.—The metal or metal grille doors to the engine and boiler rooms shall be kept locked at all times while the ship is in a danger zone and during such time the only access to the said parts of the ship shall be from the bridge deck.

48.—Ships proceeding to or up any part of the Canton River or estuary, the West River, or the tributaries or mouths of such rivers, shall at night-time accompany each other as much as possible between Hongkong and Wang Mun or Bocca Tigris and remain within easy signalling distance of one another. The hours of departure from Hongkong of any ships so proceeding shall be subject to the approval of the Captain Superintendent of Police.

The final Sections are more or less obvious, and deal with the duties of shipowners and others in regard to prevention of piracy on their vessels—forwarding each and every item of information that might have any bearing on a possible piracy, etc.

GAMBLING MANIA IN GREAT BRITAIN

A Bookmaker's Paradise: The Proposed Betting Tax and Select Committee's Report

The article by Canon Green that we reprinted from the "Challenge" last week was mainly critical of features which the writer's own convictions and knowledge led him to disapprove. The following article gives some account of the gambling mania as the writer sees it about him, with a summary of the Committee's conclusions.

From Our Labour Correspondent.

Manchester, Jan. 14.

The social reformers of the last generation firmly believed that drink and gambling were twin evils that almost invariably went together. The second was supposed to be an almost inevitable outcome of the first. The Report of the Select Committee that has been inquiring into betting does much to prove that this is a wrong assumption. It is common knowledge that the mass of the British people are getting steadily more sober. Drunken men or women are rarely seen in our streets today. But if Bacchus is in eclipse the bookmaker is more popular than ever. Every class of the community is backing its fancy in some way or other. The wildest lottery schemes are extensively patronised. Sweepstakes were never more popular. There is a bookmaker's tout in nearly every street. Coupon betting on football results has reached enormous proportions and continues to increase despite the law against it. And this gambling fever is not confined to men and youths. Women are now among the bookmaker's best customers, and children in elementary schools save their coppers to have a flutter on the favourite.

WHENCE THIS MADNESS?

There are many conflicting theories on the cause of this mania. Some people ascribe it to the steady increase of occupations that make no demands on the intelligence and create a thirst for artificial excitements. Church and chapel workers say it is an inevitable outcome of the people's growing indifference to religion. Labour politicians sometimes contend that the popularity of lotteries and sweepstakes with big prizes arises from the worker's despairing conviction that winning one of these prizes is the only way now left to escape life-long economic servitude. And other people contend that millions of men acquired a taste for gambling in the Army and spread the bad habit when they returned to civil life.

The Select Committee that has been inquiring into betting was set up by the last Government to find out whether some of its profits could not be diverted into the hungry coffers of the State. While it was sitting an energetic campaign was commenced against the promoters of lotteries and sweepstakes. Most of them have now been stamped out. The life of the Committee was brought to a sudden conclusion by the fall of the Government that brought it up. Its Report has just been published.

OBSTRUCTION OF POLICE.

It states that street betting is a public nuisance and more widespread than is generally imagined. A tax on betting is reported to be practicable, but in view of the disturbed political situation it questions whether it is immediately advisable. It alleges that, "The continual breaking of the law by millions of people by betting in the streets, and the surreptitious passing of the slips, and the constant endeavour to avoid the police must have a demoralising effect on the character and establish a general weakening of respect for the law."

It also states that the police evidence proves that of all crimes this is the only one in which the general public puts obstacles in the way of the police carrying out their duties. This obstruction, in the opinion of the Committee, partly arises from the fact that the general public does not look upon betting as morally wrong or criminal, and partly because it resents a law which makes betting by a poor man illegal while facilities exist to enable the rich to bet to any extent they please. The Report alleges that "the street bookmakers have perfected a system which gives them practical immunity from the law," and says that "under the existing law the suppression of street betting is impossible." In support of the last contention it alleges that many of the police sympathize with betting and make bets themselves when off duty. This is undoubtedly true. When the promoters of some of the recent sweepstakes were prosecuted they defended themselves by pointing out that some of the most popular sweepstakes and lotteries in the North were run by the police for the benefit of police charities.

proceedings, and then with few exceptions discharge them. They also provide each taken of slips

The Report throws some interesting sidelights on the wiles of the bookmakers and their agents. It alleges that the bookmakers pay all the fines and costs of their agents when there are police court with from two to four outlookers to warn him of the approach of the police or detectives, and these outlookers are expected occasionally to visit the police courts during the trial of betting cases and familiarize themselves with the features of police officers and detectives dealing with such cases.

People who live in thickly populated industrial districts are well aware of another method of coping with police interference. A hundred yards from where I am writing they are now paying out the day's winnings. The back entry to the premises—a small private house—is thronged with a noisy crowd of lucky backers coming and going, most of them women. And everyone in the neighourhood knows that the policeman on this beat gives this back thoroughfare a wide berth on such occasions. It is, of course, assumed that it pays him to do so.

The Report also refers to the large number of small shops, tobacconists, hairdressers, and newsagents, who take slips for bookmakers. It states that in many instances the retailing element of these establishments is only a cloak to conceal the more profitable trade. It is curious to note that the places most free of the evil are the public houses. The licensee's dread of losing his licence makes him particularly alert to stop any gambling on his premises. The Report states that bookmaker's touts canvass women for custom between 11 a.m. and noon while the husband is at work.

THREE POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS.

The Committee says that there are three practicable policies possible for coping with the problem. Firstly, prohibition. It says that if betting is to be regarded as definitely harmful the logical remedy is to increase the penalty to imprisonment without the option of a fine and put credit betting in the same category as ready money betting. None of the witnesses before the Committee ventured to say that this course was practicable, and it was thought that public opinion would not sanction imprisonment for a first offence. Even the Church speaks with two voices on the fine point of whether betting is a sin. Some well known prelates say that they see no harm in occasionally hazarding a shilling or two on a race, or in raising Church funds by lotteries and draws. Others look on it as a sin paving the way to a dismal procession of major crimes and felonies.

The Committee's second alternative was leaving things alone. This they unanimously condemned. The growth of betting must be stopped. They favoured a scheme of taxation as the best way of dealing with it. In those countries where State control is in operation they say that there is no sign of a general decline in the moral standard of the people. Nor, in their opinion, could the State be accused of putting its imprimatur on a national vice if such a course were adopted in Great Britain.

A MUG'S GAME.

If a Conservative Government had been returned to power at the last election there is every reason to suppose that the betting tax suggested by the Committee would have been put into operation. But there is little likelihood of Ramsay MacDonald favouring this course. He would be more in favour of punitive legislative measures to stamp betting out, but such a course would be unpopular with the majority of his followers. The Liberals have no preference either way, and could be depended upon to take any course least likely to lose them support. Until the Conservatives return to power it is likely that the present unsatisfactory conditions will remain unchanged. It is regrettable that the press has not given more publicity to the Committe's succinct summing-up of the national habit of backing horses. In their opinion, "it is a mug's game."

YANG KWEI FEI'S SONG

(On the occasion of the Emperor T'ang Ming Huang's failure to keep his rendezvous.)

Heaven and earth are so bright tonight,
In her vault doth the fair moon hang—
An isle of the sea, and a wheel of ice
(Like a rabbit of jade
That doth wade, doth wade,
Or a large white bird in a field of rice,
'Mid the songs that the star-larks sang)—

O moon of my wanderings, moon so bright,
Whose Lady went down to the Wall*
(By a castle wall that is clear and cold,
By a bridge of stone,
Alone, alone,
Where the mandarin ducks and the carp all gold
Play on, and the wild geese call)—

So white and so cold, O moon tonight—
Thou far-away castle clear!
Let thy ice-wheel turn like an isle of the sea,
'Tis my soul doth fly
From thy chamber high
To the flowers of earth, O resplendent sphere!
Where I sing of my love to thee.

* Dyang Ngoo, the Lady of the Moon, who once descended to earth in her search for love.

to them at present) mere food for powder. Their position is that not only have they maritime duties to perform, but have in addition (at the behest of people totally unacquainted with those duties) to bear the brunt of and all responsibility for a failure to carry out the Piracy Regulations.

We have no knowledge of any other civilian calling in which the employee is called upon to offer his life in order to defend the property of others and we are constrained by reason to think that, if it were so, an adequate recompense would be given for the sacrifice.

(6.) That the absence of any form of inquiry into any of the cases of piracy which have occurred since that of the Sui An in November 1922, has given rise to an intense feeling of insecurity greatly aggravated by the attempt to put the "Draft Regulations" submitted to His Excellency the Governor, in immediately the present state of unpreparedness, by a body of gentlemen who, at no time ever had or ever will have, similar duties to perform.

(7.) That as the offer of a reward for useful evidence in the practice in connexion with the detection of other forms of crime, it could be profitably adopted in cases of piracy.

(8.) That it has been noticed by many of our members that the search of passengers is regularly very superficial, it is considered that a hope of reward would strengthen the incentive of the searchers to discover arms and ammunition.

(9.) That the necessity of pressing for a detailed reply is demonstrated by the fact that our letter of September 12, 1923, addressed to the Honourable the Colonial Secretary on the same subject, has never been acknowledged.

That the necessity of pressing for an early reply is demonstrated by the fact that, although the Regulations have been on the Statute Book since 1914, piracy is increasing and the lives of our members constantly at stake, but no satisfactory action has been taken whereby a remedy might reasonably be expected.

At any time and on any notice, however short, we shall be pleased to wait on you and endeavour to explain any points which may appear to be obscure.

We have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servants,

To which the following reply was received:—

"Colonial Secretary's Office,
Hongkong,
February 11, 1924.

Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of [illegible] 4, 1924, I am directed to inform you that the [illegible] September 12, 1923, the contents of which have been carefully considered, [illegible] have been forwarded to your [illegible] February 4, but as it appears that a detailed reply can be furnished in time for your proposed meeting on Sunday, February 17,"

"I am, Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
Sgd. A. G. M. Fletcher,
Colonial Secretary."

and acknowledged as follows:—

Hongkong, 12, 1924.

The Honourable the Colonial Secretary,
Hongkong.

Sir, We have to acknowledge your letter of the 11th instant and thank you for the information contained therein.

"It is gratifying to note that the suggestions put forward on the 4th instant by the Guilds are receiving the careful consideration of the Government and may, that a detailed reply may not be ready for our proposed meeting called for Sunday next.

We have the honour to be Sir,
Your obedient servants,"

following which, feeling that the matter brooked of no delay, an interview was sought with, and granted by, the Hon. Col. Sec. at which the Capt. Supt. of Police was present.

INTERVIEW WITH COLONIAL SECRETARY.

As the reply from the Hon. Col. Sec. was absolutely without any detailed reference to any foreshadowed action by the Government, it was felt by your Secretaries that it was far too unsatisfactory to present to a meeting. We, therefore, thought that a good purpose would be served by an interview, and accordingly asked for one for the purpose of eliciting some more definite reply.

By consent of the Col. Sec. we waited on him at 10.30 a.m. on the 13th instant.

The Col. Sec. prefaced his remarks by explaining that the resolutions called for such a marked change in the tentative arrangements which had previously been entered into that it became necessary to place them before all the interested parties for consideration. He pointed out that this was a matter of time and could not be completed in time for a reply to be prepared by the given date.

He explained that, owing to a heavy congestion of work and the changes of portfolios due to the Governor's absence, he had not the matter at his fingers ends as it was being dealt with by his assistant, by whom the resolutions were being prepared and minuted for the consideration of H. E. on his return from Manila.

The question of the removal of the Indian guards was discussed and the Col. Sec. asked for our reasons such a course. It was pointed out that these men, although on the articles, were not under the control of the master as he had no control of their wages and could not inflict any punishment for dereliction of duty as laid down in the M.S.A. On the point of their uselessness it was explained that there was no evidence that any one of them had ever fired a shot with the intention of killing except on the occasion of the murder of Mr. Shufforth and the letter of the C.S.P. dated 16.5.23, dealing with the C.C.O.G's. questions on this subject was submitted to the Col. Sec. who admitted that the point was very clearly demonstrated.

At this point (11.10 a.m.) the Captain Supt. of Police arrived and after introduction informed us that he had just had an interview with the Commodore and that the preliminary arrangements (subject to the approval of the Governor) had been made for the establishment of a system of convoys and escorts, details not yet being available.

After a lengthy discussion of the many points involved it was suggested by the Col. Sec. that we should take an early opportunity to interview the C.S.P. and discuss details so that a concrete minute might be prepared for submission to His Ex. This suggestion was agreed to by the C.S.P. and the interview terminated at 11.40 a.m.

The same afternoon a letter was sent to the C.S.P. asking him to grant us an interview on Thursday. No acknowledgment was received.

CONVOY ON RIVERS.

Saturday, 16th, 10.15 a.m. Received a telephone message from C.S.P. requesting certain information, but as it was rather too long to submit to memory he was asked to put it in writing and let us have it in time for the meeting. This letter was duly received the same afternoon and will now be submitted to you.

Police Headquarters,
Hongkong,
Feb. 16, 1924.

Gentlemen,—With reference to the representations made to the Governor by the China Coast Officers' Guild and the Coast Engineers' Guild [illegible] the provision of convoys for steamers in the inside waters, I have been requested to inform you that His Excellency the Governor has given his consent to the establishment of a convoy or escort system on the Canton River, and as far as Kong Moon on the West River to begin with. The Commissioner has promised every assistance provided he can get the concurrence of the Admiral. The Colonial Government is supplementing the number of vessels which the Navy can place on this service by [illegible] to be manned and armed by the Naval Authorities for [illegible]

It is hoped that the convoy system may be [illegible] within a very short time.

I have the honour to be Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
Sgd. E. D. Wolfe,
Captain Supt. of Police.

The adjourned meeting was held on Sunday February 17, at which the members of both Guilds were present when the interview with the Hon. Col. Sec. and the reply of the Government through the Capt. Supt. of Police was discussed and, on the next day, the following letter was addressed to the Hon. Col. Sec.:—

Feb. 18, 1924.

The Honourable the Colonial Secretary,
Hongkong.
Sir Piracy.

Sir,—We [illegible] Gentlemen, [illegible] a letter was sent [illegible] the Police Superintendent of [illegible] of armed escorts [illegible]

"This letter was read at a Combined Meeting of the China Coast Officers' Guild and the Masters' and Officers' Guild held at West Point on Sunday February 17, when the following resolutions were passed:

1. "That this Meeting has great confidence in the arrangement and establishment of convoys and escorts being placed in the hands of the Naval Authorities."

2. "That with the exception of a system of convoys and escorts the Indian Guards as required by the Piracy Regulations are superfluous and should be immediately removed from the vessels subject to the approval of the Naval Authorities."

Apart from the general approval of the meeting many officers who were on duty and could not attend have since expressed their satisfaction regarding the resolutions passed."

Respectfully awaiting the detailed reply as promised in your letter No. 1 on 2265/1922."

We have the honour to be Sir,
Your obedient servants."

THE APPOINTMENT OF CAPT. BLOXHAM.

No reply, detailed or otherwise, has yet been received, but it has since transpired that a Capt. Bloxham, ex Indian Regiment, has been appointed Officer Commanding Guards and it has, further, been made apparent that this military officer is very actively concerning himself in the structure of ships in relation to their suitability to resist piratical attack.

To deal first with the appointment of an Officer of the Indian Army to command guards who will never, in his presence, be actively engaged in the duty assigned to them. He is evidently appointed because of his experience of these men as Indian troops and his ability to speak their dialect, the only one with which the guards are conversant. He will of necessity be stationed ashore in Hongkong as a centre of command while the duty of the guards is afloat and under the so-called command of ships' officers who, if they have acquired and Asiatic language, will have selected the more useful Chinese. It is thus evident that a more unsuitable appointment would be difficult to make. We as Seamen feel entirely at a loss to express an opinion as to the suitability of an Army officer to direct or criticise ship construction in general or in any detail pertaining to ships however small.

We have now received the following cable from our Hongkong offices:—

"New Piracy Regulations published, very little alteration from Draft. Regulations. Combined meeting held Sunday, members discontented. Correspondence between both Guilds and Government to be published. Strong action not to be taken until peaceful procedure is exhausted."

OFFICERS' HOPELESS POSITION.

A Reuters cable dated H. K. 19.3.24 amplifies the above in the following words:—

"The crux of the difference arises from the fact that the Regulations insist that "the officers shall resist to the uttermost" while no provision is made for the dependants of those killed."

The state of affairs, as it appears to us, then, is that the members of the Mercantile Marine engaged in the "Danger Zone" have their lives under a cross fire of Regulations on the one side and a foreign hope on the other.

This position is forced on them by a body of gentlemen who never met, and probably never will meet, a pirate on equal terms on his (the pirate's) busy day.

Although requested to make suggestions and although these requests have been complied with, every suggestion made by the experts (with their lives at stake) has been contemptuously set aside in a truly bureaucratic manner, which has only urbent sufficiently far as to seek the advice of the British and Chinese Chambers of Commerce in order to bolster up the inept actions of unprofessional heads of departments.

The value of this advice is aptly demonstrated by the fact that one section of the Chinese Chambers of Commerce expressed one opinion, a second section of it enunciated a diametrically opposite one, so it split the difference, then, being unable to agree to that, referred it to a sub-committee which is still silent in the matter.

The British Chamber of Commerce at Hongkong, true to its ancient lineage, has been constantly dumb.

What, then, is left for the mercantile marine to do? The Government cannot or will not do anything except copy old laws and call them new ones.

Remembering that they are the means of keeping the Colony fed the officers are loth to forcibly emphasize their utterly impossible position by strangling the river trade.

By doing so they alienate the sympathy of the public (who are first, last and all the time their ultimate masters) by starving them, and not only them, but their own dependents also, in addition to which they lose their own source of income and are thus doubly penalized for no fault of their own.

If they do not act thus drastically is there any other way the position can be treated?

As has been constantly pointed out in the Press, the travelling public together with shipowners and merchants are equally interested in this problem, why then has no definite action been taken by them?

Is the Mercantile marine (the war being finished) to quietly step into the background and shoulder all the responsibility by offering their lives in "resisting to the utmost" as a premium of insurance on the property, comfort and well being of others who persist in remaining supine?

If only these bodies would come out into the open with some suggestions of their own, progress might be made.

Even if their ideas are absolutely opposed to those of the professional sailor-man surely they have sufficient courage in their own convictions to argue them openly and unreservedly, always supposing that they really wish to put an end to, or at least mitigate, the evil. This last may possibly be termed innuendo; it is not so intended; but, if it serves to shock home, to those whose interests are identical with ours and whose responsibility to the travelling public is no less, that something on their part is wanting, it will have done some good.

It is then to all these parties that we submit this review of the matter, after eighteen months fruitless negotiations with the Hongkong Government.

The requests contained in the Guilds' letter of February 4, 1924, addressed to the Hon. Col. Secretary, were formulated after the most prolonged and careful consideration by practical and experienced seamen, who conscientiously believe that the adoption of the suggested measures is the only means whereby adequate protection for all the interested parties can be secured.

TEXT OF THE NEW REGULATIONS

Coincident with the publication in the "North-China Daily News" of full particulars of the activities and viewpoints of the Mercantile Marine officers on the China Coast on the piracy question, was the receipt in Shanghai of the "Hongkong Government Gazette" of March 7, containing the full text of the new Piracy Regulations which are to come into effect immediately.

The order, wording and tenour of the Regulations reveal an almost strict conformity with the Draft Regulations that already have caused so much discussion and dissention. There is one notable omission, however, in Section 1, which now reads "It is the duty of the master and other certificated officers to resist to the uttermost any piratical attack." An important and far-reaching clause that has been omitted from this Section is "This obligation is imperative and no discretion may be exercised as to whether to resist pirates or not." In this respect the officers of the ships appear to have gained an important point, though, we understand, they still have strong objections to the term "resist to the uttermost."

The salient portions of the new Regulations are given below:—

No. 109.

Regulations made by the Governor in Council under section 17 of the Piracy Prevention Ordinance, 1913, Ordinance No. 23 of 1914, on the 6th day of March 1924.

The Regulations relating to ships exceeding 60 tons, made under the above Ordinance and published on pages 458 to 465 of the Regulations of Hongkong, 1914, amended as appearing in Government Notification No. 347 of 1922, are hereby rescinded and the following regulations are substituted therefor:—

Ships (exceeding 60 tons).

MASTERS AND OTHER OFFICERS.

1.—It is the duty of the master and other certificated officers to resist to the uttermost any piratical attack.

2.—The appointment or employment of any person as master or other certificated officer of any British ship, or of any foreign ship holding a passenger certificate under section 10 of the Merchant Shipping Ordinance, 1899, or of any foreign ship holding a special licence under section 38 of the Merchant Shipping Ordinance, 1899, which is about to proceed or is proceeding on any voyage from Hongkong to Macao, or to any port or place on the Canton River or the West River, shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council who shall, in his absolute discretion have power to refuse to allow the appointment or employment of any particular person.

3.—Each certificated officer, whether on or off duty, shall carry on his person one revolver and 25 rounds of ammunition at all times while the ship is in a danger zone, and he shall be familiar with the use of his weapon.

4.—The master shall have complete control of the ship and all on board, and shall not be dictated to or interfered with or suffer himself to be dictated to or interfered with in any way by the owners, agents, charterers, licensees, compradore, pilot or crew in any matter connected in any manner with the repelling of any piratical attack on or on board the ship or with the rendering of assistance to any other ship so attacked or which he may consider to be in need of such assistance.

5.—The master shall enter or cause to be entered in the official log-book a statement or, if there is no official log book, cause a record to be kept, of every occasion of any such interference or attempt at interference however slight, and he shall report the same to the Harbour Master at the first opportunity.

6.—When the master of any ship has any cause whatever to believe or to consider that any other ship may be in need of assistance in respect of a piratical attack it shall be his duty to approach such ship as closely as possible, to stand by it, to prevent the access of pirates to or from native craft, to assist in rescue work, to call other ships to the aid of the ship attacked, and to do all such other acts as may be necessary or advisable to assist the said ship in repelling the attack.

7.—No certificated officer shall take any part in or be present at the collection of tickets or fares from the passengers.

CONSTRUCTION.

Here come the Sections providing for structural measures to be taken for the defence of ships coming under the provisions of the Regulations. They appear generally to be accepted as reasonable.

SCHEME OF DEFENCE.

21.—When a ship is first fitted in accordance with these regulations, and at the annual survey, a scheme of defence of the ship as fitted will be drawn up by a committee consisting of the Assistant Harbour Master, and a Superintendent of Police, the master and, if the owner so desires, a representative appointed by the owner. The scheme of defence settled by the committee shall be set out in writing and carefully kept by the master who shall supply the Captain Superintendent of Police with a copy. Every master shall be well acquainted with the scheme of defence of his ship and he shall see that the officers and other persons on board to whom duties are assigned under the scheme are made acquainted with their duties.

EQUIPMENT.

Sections 22 to 28 are concerned with details of defensive equip-

MINISTERING CHILDREN

By Elizabeth Peyps.

It is a child's two-fold heritage—happiness and helpfulness. Neither should be denied him. The child who has never known the joy of helping another, especially of making other children happy, has been deprived of a rightful privilege. The Ministering Children's League fills both needs for it not only cares for sick and needy children but it enlists the generous-hearted sympathy and assistance of the children themselves for others less fortunate.

A Bazaar arranged by grown-ups for the benefit of children would be a gracious and beautiful charity but it could never possess half the significance of a Bazaar for which the children of Shanghai are working, giving up some of their play hours and their childish savings in order to make some French orphan, some little Russian refugee, some youthful cripple happier.

It is a familiar complaint that the children of the Far East are spoiled and from too much waiting upon have become lazy and selfish. There is too much truth in the criticism to dismiss it outright but a visit to the working parties where youngsters from four or five years to young girls of 16 and 18 are giving up their leisure in order to sew for their stalls is very reassuring. We have previously mentioned the sewing circle for St. Joseph's School, held in Mrs. Tibbey's apartment in the Glen Line Building, under the auspices of Mrs. Tibbey, assisted by Mrs Bolton and Mme. Darre', where the pupils and graduates are making innumerable pretty things for the chances of the Tombola booth.

PUBLIC SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

At the Public School for Girls on Yu Yuen Road under the supervision of Mrs. Edgar, assisted by Miss Manning, Miss Morris, Mrs. Daniels, Mrs. Hummel and Mrs. Bowman, girls from the school were busily sewing away in the sunny dining room. An industrious hive this was, with the older girls making rompers and seaside frocks for kiddies, or knitting scarves and jumpers, the younger ones making scrap books and all manner of fetching garments for dolls' outfits. The neatness of the stitches and the efficient way in which the young seamstresses went ahead with their work was a tribute to the training they are receiving, while their regularity in attendance shows their interest in the object of their work.

CATHEDRAL GIRLS' SCHOOL.

The next party of workers was found at the Cathedral School for Girls, where a number of little boys were also working with vim and vigour, taking a minute off now and then to give each other a friendly punch between stitches but accomplishing wonders in the way of knitted reins, feeders embroidered in outline stitch, or hemmed dusters. The ladies primarily responsible for this stall are Mrs. Neild, Mrs. Piercy and Mrs. Bichard assisted by Mrs. F. A. Sampson, Mrs. Bondfield, Mrs. Momber, Mrs. Crombie, Mrs. Roberts and Miss Harris. The ages range here from 6 to 16 and the range of articles was wide for the older girls were making all manner of ambitious fancy articles.

One of the side attractions of the Cathedral Stall is the Lucky Dip, in charge of Miss Harris, who is assembling a choice assortment of prizes to delight all who try their luck. The Stamp Collectors' Stall is another division in charge of Mrs. Piercy, assisted by Mr. Trenchard Davis, a stall which is bound to appeal to philatelists, old and young.

The "Dollar Competition" may be mentioned in this connexion, in which those entering are asked to make an article of any description the material of which is not to cost more than $1 and prizes will be given for those adjudged the best—$10 for the best sent in by an adult, and $6 and $4 as first and second prizes respectively for the best articles sent in by any schoolgirl. It is to be understood that all articles sent in for the competition are to be given to the Ministering Children's League, and to sold to the best advantage on the day of the bazaar, for the funds. Judging will be done by votes. All articles should be sent to Mrs. Piercy, 46 Route Ave. de Boissezon, not later than March 11, or to Mrs. Bichard, Cathedral Girl's School, not later than March 10. A paper must be attached to each article showing the cost of material used.

HOME SCHOOL AND NURSEY SCHOOL.

The Home School and Nursery Stall was in active session in a cheery sunshiny, firelit room at Mrs. O. M. Green's and here we found the youngest members whose devotion to the cause was quite out of proportion to their years. The seriousness with which these tiny tots plied their needles showed that the Bazaar could not fail of success. Lady Pearce, Mrs. Mackie, Mrs. Green and Mrs. Fryer are responsible for this stall and Lady Pearce has offered a special prize for the best article made by any of the juvenile members of this group under the supervision of older advisers.

SHALL WE GIVE THESE TO THE BAZAAR?

Gifts which will appeal especially to children are the specialities of this circle and any indulgent doll-mother will find the choicest of articles to fit out her dolls' houses and dress her darlings. Then there are powder-face cloths, fancy bags, dolls' dresses with knickers and cap complete, cushions, soft balls, face cloths, fancy bags dolls' piano stools, fascinating mud animals all the way from Wusih and dozens of other things.

There is a tremendous amount still to tell about this Bazaar and its numerous attractions, but that will have to be another story. Only don't forget the date, March 15, in the Carlton, kindly given by the management for this occasion, and at 2.30 Lady Stubbs will open the Bazaar.

LAW SCHOOL FOR CHINESE WOMEN

What One Women is Doing to Emancipate Chinese Girls

By Elizabeth Pepys.

As was recently announced in the news columns of the North-China Daily News, a Law School for Chinese Girls has been opened in Shanghai by Mrs. George S. Hsu, the wife of the former Minister of Justice and sister of the Shanghai City Magistrate. This school is located in the residence of Mrs. Hsu, J1293 Avenue Edward VII, in the first turn which the Avenue makes to the left, as one proceeds from the Bund, the doorway in the right hand side of the road marked by two black wooden tablets, with Chinese characters in white.

The school must not be thought of as turning out full fledged lawyers, as the course given now consists of only one year and is rather in the nature of a general, practical preparation either for the technical law schools, one in Peking and one in Nanking, which admit women students, or for the administration of business affairs such as fall to many Chinese women. Mrs. Hsu is a firm believer in Votes for Women and feels that this course will enable them to exercise the franchise more intelligently.

AIM OF THE SCHOOL.

Girls are admitted after they have finished the Middle School, that is, after the age of 16, and study law principally, together with other studies useful to them in home and business life. Graduates are expected to take posts as teachers, in business or continue their studies. Twenty students are enrolled at present, eight of them boarders, and more are expected, accommodation being available for 50. They come from all over China, even from Canton and Anfui. The correspondence school conducted in connexion with the work has enrolled 100 pupils. The cost of the course, $24 a term, has purposely been kept nominal in order not to exclude any girls who have a genuine desire to learn.

Mrs. Hsu is not a "returned student," having been educated entirely in China, so she can realize how difficult it is for the average girl to get the higher education she craves. Her own home life was singularly fortunate, for as she says: "My parents loved me equally with their sons. They did not despise girls but granted me my wishes as if I had been a boy. My four brothers were studying at home with their teachers. I had no sister and was lonely so I was allowed to study with them.

"When I was married my husband spoke and wrote English. I wanted to be able to speak English also, so I have studied with different English ladies at various times, but have never been able to study long at a time, because sometimes my teachers were ill or moved away." One should explain here that Mrs. Hsu reads English and understands spoken English very well, and indeed speaks remarkably well considering the few lessons she has had. At times her thoughts run faster than her tongue, and with a little impatient gesture she will say: "I know, but I cannot say it."

WOMAN'S RIGHT TO EDUCATION.

Mrs. Hsu's children have all had every educational advantage Her oldest boy is in Columbia University, New York. Her oldest daughter has been at St. Mary's Hall although she is now in the South for her health. Two younger children are at school now and with only the baby left at home, Mrs. Hsu says she is lonely, and has turned her energies to this school work. "There is so much to be done even in this one small school," she says, "and all the time I am thinking how much more remains to be done throughout China. I am sure that women want education and they can help their country so much better if they understand law and government. I am so grateful to my parents for giving me the chance to study that I want to help other girls."

LEADER IN POPULAR EDUCATION

Approaching Marriage of Y.W.C.A. Secretary

The engagement of Miss T. K. Phen for several years a secretary of the Chinese Young Women's Christian Association of Shanghai, to Dr. N. S. Koo, Professor of Structural Engineering at Tangshan University, has lately been announced. Miss Phen is a graduate of St. Mary's Hall, and comes of a long line of Christian workers. Her mother was in the first class opened by St. Mary's School, and her father has been secretary to Bishop Graves for many years. Miss Phen taught a year after graduation, and then became social and membership secretary of the Y. W. C. A. During the past year she has been especially interested in popular education, and has given most of her time to organizing classes of girls and women who have had no opportunity to study.

"It is interesting to see," Miss Phen says "how the chance to study is eagerly grasped at by women who never dreamed of such a thing in their youth. Many of them cannot even write their own names—or read the letters announcing the death of some relative in the country. One woman was very anxious to learn to read because her son and daughter were both being well educated, and she thought they would respect her more if she could read and write. Many girls are allowed to come to study for an hour and a half a day who cannot be spared from the shop or home for all day schooling, and whose parents cannot afford to pay even a small fee. I feel that the Popular Education Movement will be a powerful instrument in attacking illiteracy among women, and will help greatly to make them conscious of their own place in the community."

After her marriage, in the summer, Miss Phen will live in Tangshan, Chihli where Dr. Koo is doing a very interesting piece of work in the government University in training students in structural engineering. Dr. Koo was graduated from Nanyang College in 1918, and received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Cornell University in 1921.

EXPLODED THEORIES

I.—You can't have too much of a good thing

By Elizabeth Pepys.

Little Arabella Flouncibel had beautiful golden hair. When sufficiently coerced with curling tongs or kid rollers it had a very natural curl. The only disappointing thing about it was its scantiness. Arabella's dear Mama would shake her head over it and say to the amah: "More better you puttee medicine topside baby. Wanchee plenty hair."

Amah, being a conscientious person with a third cousin in the pharmacy where the hair tonic was sold, sprinkled her small charge's head assidously and in due time had her reward or her punishment in seeing the ringlets increase so that the kid curlers had to be doubled in number and a larger comb was purchased. As Arabella grew up her hair was Dutch-clipped, which seemed to stimulate its growth prodigiously. The hair-dressers bills would have been enormous had not the faithful amah added hair-cutting to her list of accomplishments.

In time Arabella desired to let her tresses grow out and they rapidly extended to her waist, and were so thick that the professional shampooers doubled their fee for laundering her locks. For a time she was able to meet her expenses by cutting out thick strands underneath from her superabundant stock and selling them. Soon, alas, it became stylish to have no hair. Everybody bobbed. Switches and transformations were as demode as a bustle. That source of revenue was closed.

Negotiations with mattress factories brought little encouragement. Kapok and Ostermoor seemed to suit the public as well as curled hair. As hats became smaller heads followed the shrinking trend. Soon it became necessary in order to procure the sleek boyish effect to have a hair cut and clip almost every other day. Now every time Arabella sees a bottle of hair tonic she pines to smash it and in time, unless the styles changes we may expect to see her rivaling Carrie Nation.

HOME HUMOURS

A Choice of Evils.

Doctor: Now, remember, Mrs. Brown, if you give your husband anything to drink but water, it may kill him.

Mrs. Brown: Oh, but if I try to give him water he'll certainly kill me!

Shifting the Responsibility.

Clerk: May I have this afternoon off, sir? My wife wants me to—

Head of Firm: Sorry, can't be done! We're far too busy.

Clerk: Thank you very much indeed, sir!

Progress.

As a patroness of struggling and discouraged artists and musicians, Mrs. Gilling was not markedly successful, although she had plenty of money and a warm heart, and was interested in art and artists.

"I've brought some of my last year's sketches to show you," said one poor young man whom she had asked to call upon her, "but I do not feel satisfied with them. They are not as good in some ways as the work I did a year ago."

Nonsense!" said Mrs. Gilling, with loud cheerfulness, patting him on the shoulder. "You paint just as well as you did last year—as well as you ever have. Your taste's improving, that's all."

If every person be capable of one book, every novelist is poet enough to make one volume of verse, and pretty generally it comes along. We had not suspected Miss Ethel M. Dell, with her soaring circulation in fiction, as a poet, but she is, though hitherto she has published no verse. Now she is giving us, through Hutchinson, "A Book of Verse," composed during the past few years. It will, we are told, reveal "the intimate perception of human emotions and powers of happy expression" which are the secret of Miss Dell's vogue as a novelist.

To an energetic young Londoner, occupied in a City firm in Change-alley, something like a fortune comes unexpectedly, and he determines to put it to the brightest advantage. There you have the idea of a novel which that capital writer, Mr. Pett Ridge, has supplied with Methuen. Ever since he left London Town, he finds adventures enough for this young Croesus in and about the Strand. But the last and, perhaps, the jolliest incident takes place on a certain Friday afternoon at the Caledonian Market, N.

A volume of essays which did well in the autumn was Mr. J. B. Priestley's "I, For One." It had something of the qualities which should distinguish the essay or the after-dinner speech, enough mirth to engage the heart and enough seriousness to exercise the mind. Now comes Mr. Priestley is giving us another book, and it is promised us by John Lane as "Essays on Modern Literature." Mostly the contents are criticisms and appreciations of recent or living authors. The list includes Messrs. G. Hewlett, Dr. Saintsbury, Mr. W. W. Jacobs, Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. Robert Lynd, and Mr. A. E. Housman.

It is a sign of peace come to the book world, if not necessarily plenty, that the historical memoirist is once more busy. Mr. Lewis Melville is more than busy, for he has not only given us a book about Nell Gwyn, our promises us one on Beau Brummell. "Pretty, witty" Nell's career from orange girl to king's favourite makes a varied tale. The career of Brummell is a study in the eccentricities of fashion as they were worn by a man who was no fool. It was not only with dandyism that Brummell illuminated his time, cut with wit and wisdom, as this Hutchinson book will reveal.

The verbatim reporting of debate has become so [illegible] that those who do not attend public assemblies may come near to forgetting its endurance. This perhaps helps to account for the success of freshness in the reading of "Yea and Nay" (Brentano's, 6s.), which is the record of a series of lectures and [illegible] lectures" given a year ago at the London School of Economics. There the protagonists were carefully chosen, and the subjects of a certain elevation, so that a note of distinction in the tone was secured. Among the questions propounded were the teaching of history on a national or international basis, the possibility of alternatives to the "sex novel," and the ethics of biography, while delicatessen from the Oxford and Cambridge Unions handled the thesis, "That Education is the Curse of the Country." Among the disputants were Mr. Wells, Mr. Chesterton, Mr. St. John Ervine, Mr. E. B. Osborn, Miss Sheila Kaye Smith, Miss Rebecca West and Mr. Oswald Mosley, M.P. It is a commonplace that what tells upon the platform may be very dull upon paper, but this volume seems to be composed almost entirely of exceptions to the rule. It suggests that what is prepared for a really intelligent audience may quite easily be read as well as heard with pleasure. The present experiment, at any rate, seems to invite cautious imitation.

A TOO-BRILLIANT NOVEL

"The Fir and the Palm." By Elizabeth Bibesco. (Hutchinson. 7s. 6d.)

Princess Bibesco's novel is in many ways an advance upon her shorter work, but it suffers from the desire of the brilliant beginner to compress all her bons mots into one story. To do this, every character that comes upon the stage has to sparkle, from the scene-shifter to the leading lady. It can be said with truth that there is not a dull page in the book; and with equal truth that a dullish page or two would come as a relief.

As for the theme, apart from the style, it is not altogether easy to believe in the suppressed vehemence of the husband's passion for his wife or in her unconsciousness of it. So sensitive an intelligence would surely soon have detected that usually unmistakeable atmosphere. However, it makes a fresh situation, and the irony of the wife's own love for a man who does not care a snap of the fingers for her, but yet serves to point a contrast, is neatly conceived.

The occasional sayings are often remarkably apt and shrewd. "Is not a Don Juan further removed from a real lover than a celibate priest?" "Caricatures are purged by laughter. It is only when they catch a serious part of you and spoil something that they are dangerous." These are only two specimens, but they give an idea of the enormous cleverness (the author must forgive the inevitable word) that makes all this young writer's books remarkable, and of the insight which makes them rather more than merely clever.

MORE FITZGERALD LETTERS

Some New Letters of Edward Fitzgerald. Edited by F. R. Barton. With a Foreword by Viscount Grey of Fallodon. 8s. 6d. (Williams & Norgate.)

"Those who know the letters of Edward FitzGerald," writes Viscount Grey, "will find nothing unexpected in this latest batch, but they will find here the same traits and qualities that have endeared his letters and their writer to so many." Nearly all the letters are to Bernard Barton, Lamb's Quaker friend, and they are linked together with a commentary by the editor, who is a descendant of Bernard Barton's. No man can write good letters unless he is writing to an intimate with whom he can be frank, careless, frivolous on occasion, always perfectly himself without fear of being misunderstood, and to Barton FitzGerald had such a friend. Nor can he write them unless he has a sense of humour, and FitzGerald's genial, broad, sometimes rather devastating humour plays through these pages and makes even his communications about personal and everyday affairs delightfully entertaining. He may label Wordsworth "Daddy," but there is sound criticism behind his frivolity; he had the keenest admiration of Tennyson, but was quickly alive to his weaknesses; and his feeling for Carlyle stopped so far short of idolatry that he could laugh at him and like him none the less. The many references to contemporary celebrities of all sorts add to the interest of these pages, but without these the letters are for their own sakes a delightful possession.

FORE-GLEAMS OF CHRISTIANITY

"The Babylonian Epic of Creation." By S. Langdon. (Clarendon Press. 16s.)

By Professor A. H. Sayce.

Half a century has passed since George Smith caused some flutterings in the theological world of the day by his discovery of an Assyrian account of the Creation, which resembled in several respects that of Genesis. In fact, the resemblance at the time seemed greater than we now know is really the case, for the Assyrian story was recorded on seven tablets, which appeared to correspond with the seven days of the Biblical record. The seventh tablet, however, now turns out to have been originally a hymn in honour of the god Merodach, which was added at a later date only to the original story. The story itself is in the form of an Epic, and begins with a short review of the current theories of cosmology.

The tablets, edited by George Smith, came from the library of Nineveh, and contained portions only of the Epic. Since then other fragments of the Epic have been recovered, and since the war nearly the whole of it has come to light, thanks to tablets found by German excavators on the site of Assur, the primitive capital of Assyria. It was time, therefore, that a new and complete translation and edition of the Epic should be made, and this has now been done by the most competent of our Assyriological scholars, Professor Langdon. His work cannot be too highly praised; the subject of it has been brought up to date with exhaustive thoroughness.

But what may be termed the introduction to it will attract the attention of the public even more than the Epic, and is likely to occasion a good deal of discussion in theological circles. The Epic, as Professor Langdon shows, was of Babylonian origin, and certainly not earlier than the Abrahamic age, and it found special acceptance in the later Assyria. In Babylon, and consequently at Assur also, it was recited on one of the 11 days consecrated to the celebration of the Feast of the New Year at the time of the vernal equinox.

The elaborate ritual performed on four of these days has now been recovered: on the fifth day the King was required to enter the temple of Bel-Merodach, where the high-priest removed the insignia of royalty and smote him on the cheek in token that for the moment he was no longer king but a slave of the god.

Side by side with the ceremonies of an external ritual went a sort of miracle-play or sacramental mystery, the interpretation of which, and apparently also participation in it, was confined to the initiated. Classical writers refer to "the tomb of Bel" at Babylon, and the explanation of this tomb is now afforded us. Bel, we are told, was bound and wounded to death: he was then consigned to "the grave" and passed into the underworld: a malefactor (more literally, "a sinner") was executed along with him; and the blood of the slain god was washed away from his body, which his garments were carried to Beltis of Erech. The women made lamentation for him and tumult fell upon the city. Then the door of the tomb was forced and Bel rose again from the dead.

It is needless to point out the curious analogies between all this and the Christian Gospels. Professor Langdon discreetly refuses to discuss the theological side of the question, and confines himself to its Assyriological aspect. Bel, as he says, has merely taken the place of the older, Tammuz, who, it was believed, had been similarly slain and afterwards raised from the dead. The same belief was held by the worshippers of Osiris in Egypt where it went back to the dawn of history. Christianity claimed to fulfil all that was truest and best in the religious aspirations of mankind, and if that claim were justified the belief in the divine man who was slain as a sin-offering and who rose again to life was necessarily realized in the person of its founder. In the old religions of the civilized East we ought to find what have been called the "Fore-gleams of Christianity," and the decipherers of the cuneiform texts is now finding them.

TRIMMINGS!

The Hat of Destiny. By Mrs. T. P. O'Connor. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

Sparkling as champagne, and sustained without a hint of flatness or insipidity to the very end. The American women, Nelly and Laurel, are admirably drawn. Their feminine hearts are torn with jealousy and suspicion, and the culminating moment of the book is reached when Laurel sweeps into her rival's concert-room, wearing an exact replica of Nelly's devastating hat! Says Laurel lightly, "Look at me! I've dressed the part of Nelly's twin sister. We are the Sisters Love, and will do a dance together, if we are asked, a little later, won't we, Nell." "Please get up and go to the other end of the room," replies Nelly in fury. "If you don't, I'll tear both our hats to bits, and throw the pieces to the orchestra!" This is the light bubbling book, so constantly begged for, and lacking at our libraries. The hat is worth remembering. People held on to its long velvet streamers "as if it had been an iced mint julep."

GENTLEMEN OF THE PRESS

"Heirs Apparent." By Sir Philip Gibbs. (Hutchinsons, 7/6).

A novel which finishes on the note of June, 1923, and deals entirely with post-war scenes, is bound to hold the interest of the young people of to-day. It is to the younger generation, we believe, that Sir Philip Gibbs addresses himself principally in "Heirs Apparent"; his hero is a supercilious Balliol youth who has some of his superiority knocked out of him and some sense knocked into him by contact with the Fleet Street world, and the operation was badly needed, for Julian Perryman was a most obnoxious prig before he learned the art of doing a worthy day's work and earning a more or less journalistically honest penny. His father was editor of "The Week," a popular paper with a two-million circulation; a man of ideals who had sold himself, for a handsome salary, to the owner of that recognizable and not too reputable sheet. Into the story comes, slightly disguised, an account of certain events in the law-courts which are still fresh in our memory, and very cleverly is the trial of the proprietor of "The Week," and the downfall of the huge edifice of half-sincere, half-spurious patriotism and popularity which he had built, portrayed.

Better than this, however, is the general picture of the group of young Oxford men and the lively interpretation of their attitude to life—their mask of gaiety, of boredom, of irresponsibility, concealing after all a very genuine good-heartedness and comradeship. We feel that there are portraits in this general picture, and that they are drawn with friendly touches. The girls are not quite so successfully "placed"; as in previous books, the author is more at home with his men. When the scene, in the progress of development, changes to the street of ink and the first experiences of Julian as a raw hand on the newsgathering staff of his father's paper, Sir Philip stands on the surest ground of all, even though he paints in gloomy shades the career of the journalist which, taking an average, is not so black after all. Most experienced newspaper-men have more philosophy, more stoicism and less lamentation, than had Burton, the news-editor of "The Week." Still, the picture stands; it is impressive and real; and we have to thank the author for a keen and exceedingly clever novel which will add to his reputation.

THE SILKEN THREAD

Silk by Sacheverell Merwin. Illustrated by N. C. Wyeth. Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston. Chinese American Publishing Co., Shanghai.

This is a charming story [illegible]cribed as "A legend as narrated in the journals and correspondence of Jan Po" it deals with the adventures of a young Chinese, who was sent by the Governor of Northwest China to the ancient kingdom of Balkh (which geographies give as a desert portion of Afghanistan, but would be rather identified in this story with Persia) to bring back horses to improve the breed in China. This, of course, was 2,000 years ago, and the modern controversy over half-breeds yet undreamt of. Balkh, meanwhile, was particularly anxious to discover the secret of the manufacture of silk jealously guarded by the Chinese and in which they did an enormous trade through Central Asia even with Rome itself. And Rome also was anxious to learn how to make silk and was threatening Balkh with divers penalties if it did not find out, which in turn meant exciting adventures for Jan Po, and for the heir apparent of the throne of China, who unexpectedly turns up in Balkh, and for the young Queen of that country, who naturally falls in love with him. The thread of the story is slender, but it is very prettily told and the chief characters Jan Po and his lady love Mosulla are very much alive; as also is the terrible redbearded Wa Zir, who very nearly makes an end of them all, but is himself "done in" in a most gruesome and vivid scene. The story is enlivened with delightful little extracts from Confucius and reflexions in his style, as thus from Jan Po's diary: "A degree of serenity I must attain, for we know that it is the inferior sort of man who becomes agitated at any time." Of which meritorious philosophy the bewitching Mosulla naturally makes mince meat.

A BOLD ATTEMPT

"A Guide to World-History." By Andrew Reid Cowan. (Longmans. 15s.)

There are guides whose professional deficiencies are compensated in part by the charm of their society, and one may take the liberty of placing Mr. Cowan in this class. He has essayed here a bigger synthesis than he can tackle. He has little grasp of the economic side of history. His industry, which has assimilated so much, seems to have overlooked certain departments of his subject, such as the recent Minoan discoveries and their bearings. He is under the sway of some quite untenable assumptions, such as the incompatibility of despotism with artistic triumph. (Before his next edition he might devote contemplation to the bust of Nephretiti the paintings of Velasquez and the plays of Molière.) But his sincere and ingenuous spirit is good to encounter, and faith in the worthiness of his enterprise gives his book a force and character not to be overlooked. His colloquialism sometimes takes the breath away ("Florence was inimitable in almost every line"), but he is one of those authors whose foot-notes are full of relish.

Mr. Cowan's early pages are his best. He gives very clear expression to the reading of history which makes the escape from nomadism the turning point of civilization, and accounts for the rise of Egypt and Mesopotamia, in preference to more fertile regions, by the conditions giving them relative security against nomad attack. He might have made the body of his book more effective by emancipating himself from the task of summary and confining himself to that of exposition. For, however often one might disagree with his commentary, his enthusiasm and intellectual honesty are qualities of the most attractive type, and his phrasing often adds something even to a familiar concept. —The "Observer."

THE RUSSO-CHINESE NEGOTIATIONS

Two Conflicting Stories: Recognition by China Not So Imminent as Once Appeared: Soviet's Dislike to Sacrificing the Old Tsarist Treaties

HOSTILE ATTITUDE OF CHINESE CABINET

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 12.

Sino-Russian relations have reached an interesting but perplexing stage in their development. The Chinese papers, with the exception of those alleged to be subsidized by the Russian Mission, are frankly bewildered. This one says that we are on the eve of recognition and that only minor differences remain to be talked out. That one says that both Mr. Karakhan and Mr. C. T. Wang maintain precisely the same position that they did months ago, that apparent concessions on both sides are nothing but verbal evasions and that both parties are deliberately procrastinating to make sure of what is happening in the Occident. Another says that pourparlers have now reached the point where it is either recognition of the Soviet Government or quits.

Closer inquiry only seems to demonstrate that all of these opinions are more or less correct. Mr. Karakhan some days ago made a clear statement of the situation to a foreign caller. He said that Mr. C. T. Wang was trying to give his informal conversations with him, the Soviet envoy, the force and weight of treaties and that he had no intention that they should be so interpreted officially. He said that he still demanded full recognition as a preliminary to negotiations and that he resented the Chinese assumption that they were conferring a special favour upon Russia by recognizing her and could bargain for something in return. He believed that, while China persisted in this attitude, Chinese recognition was still a long way off and gave it as his personal opinion that an understanding with Japan would be reached first.

The official reports of the results of Mr. C. T. Wang's conference with the Cabinet yesterday would also appear to prove that the Russian question had gone into the same limbo as the Gold Franc question and that no matter what the general official opinion might be, the business of shifting responsibility would consume so much time that China would know the result of Anglo-Russian negotiations, which begin on the 25th of this month, long before the alleged Government of China had arrived at a decision.

KARAKHAN STILL HAVERING.

It seems that Mr. Wang told the Cabinet members yesterday how obdurate Mr. Karakhan had been during recent interviews. He said that in his talks with the Soviet envoy on Monday he had said that, without definite understandings upon the Chinese Eastern Railway question, the Mongolian question and the question of the complete abrogation of old treaties, they might as well forget all discussion of recognition, stop their conferences and agree to call all the time hitherto spent upon such gossip waste time. On Tuesday Mr. Karakhan seemed more reasonable but still refused to come down to "brass tacks." He agreed that all old treaties should be replaced by new ones (new lamps for old ones) but said nothing about wiping out old treaties as one sponges a slate.

Yesterday the Cabinet thought this a vague and unsatisfactory basis for recognition. The Cabinet members also wanted definite wording about the redemption of the Chinese Eastern Railway. On the whole they concluded that they could not very well discuss the issue at all without taking the President's office into the conference. In other words Mr. Sun Pao-chi will take no responsibility that he can pass along. He wants the President's advisers to have a voice in the matter so that he can say that he was overruled by the chief executive if the eventual decision proves unwise. Neither the President nor any of his advisers can be expected to have a single opinion upon the subject, so it is expected that after a solemn conclave to-morrow the whole question will be handed back to the Cabinet for further study and that Mr. Sun Pao-chi will then pass it along to Mr. C. T. Wang for further deliberation.

THE OLD TREATIES.

Within the inner circles it is today believed by some that Karakhan will negotiate and agree to China's terms and that recognition is therefore imminent and by others that there will be no capitulation on either side until there are further developments in Europe and that China will follow her traditional policy of watchful waiting. Probably the issue upon which negotiations will be longest suspended is that of the abrogation of old treaties. China wants Imperial Russia's treaties repudiated by new Russia prior to recognition and Karakhan promises new treaties for old ones after recognition. This is what is described in Chinese circles as one of the trifling outstanding questions, the settlement of which will lead to immediate recognition. This trifling point, however, involves the fundamental interests of both parties, and it is stupid for either to think that the other does not know it. Neutral Russian observers believe that Karakhan was right some days ago when he said that Japanese recognition might easily antedate Chinese recognition.

Terms of Draft Agreement

Peking, March 14.

The Chinese press has published the preliminary draft Sino-Russian agreement, which has not been brought up-to-date as it has been the subject of subsequent negotiations between Dr. C. T. Wang and M. Karakhan and was this morning discussed by the Cabinet, after which it will be referred to the President. There is reason to believe, however, that the following main points are still substantially correct:

After the agreement is signed a formal Sino-Russian conference will be opened within a month and all outstanding problems will be settled in six months' time.

The treaties concluded between Russia and China during the Tsarist régime will be declared null and void and new treaties drawn up in the spirit of the Russian declarations of 1919 and 1920.

Russia recognizes the absolute Chinese sovereignty over Outer Mongolia and will remove the Russian forces from there.

The two nations recognize the fact that propaganda against each other should not be indulged in.

The questions of boundaries and navigation will be discussed later.

CHINESE EASTERN RAILWAY.

As regards the Chinese Eastern Railway, the following considerations will be observed:

(1) Russia and China agree that the Railway is to be undertaken by them absolutely as a commercial enterprise and that, excepting railway business, all affairs involving the sovereignty of China or local government should be controlled by the Chinese authorities;

(2) Russia agrees that China may redeem the Railway with Chinese capital;

(3) All estimates regarding price, conditions and procedure will be fixed by a formal conference;

(4) Russia will be responsible for the payment due from Russian shareholders to the Railway during the periods prior to the Russian revolution. Russia relinquishes the right to own concessions in China.

Russia also remits the Russian portion of the Boxer Indemnity, providing the funds are used exclusively for educational purposes.

EXTRATERRITORIALITY GOES.

Russia also agrees to the abolition of Russian Consular jurisdiction in China.

The preliminary agreement will be enforced immediately it is signed by responsible authorities of the contracting parties.

Later.

Yesterday evening's expected round-table conference at the Presidency did not come off owing to Dr. C. T. Wang's detention at a prolonged interview with M. Karakhan, at which differences of opinion regarding phraseology and also the withdrawal of Russian troops from Mongolia and the treatment of White Russians in Chinese territory were composed.

The Cabinet held an extraordinary meeting at the Premier's residence this morning.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mar. 17.

THIS year's celebration of St. Patrick's Day has a special significance in so far as it may be said that Ireland has now for the first time emerged from the grievous difficulties which beset her for so many years. The recent trouble amongst the disbanded officers, though regrettable at a time when the country had otherwise settled down, is obviously of no political interest, being merely a collective outburst of men angered at the sudden termination of their careers, and may even be regarded as convincing proof of the fact that peace has been restored to a point where drastic demobilization is considered possible and safe. As a matter of fact, though without official information, we understand that the Free State Army, originally composed of 40,000 men, has been reduced to 20,000, and that a further reduction to 12,000 is in contemplation. It is more than likely that it was in the course of this reduction that the discontent arose among the officers who were being demobilized.

These figures can only mean that the state of affairs in Ireland has changed radically and rapidly for the better, that the Free State anticipates no aggression from the northern counties, and that the Free State does not intend, as was once gloomily forecast by her political enemies, to carry on a savage war of extermination against the North. In this connexion it was pleasing to read in the telegrams a little time ago that the representatives of the North and the South on the Boundary Commission had on leaving an important joint meeting, looked very pleased with themselves and one another. A further piece of evidence indicating the condition of peace now prevailing is to be found in the flotation of the recent Free State loan. It amounted to £10,000,000, was floated entirely within the country, and days before the official day of closing had been oversubscribed to the extent of £4,000,000. Irishmen are a hardheaded race, and we may take it for granted that so much money would not have been forthcoming had the position of the country not indicated good security for their investment.

Locally we have a further indication of the readiness to-day amongst Irishmen of all classes and creeds to come together. This is seen in the local society dedicated to St. Patrick, of which this year's President hails from the extreme south of the country and the Vice-President from the extreme north, and together we may be certain that they will create that spirit of hospitality for which Ireland is so justly famed. Surely here is tangible proof of an end to the old hostility. We learn that on this occasion there will be no speech from the chair, and in so much one might almost regret that the Society have decided on a ball and not upon a dinner where such an event would have been in order. Even in the case of a ball it might, however, be permissible for the President to recall the virtues of the holy man who according to all good Irishmen made Ireland the leading educational and religious country in Europe and then devoted himself to bringing the culture of his English and Scottish neighbours to a like pitch of perfection, a task in which, as can be seen to-day, he seems to have achieved a certain amount of success.

HOMEWARD BOUND

Mar. 18.

THE departure to-day of the great P. & O. liner Naldera, her every cabin filled with residents of the Far East, marks the culminating point of the annual exodus Homewards. Many have gone already, many more doubtless are yet to go. But while the choice of routes and the luxuries that shipping lines offer are far more extensive than when the P. & O. Company instituted the practice of a through ship to and from England in spring and autumn, the indefinable prestige and dignity which surrounds these vessels gives to this annual departure a special significance and revives for the moment the feeling of romance in going Home, which the ease and frequency wherewith the voyage is now accomplished have almost stifled. There is something in the appearance of a P. & O., in the very rake of her funnels, which warms the Briton's heart, a sense of magnificent disdain about her for everything that sails the seas, which strikes a sympathetic chord within him. More than any other craft afloat she seems to express the supremacy of his country's mercantile marine; and that she is ready to pay for her pride is shown by the fact that of all her sisterhood not less than 127,000 tons were lost by submarine attack during the war.

It is, perhaps, only the normal experience of every year—just as every rainy season seems rainier and every drought more dry than any we remember—that this spring an unusually large number of friends would appear to be leaving for Home. For weeks past we have all been assisting them to "eat their way out", have assured them in more or less harmonious chorus and with the usual three cheers and "a tiger" that "they are jolly good fellows" and have stretched an already cracking overdraft just a little bit further to make them parting presents. Yet two days after their steamer's smoke has vanished on the horizon, it is as if they had never been. Their place knows them no more and the affairs, to which so recently their presence seemed indispensable, manage to get along comfortably enough without them. Such a phenomenon is certainly not peculiar to Shanghai although the rate at which we live in this busy town makes it more noticeable. But that it implies no real forgetfulness is shown by the warmth with which we greet our friends on their return. There is no pleasanter experience in life than to "come back" to Shanghai, which amply compensates for the regret we may have felt on leaving England. Mere acquaintances, of whom very likely we may have thought, in the past, that they were even less than indifferent to our personal charms, welcome us with the greatest warmth and instant libations. At Home, we cannot but reflect, it is different. No doubt the friends of our childhood are glad to see us, but national custom bids them conceal their emotions. In China it is quite clear they take no interest whatever and would almost appear to think that the fact of our living there is better hushed up.

For all this, the lure of going Home does not lose its power and it will be an unlucky day for the British Empire when it ceases to do so. Indeed the increasing facilities of communication are not without their danger to the more delicate forms of patriotism. It is the invariable trait in all human nature that a thing is desirable in proportion to its unattainability and the easier it becomes to test, by frequent visitation, our recollections of Hampshire water meadows, where we angled for the crafty trout, or of the unutterable splendour of sunset over the flat lands of Cambridgeshire, the less it is to be feared we may desire them. The strongest tie which unites the men of Australia, of Canada, of South Africa within the circle of the British Empire is their common dream of Britain herself as Home, even while many of them have never seen her, will never do so, and would be loud in criticism of her ways and especially her climate, if they were transplanted to live on her shores. The Siberian railway, by which before the war many people were in the habit of going Home every year did the Empire no real service and the lines of airships, which we are told will soon circle the globe in fewer hours than it took our ancestors weeks to come to China, will do it still less. For man lives not at all by facts but by his thoughts about them. It is assuredly well to go Home from time to time; it is not so well to go too frequently. We cease to be one thing or the other and lose the keenness of our interest alike in England and the Far East. There are few of us who will see the tender depart to-day without a pang. But we are left at least with the consolation of many pursuits and dreams unalloyed, until perhaps we may at last realize the greatest dream of all, of a competence and leisured retirement at Home.

THE GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mar. 19.

THE review of the past year and comments thereon contained in Sir Edward Pearce's speech yesterday at the annual meeting of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce are interesting and deplorable. It is not using too strong a term to say that it is tragic to look back on the Linchong outrage, the unrivalled opportunity that it offered to achieve some solid betterment of affairs in China, the earnest and weighty representations made to the Diplomatic Body in Peking, the honeyed words that that Body returned, and to realize that nothing whatever of those high hopes has been achieved. Not only does the list of murders and lootings that Sir Edward gave convict the Chinese Government of utter falsity to its pledges, but even the promised compensation has not yet been paid to the bandits' victims nor is there any sign thereof.

One suggestive passage was that in which the speaker advocated the employment by the Chinese Government of trained foreigners with administrative powers. This is, in point of fact, a very old idea: but it has so long been lost sight of, that its reappearance makes it sound quite new. On the analogy of Japan, or to come nearer home, of the Customs and other services which Sir Edward mentioned, there is no doubt that such a system, if fairly worked, would be the regeneration of China. But a story told about the Soochow Creek illustrates the hopelessness of the suggestion. The Whangpoo Conservancy are ready to dredge the creek at least within the Shanghai district for nothing. But the residents in the districts it serves are willing to subscribe to have it dredged and the Conservancy's offer is rejected accordingly. As Sir Edward said yesterday: "All of us who have lived in China can draw our own inferences." When schemes of improvement and reorganization are urged upon Chinese officials by well-meaning foreign friends, the latter forget that the vast majority of said officials do not want improvement. They are making immense fortunes out of the present chaos and they will furiously oppose any system which would necessitate their accounts being audited. Thus it is that the fetish of democracy has proved disastrous to every Oriental country in which it has been introduced, Turkey, Persia, China, and as it threatens to prove in India and Egypt. It puts into the hands of an oligarchy powers which they are swift to abuse, for their own enrichment and the despoiling of the land.

The ancient history of the great trademark crisis recalled yesterday afternoon has an important lesson for all of us. Details of the draft trademark law sent to the Waichiaopu through the British Legation in 1920 would take up too much space here. But they involved a small voluntary sacrifice of extraterritorial rights, to which the British Chamber of Commerce and China Association, on most shortsighted advice from outside their own body, consented. There can be no moral doubt that this voluntary sacrifice encouraged the Waichiaopu to the far greater attack on extraterritoriality which makes the new trademark law a matter of so much anguished interest. The moral is, No concessions of any kind until China is ready to perform her part of the bargain. We hear that because her Government is bankrupt through the iniquities of her officials, we must give it more money in the shape of a surtax, to squander on palaces and politics; because that Government notoriously mismanages its people's affairs, we must appoint a commission to advise how it may be permitted to mismanage foreigners'; because it violates almost every treaty it has signed, we must accept laws which would enable it to violate still more. We know that we speak for the vast majority of business men and for many, many Chinese, in saying that while chaos is the rule, outrages unchecked, officials and bandits free to plunder as they please, the only course to follow is the most rigid exaction of every treaty right and no concession. The men who drew up the treaties were wiser than we. They framed them for precisely the kind of circumstances which have now arisen, and it is no more than reason to insist that they be fulfilled. This is not a gunboat policy. It is a demand for simple justice which Chinese officials may contemn but in which all thinking Chinese will acquiesce. When China can govern herself, it will be time enough to try her fitness to legislate for others.

BRITISH WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION

Mar. 19.

THE annual meeting of the British Women's Association takes place this afternoon in the Lyceum Theatre and it is particularly to be hoped that there will be a large attendance of members, inasmuch as there are some more than usually interesting questions to be discussed. There is also the election of the Executive Committee, a matter of great importance to all. Several new names have been proposed we understand and this is a healthy sign. The experience of older societies has shown that a regular rotation of officers, an annual retirement of a certain proportion of the previous year's committee and appointment of new members, is the best system for the whole organization. In connexion with the B.W.A. election we are asked to say that it is not permissible for members to send their votes by letter to the secretary, as some have done. They must be present in person, election being only by ballot.

At the end of the third year of its existence the B.W.A. has every reason for pride in its development and usefulness. The past year has been for it a particularly busy one. Its Hospital Aid Department is specially to be complimented on the work that its members do in visiting the wards and supplying bandages; the Needlecraft Section also does a great deal of most useful work; while the Social Service Board is one of the leading charitable organs of the town. It is also not to be forgotten that when the great earthquake occurred in Japan last September, and the prospect opened of numbers of refugees arriving in Shanghai, the B.W.A. organization enabled it to produce immediately a list of members who were only too ready to take in refugees and care for them. The work that the Association did in the ensuing months in shipping clothes and supplies to Japan and providing for earthquake sufferers when passing through Shanghai, cannot be too highly praised. The Association also gave a number of receptions for ladies of distinction, all which were largely attended; and it held one of the most successful bazaars recorded in the Settlement, which yielded a profit of some thirty-two thousand dollars.

The Residence Fund, to which this money was devoted, now stands at quite a respectable figure, although it is of course still far from the full

It is understood that all the known difficulties have been solved and that the Premier, Mr. Sun Pao-chi, the Foreign Minister, Dr. Wellington Koo, and Dr. C. T. Wang will proceed to the President to obtain his approval.

Chinese circles are of opinion that the recognition of Russia will be announced almost at any hour.

TIMELY REMINDER FROM FRANCE.

The French Minister yesterday sent a Note to the Waichiaopu warning China not to forget that other Powers possessed interests in the Chinese Eastern Railway, if she is making a settlement on the matter with the Russians.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Mar. 15.

The Cabinet has not yet reached a decision on Sino-Russian relations. Official circles are today less optimistic regarding the immediate conclusion of an agreement.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

EVACUATION OF MONGOLIA A VITAL POINT.

Mar. 16.

Reuter's correspondent learns from an authoritative source that the Cabinet are not divided on the Russian question. That the recent meetings of the Ministers failed to reach any definite conclusion is not a statement of fact. The Government have approached the question with an open mind, not seeking to use China's special position to bargain with Russia, but not being willing to accord recognition unconditionally without reaching a satisfactory arrangement regarding principles for the settlement of certain outstanding questions.

The points to which the Chinese attach the greatest imortance appear to be, firstly, the cancellation of all their treaties with Russia; secondly, the cancellation of treaties between Russia and Mongolia, and, thirdly, the withdrawal of Russian troops from Mongolia. Up to the present M. Karakhan has failed to give convincing assurances regarding these matters, and it is not forgotten that Russia has a Minister at Urga and Mongolia, and Resident at Moscow.

The Soviet envoy has agreed to recognize China's sovereignty over Mongolia, but has failed to give evidence of Russia's intention to evacuate Mongolia. Until he satisfies the Chinese Government regarding these considerations, which the Government regard as being of vital importance to the Chinese people, resumption of normal relations between China and Russia will probably remain an open question.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Bleak Prospect of Immediate Recognition: The Cabinet's Hostile Attitude

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 16.

The recognition of Russia by China seems now to have been definitely blocked by the Cabinet. Meeting after meeting has been held since the initialling of the understanding between Mr. C. T. Wang and M. Karakhan and the prospect of immediate recognition grows bleaker with every meeting.

The latest development is the departure of Mr. Wang from Peking. He said that he feels the hostile attitude of certain Cabinet Ministers strongly. When the first signs of opposition manifested themselves, he absented himself from special meetings, and his departure now may be construed as a sign of the hopelessness of an immediate solution of the situation. Personal politics seem to be playing a big part in the attitude of the Cabinet.

M. KARAKHAN'S ULTIMATUMN.

Mar. 17.

No developments have been reported to-day regarding the Sino-Russian situation. Dr. C. T. Wang went to Tongshan yesterday and returned to Peking to-day.

The last communication from M. Karakhan contained the arbitrary announcement that China must reply within three days. It is not anticipated that this will be done.

The American and the Japanese Legations emphatically deny the reports that the American and the Japanese Ministers had made representatitions to the Waichiaopu in connexion with the proposed Sino-Russian settlement.

The Cabinet met this morning to consider the Note from M. Karakhan. Official circles assert that the situation has not been altered by to-day's discussion and that the Government are merely waiting for more convincing assurances from the Soviet envoy regarding the undertakings he is prepared to give in principle.

SUMMARY OF THE SITUATION.

According to an unofficial statement the situation may be summed up thus:—

The Chinese Government desire that the cancellation of all Russian treaties with China and with Mongolia and the withdrawal of Russian troops from Mongolia shall take effect from the date on which the settlement is signed, whereas the Soviet Government expect the recognition to take effect on that date but that the other questions shall be subject to official negotiations subsequently in accordance with the principles agreed upon in the settlement.

This statement is highly credible in view of the "convincing assurances" required by the Chinese Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Mar. 17.

Upon receipt of telegraphic instructions from the Moscow Government, requesting him to interview Premier Sun Pao-chi and to inform them as to the real intentions of the Chinese Government relative to China's ultimate attitude towards the Russo-Chinese agreement, as well as to the reason why Dr. C. T. Wang, who has already agreed to the fundamental principles for the opening of the proposed Russo-Chinese formal negotiations, is still hesitant to sign the agreement in question, M. Karakhan, Soviet Envoy in the Far East, yesterday visited the Chinese Premier and asked the latter definitely to state his attitude. Mr. Sun Pao-chi, the Premier, however, is alleged to have replied that he would give his definite reply after receiving the decision of the Cabinet meeting.—Eastern News Agency.

The Resignation of Mr. Wang Cheng-Ting

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 17.

The Russo-Chinese negotiations have been virtually suspended owing to the opposition in the Cabinet to Dr. Wang Cheng-ting's agreement with M. Karakhan.

After the Agents' agreement had been initialled by both parties, Ministers Koo Wei-chun and Wang Ko-min raised objections on Saturday to two points, and instructed Mr. Wang Cheng-ting to reopen parleys with regard to these points. After the departure of the delegate, these objectors raised a third point and summoned him to return, whereupon he resigned the post of Head Commissioner. His resignation becomes effective on Wednesday and is the cause of the local rumour that M. Karakhan has delivered an ultimatum.

The chief parties on both sides refuse to be interviewed, but their subordinates believe that there is now no hope of a settlement and blame the Cabinet feud.

The "Far Eastern Times" reported to-day that Dr. Wang Cheng-ting had fled to Shansi, but this is untrue, as yesterday he went to visit the Tongshan springs and returned to-day to attend Cabinet meetings.

Mar. 18.

Though Dr. Wang Cheng-ting's resignation from the Sino-Russian Commission is effective from Wednesday, it is reported on good authority that the Chinese Commissioner, late last night, flatly denied that he had resigned, but without making any comment. A Waichiaopu démenti to-day is published by the Chinese Press, without definite authority, asserting that there is no Cabinet opposition nor jealousy towards Wang Cheng-ting, which the Chinese Press discounts.

The General opinion is that Dr. Wang is quitting, with the negotiations indefinitely postponed.

The Soviet Mission are now inclined to admit that their letter was a formal three day ultimatum, not an informal one as previously stated, which is foolish, as the Chinese are now disposed to agree to anything except an ultimatum. Locally, therefore, it is thought that recognition is a long way off.

Some Suggestions from Gen. Chang Tso-lin

Peking, Mar. 16.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin has telegraphically suggested to the Peking Government through semi-official channels that on the completion of the Sino-Russian negotiations a post of military commissioner for frontier defence would be inaugurated, basing on Marchuli and Hailar. Marshal Chang suggests that Gen. Hsu Lan-chow, former Tuchun of Heilungkiang, be appointed to this position.

In the same message Marshal Chang announces that he has contemplated the inauguration of an office in Peking to co-operate with the Government in carrying out the details of the forthcoming Sino-Russian Agreement. It is understood that the Government has no objection to the establishment of this office.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Threat Regarding Treaty Rights

Peking, Mar. 20.

M. Karakhan's ultimatum of March 15 that China must give a definite reply in three days regarding the settlement, the preliminary draft of which he and the Chinese negotiator initialled on March 14, having elapsed, M. Karakhan yesterday sent a note to the Chinese Government stating that, in accordance with instructions from Moscow, the negotiations must be considered concluded and warning China that she has committed an irretrievable mistake which will affect future relations; that Russia reserved the right to establish conditions for future treaties with China; and finally that China will not be able to resume negotiations until she has unconditionally established formal relations with the Soviets.

In view of the former threats from M. Karakhan, who has constantly endeavoured to intimidate China, the Chinese Government do not consider the negotiations ended and the Cabinet this morning is further considering the matter.

Peking, Mar. 20.

Dr. Wellington Koo and M. Karakhan discussed the Sino-Russian situation at length last night and a special meeting of the Cabinet considered the whole position this morning, after which Mr. Sun Pao-chi and Dr. Koo waited on the President.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE TARIFF REVISION

Sir John Jordan's Firm Letter on Iniquity of Using Surtax to Pay Off Petty Debts

London, Mar. 20.

Sir, John Jordan, in a letter to the "Times" on the subject of the Chinese request to the Powers for a preliminary tariff conference, opposes the suggested waiving of the conditions underlying the Washington Conference and granting the Peking Government the 2½ per cent. increase in the tariff, saying that Chinese consumers and British manufacturers are alike interested in seeing that taxation of foreign goods is not utilized merely as an expedient for settling accounts between the debtor country and its importunate oreditors and patching up an arrangement, which could at best be only a temporary palliative.

He advocates insistence on the terms of the Treaties and of the Washington Agreement as the only solution which will prove satisfactory in the long run to Chinese and foreigners alike.

The letter adds that no one would grudge China increased Customs revenue if she would only make proper use of it and do something towards reforming her fiscal system, which has gravely impeded trade for more than half a century and become an intolerable burden.—Reuter.

ADMINISTRATIVE AREA IN KIAOCHOU

Kiao-Tsi Railway's Fight to Control Its Own Finances: Commission of Inquiry Appointed: The Appropriations for the Navy: Japanese Naval Squadron in Port

Tsingtao, Mar. 14.

Indicating the critical position of the Kiao-Tsi Railway in its fight to control its own finances without further interference by the Militarists, the Railway Administration announced to-day that the Board of Directors, of which Dr. C. T. Wang is Chairman, has appointed a commission to inquire into the railway's financial condition to ascertain whether it can support Admiral Wen's fleet and at the same time do justice to itself.

The commission will arrive within a week and begin work at once.

The members are Mr. Ken, Managing-Director of the Kirin-Changchun Railway, chairman; Mr. G. E. Baker, Adviser to the Ministry of Communications; Mr. Sun, Technical Expert of the Ministry of Communications; Mr. Griffith Assistant Manager of the Shanghai-Nanking Railway; Mr. Chow, Traffic Manager of the Tientsin-Pukow Railway.

THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL.

Although Governor Hsiung Ping-chi, of Shantung, has officially resigned his concurrent post as Director-General of Kiaochou Territory and, it is understood, his resignation has been accepted by the Central Government, there is a movement on foot, started by the Provincial Parliament at Tsinan, to restore the Governor to the directorship.

Yesterday several members of Parliament wired to Peking asking that the Government decline to accept the Governor's resignation.

The telegrams state that as Tsingtao is a part of Shantung it should be under the jurisdiction of the province. There is reason to believe, however, that so far as political lines are concerned Tsingtao shortly will cease to be a part of Shantung. Gen. Chen Kan, admitted to be Marshal Wu's mouthpiece here, told Reuter's correspondent that, according to present plans, Tsingtao and surrounding territory of the old German leasehold will be a separate administrative area under the direct control of Peking and not answerable to the Shantung Administration.

The report is that Mr. Lao Chi-chang, former Vice-Minister of Communications under Mr. Kao En-hung, will be Vice-Director-General here under his old superior officer in succession to Gen. Kun Chi-ping, who, it is reported from Tsinan, has been named Minister of Finance in the Provincial Administration. This was the post he formerly occupied.

JAPANESE NAVAL SQUADRON.

The Japanese First Squadron, comprising 26 powerful men-of-war, is anchored in Kiaochao Bay. There are three super-dreadnoughts, three battle cruisers, eight submarines, two mother ships and ten destroyers in all.

The fleet steams out of port tomorrow and will skirt the Chinese coast in a southerly direction, proceeding to Amoy.

More than 16,000 officers and men man the 26 boats, the commander being Admiral Suzuki. His flagship is the Nagato. The squadron came here from Sasebo and will return there about May 1.

THE BROKEN CABLE.

The seat of trouble with the Tsingtao-Kobe cable line has been discovered 335 miles from this city and will be repaired at once. The forced interruption of service has inconvenienced shippers, shipping lines and the general public for the past two months. Divers found a clean break, but are now working on the repairs and they should be completed within a week.

The foot and mouth disease has attacked many cattle in this neighbourhood and there is danger of a general epidemic and the contamination of milk.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

NORTHERN EXPEDITION AGAINST CANTON

Peking, Mar. 14.

Reports from military circles indicate that Gen. Ma Chi, former Chief of Staff in the Hunan expedition, has announced his arrival at Yungchow on the Hunan frontier, where he expects to meet Gen. Lu Yung-ting, but that owing to uncertainty with regard to the attitude of Gen. Shen Hung-ying there will be delay in starting the expedition against Canton.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE NORTHERN ARMY IN SZECHUAN

Peking, March 14.

Yesterday it was announced that the President had despatched one of his aides-de-camp, Gen. Mei Hsin, to Szechuan to report upon the conditions there. To-day it is learned that Marshal Wu Pei-fu has informed the Government that he has detailed Gen. Chien Ping-chin to proceed to Szechuan to investigate the conditions of the Government troops in that province and report.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MARSHAL WU'S REQUEST FOR RELIEF OF COMMAND

Peking, March 11.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu has asked the Government to relieve him of the command of the 3rd Division and to nominate a successor to that command. Marshal Wu recently objected to Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan retaining command of a division in addition to the posts of Tuchun and Inspector-General of Hunan and Hupeh. Gen. Chang Fu-lai, Tuli of Honan, was recently relieved of the command of the 24th Division at his own request. The Government has telegraphed to Gen. Chang suggesting that he should nominate an officer to command the 24th Division, and it will leave the choice of the command of the 3rd Division in the hands of Marshal Wu.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE 2½ PER CENT SURTAX

Vickers and Marconi Loans

London, Mar. 14.

The "Times," referring to the Chinese Government's present request to the Legations of Powers signatory to the Nine-Power Treaty for a preliminary conference to discuss matters relating to the 2½ per cent. increase in Customs duties, suggests that the opportunity might be taken to press home the need for a settlement of the claims of noteholders of the Vickers and Marconi loan, on which the interest is in default and the question of redemption will shortly arise.—Reuter.

According to the "Eastern Times" Gen. Wang Yung-chuan, Associate Director of Military Affairs in Fukien, who has just been ousted from that post by his chief, Gen. Sun Chuan-fang, is on his way to Shanghai.

The Civil Governors office at Hankow has received instructions from Peking to see that land outside the concession does not pass into foreigners' hands in violation of the treaties. It is pointed out that land in the interior is constantly being sold secretly to foreigners who as well as erecting quarters, plant "trees and flowers" on it.

Commenting on the negotiations between China and Russia, "New Shanghai Life" says, in the course of a long article on the subject, that the unanimous desire of the two countries to come to an agreement in the matter of the Chinese Eastern Railway is bound to meet with obstacles. By way of example, there is the reported remark of the French Minister who, in a note to the Chinese Government, has warned China not to forget that other Powers have an interest in the railway—a remark which clearly shows the desire of the Powers to retain what they have acquired during the unsettled stage of the Chinese-Russian relations.

soldier of 1922 who neither understood nor cared for politics. What plans he may be revolving nobody, it seems, even among his nearest intimates can guess. But while Marshal Chang Tso-lin's letter to us today excludes the idea of a monarchical restoration as a part of immediate prospects, it certainly does not rule out the possibility that Marshal Chang anticipates an attack from Loyang and will be ready and willing, if circumstances require it, to do his own attacking first.

The moral from the foreign point of view is that Peking as the seat of Government is, if possible, even less worthy of respect than it was, and certainly not worthy of anything in the way of concessions, like the surtax, or considerations like the Trademark Law. China is to-day in the grip of greater forces than she has known for many decades. No Chinese general hitherto has commanded armies like those of Mukden and Loyang, whose chieftains, moreover, appear imbued with the deadliest mutual hostility. From so much explosive material, a great upheaval may result at any moment, which might change the whole trend of internal politics. Nobody can tell what is likely to happen, but nobody can ignore the patent facts of the general situation. More than ever it behoves the Diplomatic Body to stand rigidly aloof, not to be beguiled by any party, to stand firmly on treaty rights, to postpone all talk of concession, above all of financial assistance, until the warlords have fought it out and the people of China at last assert themselves to say that there shall be no more fighting.

The Russian Government has been invited to send representatives to the world conference on cremation to be held in London this year. There seems to be a burning haste to recognize Russia.

Rear-Admiral Frochot, Commander-in-Chief of the French naval forces in the Far East, has written to M. Wilden, Consul-General for France, expressing his gratitude to the French colony for entertaining sailors from the cruiser Jules Ferry. Their reception was such, says the Admiral, that they might have thought they were in France.

The Hankow Chinese Chamber of Commerce has received a document from the Ministry of Commerce which instructs the merchants who make the mahjongg boards not to use bad Ningpo varnish to paint them, as people in America have lately blamed importers of the sets for an epidemic of the well-known rash caused by the varnish. An outcry against this evil would be much more sensible than the recent strictures passed upon the game by a missionary.

Quite a number of Chinese dealers in Hongkong were victimized last week by sailors on an American ship which recently left the harbour. In the belief, and assured by purchasers of their wares, that they were tendered good American paper money, they accepted in payment so called silver certificates issued by a concern known as "The Mechanics and Farmers Building and Loan Association of Richmond County, South Carolina." The certificates, which on their reverse state that they are certificates of deposit issued to the members of the association in acknowledgement of money received, bear the date of Columbia, S. C., August 1, 1873. They are in one, two and five-dollar denominations.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

A Shanghai Museum

A year ago considerable publicity was given to the hopes—one scarcely can say the plans—of a number of scientific people, prominent amongst whom was Mr. A de C. Sowerby, for a public museum, art gallery and reference library worthy of a city like Shanghai. Latterly very little has been heard of the idea, for it must be admitted that its advocates unfortunately did not get a great deal of support more tangible than good wishes, but the scheme still is very much alive. Some of those most interested, realizing possibly that they are asking for a somewhat startling sum of money in these hard times, now have evolved a suggestion which is practical, reasonable and easy in working, whilst it will not empty anyone's pockets. It is estimated that the initial cost, including the purchase of land, would be Tls. 400,000 and the running expenses would be Tls. 50,000 per annum. Assuming that the money was raised by a Municipal loan, interest and the repayments would absorb another Tls. 50,000 per annum, so that the total yearly expenses on a scheme allowing for the repayment of borrowed money would be Tls. 100,000. Now the originators of the proposal argue that such an institute properly should be a public possession, so that the financial part would be an item in the Municipal Budget and they point out that the adoption of the plan as outlined would mean an addition to the rates of only one-third of one per cent., in return for which the community would secure a valuable property. The additional burden is so trifling—only a few cents—that the argument would appear to be ended. Yet the cost can be further reduced. Most of the organizations who formerly had their home in the Town Hall now have other quarters and, when there are so many better floors, it is not even popular as a dancing hall. There is an ideal site already in the Municipality's possession, saving the item for the purchase of land, and the lecture hall which it is proposed to include in the museum could be adapted for use as a concert hall also: as a dance hall as well, if it is considered essential. The suggestion is worthy of serious consideration.

The Bessell Outrage

While Mr. Rodney Gilbert with the true instinct of a literary artist refuses to gild refined gold by commenting on the preposterous story told to the British Legation that General Chen Kuo-hsien, author of the outrage on Mr. Bessell, had been sent to prison for 10 months, we cannot resist expressing heartfelt thanks that the British Foreign Office has taken an active interest in the matter and is insisting that General Chen shall be made to stand his trial properly, with foreign witnesses present. In these days when violations of treaty are of so common occurrence and when, if report speaks truly, Dr. Wellington Koo, in his intercourse with foreign Ministers, blandly poohpoohs the Treaties as very old out-of-date things to which of course nobody attaches any importance, the telegram on Saturday reporting the Foreign Office instructions to the Legation were as a ray of sunshine. For it suggests that some one at Home has at last woken up to the condition of things in China. And if for one case, why not, perhaps, for another? Why not even for the purpose of getting something done about Lincheng? As has been said before, this paper does not advocate anything remotely connected with a gunboat policy: but it does ask that foreigners who have brought enormous wealth and prosperity to China shall be protected in the rights secured to them by treaty and that they shall be treated not less reasonably than they are in any civilized country. It is no part of true civilization, which Chinese writers and speakers claim so loudly for themselves that unoffending foreigners should be manhandled by soldiers, missionaries carried off by bandits, ships fired upon, property looted —and not a soul be brought to justice. The case of Col. Chen will be closely watched. Adequate punishment in this matter will have far-reaching and salutary results.

The Cotton Surtax

About the beginning of the year details were forthcoming of a proposal to institute an export surtax on Chinese cotton, this to be used for the purpose of improving the staple grown in China. Owing to the manner in which the proposal was made—the proceeds all to go to the National Southeastern University, leaving the University of Nanking, where the work of improvement had been started, out in the cold—the idea was looked upon without enthusiasm in various quarters, and when Nanking reported that the Diplomatic Body had practically given its consent, it was felt that there was the possibility of a grave injustice being done to one scheme which has already accomplished much good in the country. This Nanking report, however, is now found to have been more of a pious aspiration than intelligent anticipation, for it is learned that the Diplomatic Body has done nothing of the sort that has been imputed to it. The matter came before the members, and it is understood that the general feeling was that an export surtax was economically unsound, and it was turned down. At the same time the Diplomatic Body is fully alive to the importance of the work of cotton improvement in China, and it is believed that it would give sympathetic consideration to such a proposal as a grant from the Customs for the purpose. This is a suggestion which has much to commend it, and the only difficulty is that as the Customs is generally regarded as the milch cow of China by all and sundry, the I. G. may not be able to see his way to the allocation of the required revenue.

The Fire at Choutsun

We thank Mrs. Smyth for giving us the correct facts of the recent fire at Choutsun. As readers of this paper are aware, we attach special importance to our news service from the interior of China and when one of our correspondents is misinformed we are not more anxious than we are sure the original writer is, to have the mistake corrected as soon as possible. We are happy to think that such mistakes are not frequent, as we believe readers generally will testify. But we also venture to suggest that Mrs. Smyth might have been a little more charitable in her comments on our correspondent if she had read what he wrote more carefully and considered the general situation more dispassionately. Our Tsingtao correspondent did not send the news of the fire first: as it did not happen within the range of his ability to make a personal inquiry, he waited to make as sure of his facts as possible. Even then his letter clearly indicates that what he heard might be wrong.

> It appears (he wrote on March 4) that early on February 29, fire broke out in the central district of Choutsun, . . during. . . which all the principal shops and warehouses were destroyed.
> The death roll is estimated at 300 although this may be an exaggerated figure but all are agreed that during the height of the conflagration the town was looted.

The italics are ours. Most of our correspondent's letter was taken up with two current stories explaining the fire. Now further, Choutsun is roughly 150 miles from Tsingtao as the crow flies, more by rail. In German management days the journey took not less than five hours if we rememebr rightly; it is probably more now. It is not permissible for a correspondent to start off for such a journey without authorization from his head office, even if, for other reasons, it were practicable for him to do so. He must do the best he can where he is, and Mrs. Smyth probably knows that events as near as from one house to the next are liable to get distorted in the telling, even through a foreign medium. How much more when they happen 150 miles away? Finally there is no inherent improbability in a fire breaking out at the Feast of Lanterns and devouring half a town, in an antiquated province like Shantung, where fire-fighting machinery is, perhaps, nil; nor in bandits taking advantage of the fire to loot. Our correspondent was, with others, misinformed. But he was not vicious.

The Late Gen. Pelle

The death of General Pellé, the French Commander at Constantinople, brings vividly to mind the events of September and October, 1922. Turkey had just succeeded in defeating the Greeks and was already on the way to resume her position in Europe, completely ignoring the sanctity of the Straits which had been one of the leading pacts in the treaty of peace. The British commander, Sir Charles Harington, proceeded to defend them, relying upon French support, which was given up to a point by General Pellé. Then, unhappily, it was withdrawn, and General Harington had also to withdraw his troops from the exposed position on the south side of the Straits in which they found themselves. In mentioning this act we are happy to think that General Pellé had little to do with it, but that it was almost solely dictated by the politicians. While these military operations were going on M. Franklin Bouillon was busy negotiating a separate Franco-Turkish agreement, and the military part of the organization simply had to conform. In all that he did General Pellé was an admirable ally, and with Sir Charles Harington used his influence with the Turks, then inflamed with victory, to bring about a modus vivendi in regard to Constantinople. It was all through an unhappy period, but at least the military men had nothing with which to blame themselves.

Bureau of Foreign Affairs

While offering our felicitations to the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs on entering into his new premises, residents of some years' standing in the port must heave a sigh of regret upon the passing of the Bureau in Bubbling Well Road. A great many foreigners who come to Shanghai see little of China beyond the Treaty Ports, and have few opportunities of noting the grandeur of her people. In the circumstances the Bureau right in our midst was a place almost to conjure with. In the days of the Manchus there were receptions there which to the foreign mind could not fail to conjure up thoughts of the "Arabian Nights." Then mandarins in their most gorgeous robes assembled, with the richest embroidery overladen, and the most beautiful feathers lying back from their hats. It was all very wonderful to the newcomer, and it was a great disappointment when these tableaux disappeared with the coming of the Republic. It is impossible to produce Oriental magnificence in a morning coat and tile hat, but the Bureau adapted itself to the new state of affairs and many a time has one gone to meet there people who have represented China with credit in every part of the world. There could be seen the change in the nation. Previously it may have been superficially ornamental, but now it had become matter-of-fact and the politicians whom one met seemed to have got down to business and did not concern themselves with anything that was not China's business. The proximity of the Bureau enabled the resident to note these changes, which might have escaped him had the Bureau been farther distant. If, however, we regret that it has thus gone, we may hope that its new position may lead us to a better appreciation of Greater Shanghai.

Auxiliary Air Power

The Labour Government in Great Britain is doing what has been advocated ever since the end of the war—the creation of an air branch of the Territorial Army. Considering the pre-occupations of politicians since the armistice other Cabinets can hardly be blamed for their failure to put into practical effect the suggestions which from time to time have been forthcoming on the subject, and it is a great pity. For one thing a large number of the airmen who fought in the war will by now have become rusty on their old job, and in such a condition they must necessarily go warily when in the air. It may be remembered, for instance, that when Sir Ross Smith was killed on the very eve of his projected flight round the world, the theory was advanced that his judgment was probably at fault owing to the fact that he had been for some time out of practice. Although this may interfere with the Territorial Air Force attaining its highest efficiency for some time, it does not lessen the value of the policy now to be put into force. It must always be remembered that the Territorial Force proved its value to the full during the war, in all its branches.

A Daily Round Indeed

In case there are any persons still under the delusion that up-country missionaries lead a leisured existence the following extract from a letter from one of our correspondents, who is going Home on leave, may undeceive them. He says that he found the writing for us a pleasant task

> —if task it could be called, it has been a pleasant hiatus to the continual and multifarious duties of a missionary who for more than a year of his time as your correspondent has had to act as principal of a college of over 200 students, teaching several hours therein every day of the week, besides occasional Sunday work, superintending over 270 churches, paying and keeping the accounts, with several tens of preachers, presiding over the annual and some of the District Meetings of that large number of churches, conducting numerous examinations, filling the chairmanship of the district, acting as district secretary at the Foreign Executive Meetings, and in addition had to shoulder the heavy work entailed in obtaining funds for the rebuilding of 10 churches totally destroyed in the 1922 typhoon and getting a start made with their re-erection.

The subsequent apology, "if the quantity of my correspondence has not come up to your usual standard," makes one blush.

The Three-match Superstition

It is possible there will be many replies to the reader who asked for information as to the origin of the superstition that it is unlucky to light three cigarettes by the same match. Of course, a very common story is that really there is no bad luck about it at all, but that it originated with a clever sales manager in the employ of some leading makers of matches. When one thinks of the hundreds of thousands of people who, buying matches so cheaply as they do—or getting them free in clubs and hotels—say that they do not lose much by lighting another match and therefore there is no sense in risking the possible bad luck, the firm probably have sold many million extra boxes of matches because of the superstition. There is another explanation of a grim nature, but it only goes back to the time of the last Boer War and it would be interesting to know if the superstition was alive before that date. Our men on the veldt, it is said, had good reason for declaring that it was unlucky to light three cigarettes by one match. They found that on the flash of a match a Boer sniper's Mauser cracked and as a rule the bullet missed. During the lighting of the second "Tab" the bolt was going home again and before the third smoker had taken a draw, such wonderful shots were the Boers, the sniper had got the exact range and one of the three would be dropped. It is a possible explanation. Incidentally, a veteran of the sailing ship days once asked why most sailors—especially the old ones—always lit up with a twist of paper if near a fire, even when there were plenty of matches about. It was explained that it was an old precaution, because a sailor never knew when he would be cast away in conditions when one match to light a fire might mean life or death to him, so he never wasted them. For a similar reason, sailors seldom cut cordage of any sort: the piece cut off some day might make all the difference.

amount that would be needed. At the same time we understand that a statement is to be made this afternoon showing that the desired residence is possibly nearer than is generally supposed, which will be of great interest to members. Meanwhile they may congratulate themselves on having headquarters, both commodious and comfortable, a club of which they may well be proud. It is in connexion with these headquarters that a proposal is to be brought forward to-day to increase the annual subscription from three to five dollars. There is much to be said on both sides and it is certainly no place of ours to offer an opinion. On the one hand, it may be thought that even five dollars a year is a small sum to pay for the advantage of having such club quarters in the centre of the town as those in Kiukiang Road. On the other, the subscription was purposely fixed at its present figure so that practically no British woman in Shanghai should be debarred by expense from joining. And this is a very great consideration not only for the benefits that the Association may bring to individuals, but for what they may do for the Association by joining freely in the greatest possible numbers and thus increasing its prestige and usefulness.

CHINA TEA

Mar. 20.

Trade circulars inform us that the 1923-24 China tea season may be considered definitely at an end. It has been generally satisfactory, and apparently the worst point about it is that Chinese dealers who had speculated on a continued strong demand find themselves with at least 40,000 packages of poor quality black tea for which no buyers can be found. How they got themselves into this position is worth explaining. Good prices were current at the beginning of the season and profits were being made all round, and it appeared to the speculators that the demand from foreign countries was so strong that, with short crops in India and Ceylon, even indifferent qualities would readily be absorbed. In the circumstances they made purchases of tea which ordinarily would have been used solely for domestic consumption, and this they prepared for foreign shipment, thus incurring heavy expense. As it was, the tea they had thus dealt with proved quite unmarketable abroad, being probably regarded as undrinkable, and so has been thrown back upon their hands. This is by no means a new feature of the [illegible] but experience does not seem to have convinced the Chinese speculative element of the unprofitableness of it. As such has happened this year we can understand the fears expressed in the foreign branch of the trade that as a result of the present good season the growers will follow their customary inclination and increase output during the coming year. This is not a question of planting, for as a bush requires from three to five years to come into maturity, anything done now in that line would have no effect on the coming season's production. The evil will arise if the planters go in for coarse picking, which means that the plant will be stripped of every leaf that can possibly be removed as well as twigs of the smaller variety. It can only be hoped that they will abstain from such a course.

After a bad year or two following upon the close of the war, the tea trade now seems to have returned to what was previously regarded as its normal condition. In the case of black tea the export in the 1923 season amounted to roughly 29 million pounds, being made up as follows:—To United Kingdom fourteen millions: to America and Canada ten millions: to the Continent four millions: to Russia one million. The fact that Russia is once more in the market and gradually expanding her consumption of tea is a gratifying feature, and it is believed that any extension of the planted areas in China will be fully justified by the steadily increasing quantities which Russia will require in the future. While we in China regard the export trade in tea as one of considerable importance, it has to be pointed out that in comparison with the world's trade it is a very small matter. For instance in 1925 London handled by way of import no less than 457 million pounds of tea, and of this China contributed only 23½ millions. The exexports of tea (all classes included) came to 64 millions, while the Home consumption of China tea was 10½ millions. This, it is interesting to note, was 40 per cent. more than the previous year, which may be accounted for by its use in blends as a make-weight to cheapen the cost. While this increase is gratifying, it brings its dangers with it. As we have pointed out above Chinese speculators have been left with a considerable quantity of undrinkable stuff on their hands, and they must bear in mind that there is no market abroad for such a product. A continued expansion of exports can only be secured through a maintenance or betterment of quality.

Attention is again called to the unsatisfactory application of the United States Government standard test to fermented teas, and it is pointed out that the admission of a large quantity of tea of doubtful quality has caused a slump in some cases as well as reducing the price of the better grades. The test here referred to is made in New York and probably elsewhere by experts who decide whether the tea is of sufficiently good quality to pass the standard laid down, and owing to the fact that it is not a chemical test that is made, as in the case of other food stuffs, it is impossible to eliminate the human equation. Exporters of tea are therefore almost always in a dilemma in meeting orders from America for low grade tea. If it is found on examination to be below standard, the consignment will be rejected. On the other hand if the merchant here exports a grade which it is certain will be up to standard, he may find that a competitor has succeeded in getting a cheaper quality accepted by the examiners, and the business of his client in the United States must accordingly suffer. Apparently during the past season the examination has not been so rigorous as on other occasions, and the trade has suffered through the presence of quantities of tea seemingly of an indifferent quality. It is a great pity, but so long as the present system of examination obtains it is difficult to see how phases of this nature are to be altogether avoided. It might help matters if the examination were conducted on this side, but in view of the many sources from which America draws her tea supplies this might be found impracticable. It seems likely that if there was only the ordinary chemical test, the tea interests would see to it that only imports of at least passable quality were allowed on the market as cheap tea. Such a result would be brought about in their own interests.

SUTTEE IN CHINA

Mar. 21.

That was a gruesome story told in our columns a few days ago by our Kaifeng correspondent. A tale of the daughter of General Pang who was betrothed to the son of General Tang and who, when her betrothed died, insisted, against her father's wishes, on going to the home of her dead fiancé's parents with her wedding trousseau. She went through the wedding ceremony at the grave of her dead bridegroom and returning home committed suicide that she might be united in death with the man she had never met in life. Her father-in-law gave the dead bride a magnificent funeral and is to ask the Government for permission to erect a memorial arch in memory of this filial daughter which will, incidentally, reflect honour on his own family since this paragon of virtue died for love of his son. There is an, apparently less authenticated, addition to the tale which states that the father of the dead girl went mad when he heard of her death, massacred some twenty-five of his servants, concubines, etc., and then took his own life.

This is a typical Chinese story and is, unfortunately, possibly true. We can even understand the tragical insanity of the old father who was crazed when he heard that his daughter had sacrificed herself to the spirit of her betrothed and determined in his madness, that if she died to accompany her lover, he would die to be with his daughter. Chinese opinion will applaud the action of the girl and the permission to erect a memorial arch to her memory will likely be granted. These things are common enough; we have the widow's monument on the Race Course which probably was erected to commemorate an act of dedication to perpetual widowhood on the part of some young woman, early bereaved of her husband. These arches and the gorgeous funeral rites accorded to a young person who immolates herself, as did the young bride at Kaifeng, have an intoxicating effect on the unbalanced minds of immature girls and lead to the perpetuation of this perverted ideal of female virtue, as in India similar causes led to the practice of suttee long after it was prohibited by law. For a perverted ideal this undoubtedly is and its practice is a disgrace to public opinion in China. It is, in fact, nothing more nor less than an atavistic throw-back to barbarism. Sinologues tell us there is abundant evidence that in early times the Chinese, like many other uncivilized peoples, were in the habit of burying the wives and retainers of a chieftain in his grave. The historian Sze Ma-chien relates that a multitude was buried in the elaborate, concealed tomb of Tsin Shih Huangti, the builder of the Great Wall. In later days figures moulded in clay were substituted for living victims and there is a remarkable collection of these figures, taken from graves of the Han and Sung dynasties, in the museum at Toronto. In Shanghai we are familiar with the paper effigies of prominent men. These are reminiscent of the barbarous practices of earlier times now, happily, forbidden by enlightened public opinion.

Rumour has it that in many cases the young bride, a stranger in the home of her deceased husband's family, is coerced into making the sacrifice, which fulfils the double purpose of ridding the house of an unwelcome inmate and reflecting glory on her dead husband's clan. There is no suggestion that anything of this kind took place in Kaifeng, but sinister stories are often told of similar cases and the mad action of the dead girl's distracted father rather implies that he was dubious of the bona fides of his daughter's immolation. Be that as it may, it remains certain that something should be done to discourage a practice which casts a slur on womanhood and presupposes that the chief reason for a woman's being is that she should minister to the wants of her destined mate.

That monuments to virtuous women should be common in China is a cause for congratulation, but these monuments should be set up only in a worthy cause. To some woman who, like Florence Nightingale, has nursed the sick or fed the poor or contributed in some way to alleviate the misery or add to the happiness of those less fortunate than herself. A faithful wife and gentle mother—and China is rich in such women—is infinitely more worthy of honour than a crack-brained girl who dies for a chimera, a gorgeous funeral and an imposing tombstone. It would be a good thing if this case could be taken up and representations made to the Government by Chinese women students or the Y.W.C.A. Instead of permission being given to the family of the deceased girl's father-in-law to erect a monument in her memory they should be held responsible for her death and be called upon to prove that they had no share in its instigation.

CHANG TSO-LIN AND CHIHLI

Mar. 22.

The letter that we publish today from Marshal Chang Tso-lin, in answer to the report that he is coming to Peking to restore the monarchy, is of more interest than most of the similar letters which men in his position have developed the habit of addressing to foreign papers, because it is much more frank. To go back a little way, the question why Marshal Chang is building up the large and well equipped army that he has in Manchuria has evoked three possible answers: (1) that he dreams of becoming a king-maker and restoring the ex-Emperor; (2) that he means to "have another smack" at Wu Pei-fu; (3) that he fears that Wu Pei-fu means to attack him and he is therefore making ready to protect himself. The first suggestion his letter emphatically repudiates. Vulgar-minded readers may possibly "wink the other eye" at Marshal Chang's asseverance of his faith that "the power of government shall rest in the people," of which laudable ideal it must be confessed that his own provinces afford no very striking example. But the times are not so propitious for a monarchical restoration that a practical man like Marshal Chang should waste time scheming for it, even if it had his favour. In passing, there is no earthly reason why he should not favour a monarchical restoration, which could certainly be no worse than the Republic that never has been a republic and the shameless exploitation of China by a minority of profiteers posing as democracy. However, Marshal Chang says that he does not believe in a monarchy, and we certainly would not doubt his word.

Then, in his letter, comes the stereotyped protest that he has no wish to make war on anyone and that his army exists only for defence. But Marshal Chang is more honest than some: "If as a last resort," he writes, "we are compelled to pass south of Shanhaikuan and kick out the illegal Government in Peking, we shall do so, but we shall immediately return to Mukden for the satisfaction of the people." In other words the notion of self-defence does not exclude the idea of an offensive, which, of course, any number of military writers have pointed out is the best kind of defence.

> Thrice armed is he that hath his quarrel just,
> But four times he who gets his blow in fust.

Later on the statement is attributed to him that he has no idea of making peace with any of the Chihli party. He describes the whole Chihli faction as illegal. Which opens up vistas of interesting, though profitless speculation as to whether there exists any government in any part of China whose claims to technical legality would stand examination. But the importance of Marshal Chang's statement is that there is actually one wing of the Chihli party which, alarmed at the growing power of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, is actually discussing the possibility of calling in Marshal Chang Tso-lin to overthrow him. Somehow one does not see the Lord of Manchuria in the rôle of catspaw for the Tsao Jui clique.

The outstanding factor of Northern politics to-day is undoubtedly the growing ascendancy of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, whose power, supported on the Yangtze, now extends right across China from Szechuan to Tsingtao. To some extent that power is only on paper: lieutenants of Chinese warlords in distant provinces are not always the surest foundation. Wu Pei-fu's domain is more extensive than Chang Tso-lin's, but it is less compact. On the other hand, he has the advantage of being on the right side of the President, the recognized of foreign Powers, and even it is said, of being able to dictate to his old patron. Peking, as Mr Rodney Gilbert put it the other day, is a useful screen between him and the Diplomatic Body, but all the real authority is centring in Loyang. And it is a matter of the most vivid concern, what Marshal Wu means to do with it. He is the one Tuchun in China who flatly refused to do even lip-service to Sir Robert Ho Tung's round-table conference scheme; and his mental development has certainly advanced a long way from that of the plain blu

20,000 SOLDIERS IN KIATING

Szechuan Troops that Are Well Behaved: Paid Regularly: Recruits Flocking In

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiating, Sze., Feb. 19.

Gen. Chen Hong-fan has probably the best paid, best fed, best dressed army in China. Protecting Kiating and the immediate neighbourhood he has something between 10,000 and 20,000 soldiers. Gen. Chen's large army has a creditable reputation for good order and good behaviour. The roads to and from Kiating are quiet and free from brigands and this no doubt greatly facilitates the enormous traffic that passes through this port. Kiating is the terminus for the larger junks which ply between this province and Hupeh; in summer it is also the steamer terminus from Shanghai. Chen and his large army have made themselves secure here and by doing so have greatly facilitated trade in this part of China.

At the present time the most conspicuous thing in Kiating is a soldier: you see him every where; the tea-shops are crowded with soldiers and on the street the casual visitor would get the impression that he was in some great military camp. Bugles are blowing from daylight to dark: Confucian Buddhist and Taoist temples are all packed tightly with men in light and dark grey uniforms. Boys three feet high and men six feet high are all enlisted in this great army. I was much impressed with these soldiers when we passed through here two years ago and more so on the present occasion. There is an air of plenty about them and arrears in pay is quite unknown. Regularly, month by month, Gen. Chen sees that his large army is paid, fed properly and dressed.

RICHEST TOWN IN RICH PROVINCE.

One would naturally ask, How is he able to do it? Chen Hong-fan has wisely, or carefully, or fortunately selected the wealthiest place in this wealthy province. Within 10 miles of Kiating and extending two days from the city are the salt wells of Szechuan. The monthly revenue from the wells at Ninhuachi and Chukentan, 10 miles below Kiating, is said to be $100,000. This is only one source of revenue and in this wealthy centre there are at least 100 others. With this enormous revenue at hand Gen. Chen equips and maintains this well trained army.

At first sight, the maintenance of nearly 20,000 men in one centre, seems an enormous, useless, and uncalled for expense in time, money, and energy. But this is not so. It is simply the old theory over again—the conservation of energy. Financially it amounts to this: the wells produce the salt, the salt produces the revenue, the revenue maintains the army, the army spends the money, the money comes into the hands of the merchants, the merchants put it in circulation. Financially nothing seems to be lost: the money is produced locally and as far as one can observe spent locally. The shops along the principal thoroughfares of the city are in a flourishing condition: the business houses are well built and well stocked.

NOT CONCERNED IN SZECHUAN WAR.

One other point is well worthy of note: there is a keen desire among all classes of people to get into this well paid, well fed, well dressed army. This seems particularly so with young scholars. After graduation from school they enter the army as officers or are connected in different ways with the various staffs. Quite frequently when inquiring after an old scholar I was told he had entered the army. So far, Chen Hong-fan has taken very little interest in the actual fighting in Szechuan, and has been able until quite recently to maintain a neutral position. His policy has been to protect Kiating and the immediate neighbourhood and facilitate commerce out of the province. He has let the others do the fighting and the quarrelling and has only helped financially as demands have been made on him.

Locally he is behind many philanthropic institutions and movements and is what might be termed an accommodating soldier. Confucian, Christian, Buddhist, Taoist, all find in Chen Hong-fan a sympathetic, willing and ready supporter. He has a love for his country, for quietness and order and as long as he is left alone is quite prepared to leave others alone.

His army is entirely unconnected and while north and south fight each other Gen. Chen keeps his army fit and trim and ready for any emergency.

Chen Hsia-lin on the other hand has taken a very active interest in the present situation and with his poorly fed, poorly paid army is fighting for the northern cause in Szechuan.

WUSIH LETTER

Daily Launch Service Between City and Huchow: Grand Canal Widened

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wusih, Ku., Mar. 15,

Beginning with the coming silk season, a daily launch service will begin between Wusih and Huchow. The boats have a capacity for 600 passengers. It is proposed that the service shall continue in operation when the silk season is over.

The Coccoon Guild proposes to launch an educational campaign for the purpose of teaching the farmers how to get the best possible results in raising silkworms, in other words to produce the largest possible quantity of coccoons with a given weight of leaves.

Mention has been previously made of the widening and dredging operations on the Grand Canal south of the city. As this part of the canal had not been cleaned out for 60 years, it was decided to clear out the bottom for a space of about 2,000 ft. The work began on February 7, and was completed on March 7. It was rumoured that a large incense burner had been thrown into the Canal during the Taiping Rebellion and that boats were foundering on account of this obstruction. Instead they found that the trouble had been cause by a stone Buddha only two feet high. This Buddha has now been put into a temple.

Before the dredging begun seven stone pillars were erected along the bank. On these pillars are carved the names of seven Buddhas and for a week daily religious services were held at these pillars, by crowds of women burning incense and imploring Buddha to protect all boats which should hereafter sail on these waters.

Among the articles of value found while this work was going on were oz. sycee of silver weighing five each and small pieces of money amounting to about $70. Mud and débris have been removed to a depth of five and a half feet, and it is to be hoped that the tale of wrecks is now complete.

Tientsin News Service.

Tientsin, Mar. 15.

The Chartered Bank of India Australia & China is not behind her sister institutions in anticipating the expansion and demands of this rapidly developing treaty port, for within two weeks the bank will move out of its old premises in Ewo and Victoria Roads to permit operations on demolition of the old and construction of a new and imposing edifice on the same site.

The bank will remove to temporary quarters, in the old Carlowitz building, Consular Road, recently vacated by the defunct Asia Banking Corporation, there to remain until the new building is completed.

Messrs. Hemmings & Berkley who have gained an enviable reputation under the direction of their local representative, Mr. W. Gordon Parkin, are architects of the new edifice, which, when finished, will be a notable contribution to the many new and modern buildings which are beginning to characterize Tientsin. The Chartered Bank has earned a distinct popularity in Tientsin for its courteous personal attention to all depositors, whether large or small, and this pleasant feature of its public service has, if anything, been accentuated under the capable management of the present head, Mr. R. W. Robertson, and his obliging staff. For this reason alone many will welcome the bank's decision to replace its present antiquated and cramped offices with something more adequate to its needs and more befitting its dignity.

REINFORCED CONCRETE.

The new building will be of three floors, altogether 60 ft. high with a frontage of 150 ft. on Victoria Road and the same on Ewo road. The architecture is classical design with Ionic columns on both frontages. The main entrance will be in Victoria Road, to which approach will be made by shallow, broad steps of Peking Green stone. The principal material in walls and frontages will be pre-cast blocks composed of fine granite and cement mixture, which in certain places will be internally faced with bricks. Floors, roof and vaults will be made entirely of reinforced concrete, thereby rendering the building fire and water-proof. Most of the internal wood-work will be of teak, especially panellings, counter and the like, all window sashes will be made of steel.

The bank will occupy the entire basement and ground floors, the upper or first floor to be leased for offices, special provision being made to accomodate the desires of tenants. The whole ground floor will be given over to the general office, public space, Agent's office and Compradore offices. The general office will have a floor space of 7,000 sq. ft. and the Agent's office will be 33 by 23. The public space will be approximately 3,000 sq. ft. A long counter will enclose two sides of the general office and will be surmounted by an artistic bronze grille. The main entrance for foreign clients will be in Victoria Road, the steps leading up to a wide doorway directly through into the public space and general office. The Chinese entrance will be from the Ewo side, directly into the public space adjacent to the Compradore offices. On either side of the main entrance steps which are on the street line, will be a small lawn and on either side of the main door will be artistic bronze lamps.

LIGHTING AND VENTILATION.

Good lighting and ventilation are features of the building, the general office being lighted in day by direct light from the windows and at night by specially designed inverted electric illumination. The height of the main office, 26 ft., with ventilation windows just below the ceiling level, ensures rapid change of air throughout the day. In winter the building will be vapour-heated.

The basement floor will be occupied by the strong room, reserve and safecustody rooms, lavatories and heating chambers. The upper floor will be rented out as offices, partitions of which will be built in according to lessees' requirements. Entrance to this floor will be made from both Victoria and Ewo roads.

Altogether the building will be a remarkable advance on many similar constructions in Tientsin, both from the point of view of architectural beauty and accommodation and much credit is due to the architects Messrs. Hemmings & Berkley, and to the Manager, Mr. Robertson, for the careful consideration being given to minor details of construction, minor in some but nevertheless important when considered in relation to the comfort of clients and the facilitation of business.

THE BESSELL CASE AND COL. CHEN

The Assault at Fengtai: A Deliberate Official Untruth to British Legation: British Government's Welcome Demand for Proper Trial

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 12.

Just a week ago to-day most of the English language papers in North China printed a Japanese news agency report to the effect that Colonel Chen Kuo-hsien, who perpetrated the outrageous assault upon Mr. Bessell at Fengtai nearly six weeks ago, had been court-martialled and sentenced to 10 months' imprisonment. This report appeared to come from the Ministry of War, on Mr. Lu Chin's authority, was assumed to be official and was therefore generally accepted as fact by the foreign community. On Saturday last it was rumoured that this Colonel Chen had actually been sentenced to 28 days' imprisonment, but this seemed so absurd, following on the heels of what purported to be an official statement, that none of the correspondents took the trouble to investigate it. On Sunday the writer heard the same story from a more reliable source and since then he has been able to confirm the fact that Colonel Chen was sentenced to 28 days' imprisonment and that the British Legation has official knowledge of it.

A DELIBERATE FALSEHOOD.

The report that this upstart, a brother of Tsao Kun's concubine, who interfered with railway traffic at Fengtai, threatened the station master with a revolver, encouraged his men to make a particularly brutal assault upon a foreigner in railway employ with the chief engineer of the railway present, was sentenced to ten months' imprisonment, was simply a formal, deliberate official lie.

It is not the first one that has been told in this case. When the British Legation asked for the punishment of this Colonel Chen, in the first instance, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of China announced that this gentleman was a likin officer or something of the sort, in Hupeh, while all Tientsin knew that he was in Taku boasting on the streets that the Powers would not be able to touch a brother of a member of the President's harem.

It is a real pleasure to be able to report that the British Legation did not accept the story of the 10 months sentence and did not pretend to believe it. The matter was refered to London and it is still a greater pleasure to report that the Foreign Office of the British Labour Government returned very prompt instructions to the Legation to demand a real trial of the President's concubine's brother and to insist, under treaty right, that British official witnesses be present at this trial.

GILDING THE LILY.

The writer has hitherto refrained from comment upon this Bessell case because he felt that the bare facts as reported by the various news agencies would elicit stronger expressions of opinion from all foreign readers than could possibly be printed. A frame often diverts attention from a picture and spoils an otherwise perfect effect. Like comment upon a Sun Yat-sen interview, comment upon such Chinese doings as the assault upon Bessell or Feng Yu-hsiang's adventure in the Legation Quarter also spoils a perfect effect.

When the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of War of the Republic of China descend to petty prevarication to shield from justice a Taku coolie who happens to be a brother of a minor member of a high militarist's household, they are telling the world what the Chinese Government is and how fit it is to govern a member of the society of nations a hundred times more eloquently than any poor weary scribe could do it. The writer therefore feels entirely relieved of the necessity of reminding the readers of this paper that the Legations recognized Tsao Kun so that they might have a strong man within easy reach through whom they could put a check upon outlawry in remote provinces. It is superfluous to state that Fengtai is three miles from the outer wall of Peking or that Feng Yu-hsiang bawled his defiance and contempt for law within the sacred diplomatic precincts and within pistol shot of the residences of half a dozen plenipotentiaries.

THE CHINESE REACTION.

The foreigner does not need to make any comment upon such events anyway. The Chinese will do it for him. When they have clearly understood what has happened they will make more vociferous demands for a conference to increase the Customs duties. They will make fresh assaults upon Japan's position in Kuangtung. Foreign extraterritorial jurisdiction will become a burning shame. They will demand that Mr. Bessell kowtow to Colonel Chen and apologize for sharing the same sunlight with him. They will insist that the Diplomatic Body go to Nanyuan and make amends to General Feng for having a Legation Quarter at all. It is a waste of words, paper and ink to attempt comment upon such cases when the Chinese react so surely to them and advertise their significance so clearly.

British Foreign Office Taking Strong Stand: Trial of Col. Chen Demanded

Peking, Mar. 14.

The Far Eastern Times says that the British Foreign Office yesterday instructed the Legation to demand the retrial of Colonel Chen Kuo-hsien, who was in command of the soldiers who attacked Mr. Bessell at Fengtai, stating that Britain refused to recognize the court-martial proceedings since no British observer had been present. Accordingly the Legation sent a note to the Waichiaopu asking for the trial of Colonel Chen at an early date and that two British observers be allowed to attend.

It has been no secret for some time that a court-martial was held on Colonel Chen at Taku, at which no witnesses for the prosecution were called, and that Colonel Chen was sentenced to twenty-eight days' imprisonment and cashiered, while the soldier on whom the blame for the actual assault was placed, was given two years' imprisonment at a separate trial in Peking. It is understood that a report of these trials was sent to England for instructions with regard to the attitude which the Legation should take.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE RUSSIAN REFUGEES IN CHINA

Europe's Attention Called to their Desperate Plight

London, Mar. 18.

A correspondent has written to the "Times," calling attention to the dire straits of the thousands of Russian refugees in China, as instanced by the fact that some of them are applying for licences as ricsha pullers at Shanghai, and urging the Government to draw the attention of the Russian Government to the matter.—Reuter.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

WU PEI-FU'S HOURLY GROWING POWER

His Opponents in Presidential Palace Ready to Make Terms Even with Chang Tso-lin to Defeat the Loyang Chieftain

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, March 11.

It is said that mandates are being prepared appointing Ch'en T'iao-yuan, of Hsuchow, Pangpan (assistant Tuchun) of Anhui, appointing Wen Shu-teh to supreme command of the Pei Hai Squadron, and removing Wang Yung-ch'uan from office.

Ch'en T'iao-yuan's appointment will be a favour to the Kiangsu governor, Chi Hsieh-yuan, and will give him an even stronger hold upon Anhui. Admiral Wen Shu-teh's appointment to an independent command with his base at Tsingtao will record a victory for Wu Pei-fu in Shantung and will seem to Governor Hsiung Ping-chi to be the beginning of the end. This man's elimination will not be popular because he is one of the most efficient and straightforward Chinese in high office. There are several reasons however why Wu Pei-fu and his staff will work relentlessly towards his ruin. They owe him an old grudge for the high-handed way in which he dealt with them when they were established in Paotingfu after the fight with Chang Tso-lin two years ago. Also, his business-like control of the situation in Peking just before Tsao Kun's election, when every one else was making a mess of the situation, made that election possible, decidedly against Wu Pei-fu's plans and wishes. Finally the Shantung concessionaires of the group which includes Pan Fu, Chin Yun-peng and Chang Chih-tan, hold their interests in the Kiaochou district and the railway zone under Hsiung Ping-chi's patronage. These interests Wu Pei-fu wants to control through his fellow townsman Kao Enhung, former Minister of Communications in the Wang Chung-hui cabinet, and these persons he wants to embarrass as much as possible because of the influence which they bring to bear upon President Tsao through the now notorious Wang Yu-chih.

THE PUZZLE OF FUKIEN.

The sensational happenings in Fukien still puzzle the majority of observers in Peking. The Chinese press has no adequate explanation to offer. It has only been a few days since it was generally assumed here that General Sun Chuan-fang, finding his position in Fukien untenable, had decided to work with Governor Chi Hsieh-yuan of Kiangsu, to ignore Wu Pei-fu, and to operate in his own and General Chi's interest by invading either Chêkiang or Kiangsi, to Wu Pei-fu's embarrassment, and cutting out a new kingdom for himself. His spectacular return from Yenping to Foochow and his overthrow of Wang Yung-chuan, indicate clearly that he intends to stay in Fukien and strengthen his position there. And since Wu Pei-fu is already wiring busily to Peking insisting that Wang Yung-Ch'uan be outlawed, it would appear that Sun Ch'uan-fang's latest enterprise was carried out under Wu Pei-fu's direct instructions and that his seeming anxiety to get out of Fukien was chiefly a blind.

DOUBLE CROSSING.

Many Chinese who have been watching Fukien have assumed that Wang Yung-chu'an was more an Anfu than a Chihli partisan, and they are now at a loss to explain how Wu Pei-fu can go ahead with his cautious advances towards friendship with Tuan Chi-jui and Lu Yung-hsiang and at the same time instruct Sun Ch'uan-fang to force Wang out of Foochow and ask Peking to outlaw him. The truth of the matter seems to be that Wang Yung-ch'uan was working for himself alone, was chronically disloyal to both the Chihli and Anfu leaders, and had not even the sense to seek local support but abused the Fukienese most mercilessly. It is within the writer's limited knowledge of this tangled situation that last summer when Wang was pretending to make war upon Chang Chih-ping of Amoy, he was sending almost identical reports of his doings to both the Chihli leaders and to Marshal Tuan Chih-jui, pledging each party his unswerving fidelity. He is a Fengtien man by birth, was a protége of the former Tuchun, Li Hou-chi, and as commander of the 16th Mixed Brigade, turned against Li at the instigation of the notorious Little Hsu. The latter was disowned both by Lu Yung-hsiang and the leading Anfuites in the North at the time and Wang Yung-ch'uan's subsequent explanation that his campaign against Chang Chih-ping was all make-believe and that he was really fighting the bandits, the Min Chun or "people's army," never deceived any of the astute persons who surround Marshal Tuan in Tientsin. It is not likely that Governor Lu Yung-hsiang of Chêkiang was at any time deceived by Wang Yung-ch'uan and it has often been said that when he bought over the shipment of Russian arms which were sent a year ago from Nanking by Chi Hsieh-yuan and Tu Shih-kuei he was more intent upon throwing a wrench into Wang Yung-chuan's machinery than in spoiling the plans of the Chihli party.

Under such side-lights as these, it would appear that Sun Chuan-fang's unexpected coup in Fukien, ordered by Wu Pei-fu, would please, rather than antagonize, Governor Lu and the Anfuites in Tientsin. A prominent local politician to-day informed the writer that he thought the only highly placed person who would be surprised and displeased would be Chi Hsieh-yuan, who had hoped to use Sun Chuan-fang in Chêkiang or Kiangsi to distress either Lu Yung-hsiang or Wu Pei-fu. This is only a surmise, of course, but it sounds likely.

WU PEI-FU'S SPECIAL AGENTS.

Intelligent guessing is the essence of wisdom in what are called politics in China, and the guessing in Peking all leads the observer to believe that Wu Pei-fu is getting everything worth while into his own hands with celerity and an adroitness which do great credit to someone on his staff. The general assumption is that the master mind is that of Pai Chien-wu, better known as Hsing-ya, who has the distinction of being the direct descendant of the famous Tang Dynasty poet Pei Chü-yi and of a long line of aristocratic scholars.

In spite of the public advertisements, published by Marshal Tuan's son to the effect that his father would not receive guests on his birthday, which the local press interpreted as repulses of the Chihli party's friendly advances, it would seem that General Wu's delegate, the elderly Mr. Ch'ih Yun-p'eng, has been received in Marshal Tuan's household and is persona grata there. This Mr. Ch'ih was one of the young student officers in the first units of the Peiyang modern army who were sent to Manchuria during the Chinese-Japanese war as technical advisers to the pig-headed Manchu commanders who held modern notions of warfare in contempt. He was thus associated very early in his career with Yuan Shih-kai, Marshal Tuan, Feng Kuo-chang, Wang Shih-chen and all the military men who have since held supreme commands in China. Not long after the Chinese-Japanese war he resigned his commission and entered the commissary department where he made a generous fortune. As he comes from Penglai, Wu Pei-fu's home town, he knew the Loyang chief in his youth, and has emerged from retirement to act as his major domo and adviser and to run diplomatic errands for him. This Mr. Ch'ih has power because of his ancient associations with highly placed men of the old régime and also owes much to his amazing fund of humour and a large stock of genial guile. His relations with the Anfu folk will be watched with much interest by the enemies of the Chihli party, but with still more interest by Wu Pei-fu's enemies within the Chihli party, particularly by the palace advisorate which is being discomfited by Loyang's inroads upon Shantung.

CHANG TSO-LIN INVOKED.

Their most effective but most desperate policy now would be to make peace with Chang Tso-lin and bring him into the fold as an ally against General Wu and this many Chinese think they will do. A Japanese news agency to-day reports that the Fengtien attitude towards the Chihli faction has changed radically and that Chang Tso-lin is now more than ready for an understanding. Private reports from Mukden, coming through both foreigners and Chinese, indicate, however, that Chang's detestation of Wu Pei-fu only ripens with age and that he cannot possibly consider an alliance of any sort with the man who made his magnificence ridiculous in Peking. The common assumption therefore is that, seeing Loyang coming into the ascendency in so many quarters, he is ready to accept as his allies against Loyang those elements in the Peking Government and in the Chihli party at large which are hostile to Wu, believing that to split the Chihli party effectually and make half of it his ally would do more to secure his position than to enter into a binding agreement with any of the party's tottering enemies.

The Japanese press agencies are usually better informed upon the trend of opinion in Chang Tso-lin's court than any other publicists and, since they say that Chang Tso-lin is ready to make peace with Chihli, it is fairly safe to assume that an important understanding is imminent. It will be an understanding between Chang Tso-lin and the Tientsin and Paoting cliques, including General Wang Ch'eng-ping and probably General Feng Yu-hsiang, to control Tsao Kun and to interrupt Wu Pei-fu's triumphal processions into the East, West and South. Such a development would be a much more serious menace to the peace of North China than independent Manchuria is now and would give Governor Chi Hsieh-yuan in his position astride the traditional Nanking fence reason for furious, concentrated thought.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN FUKIEN

Protection of Missionaries: The Attack on Gen. Wang: Lawlessness in Amoy

Peking, Mar. 13.

Telegrams from Foochow report that on the 12th instant the British and American Consuls called on the General commanding the troops at Foochow and made representations to him regarding the dangers to which missionaries might be exposed by the intended military operations against Gen. Wang Yung-chuan at Hsinghua and Chuanchow. The General promised to make every possible effort to protect missionaries belonging to the two countries in the neighbourtoods mentioned during the operations there. Apparently a movement designed to dislodge Gen. Wang from Hsinghua has commenced.

Later.

Despatches from Amoy describe a state of lawlessness existing there in which the chief offenders are Formosans. They are said to have recently set fire to several houses and bombed the Chinese police and fire brigade when they appeared on the scene, preventing them from taking any steps to subdue the flames.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

The latest expedient to raise money for the Tsingtao squadron is the threatened increase of fishery taxes along the coast of China. The suggestion, made by Loyang, is said to have been approved by the Ministry of Navy.

RUSSIA, CHINA AND C. E. R.

Status of Railway Strictly Governed by Washington Conference Decision

By Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, March 13.

One of the most important subjects under discussion between Mr. Karakhan and Mr. C. T. Wang is that of the disposition of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The Chinese press has been making much of it for weeks past and all hands including the negotiators seem to be working on the assumption that the only difficulty in the way is the division of control between the Russian and Chinese Governments.

It is wholly forgotten in local circles that among the provisions passed at the Washington Conference, to which Chinese agitators are for ever appealing, is one which recognizes that the Russian title to an interest in the Chinese Eastern Railway is vested in a private company (not in the Russian Government), that the Powers recognize no Russian political interest in the line, and that China in assuming control of the railway is simply acting as trustee of the private company which should control the Russian share. Until all the Powers which signed this agreement recognize Russia formally and grant her the right to make what disposition she likes of the private company, some of them are in honour bound to hold China responsible as trustee and to object to the nationalization of the Russian interest in the line. Though the issue is only a technical one, it is one which France, America and Japan, to mention no others, cannot possibly ignore if they have any respect for the seals which they put upon the various Washington pacts.

THE PRIVATE COMPANY.

In common equity it must be admitted that the Russian Government has a much bigger claim to the Chinese Eastern Railway than the private company which holds the shares and which is now represented by the Russo-Asiatic Bank under French protection. The Bank in the first place was only a shield for a political investment on the part of the Imperial Russian Government in Manchuria. The line was never run, before the Revolution in Russia, as a commercial line but as a political thoroughfare. The private company's share holdings amount to Rls. 5,000,000. The Russian Government's investment in the railway and the zone are supposed to total Rls. 300,000,000. The Russo-Asiatic Bank in Paris now holds the shares, amounting to Rls. 5,000,000 and the Soviet Government is supposed to hold debentures amounting to Tls. 300,000,000. In ordinary business when a house, or a property or a company changes hands, the holders of debentures or mortgages take precedence over the owners and shareholders. If China or the recognized Russian private company were disposed to transfer the railway or throw it into bankruptcy, there is no doubt that the Russian Government, holding the debentures would have to be satisfied in some way before the bargain could be sealed and before the Russian private company could be paid in any way for its shareholdings.

A BETRAYAL OF TRUST.

At the same time it is equally true under common equity that the title to a property cannot be taken from an owner and turned over to the holder of mortgage or debentures until the owner has been given an opportunity to pay interest on his debts or to redeem them in one way or another. The Russian private company represented by the Russo-Asiatic Bank holds the real title to the Russian share in the Chinese Eastern Railway by virtue of the shares deposited in Paris and by virtue of the international recognition of this title put in documentary form in Washington in 1921. China therefore cannot agree to assume responsibility for the debentures issued to the Imperial Russian Government until it has been clearly shown that the private company which issued them refuses to be responsible for them. China cannot transfer this private company's interest in the line to the Russian Government for the repurchase or buy it back in instalments without giving the shareholders a chance to assert their claim and make arrangements for the redemption of the debentures. As trustees for a private company the Chinese would be violating their trust and forfeiting the confidence of the Powers if they came to any agreement with the Soviet Government for the repurchase of the debentures to which the Russo-Asiatic Bank was not a party.

These technicalities may seem very remote from the real issue and to have little relation to common equity, but since the Powers have endorsed the technical title of a private Russian company to the Russian interest in the Chinese Eastern Railway, they cannot very easily evade the responsibility of defending it against a Chinese betrayal of trust.

SITUATION IN THE SOUTH

Further Reports of Troop Movements: Constitutional Troops Threatening Kochow

From Our Own Correspondent.

Pakhoi, Feb. 15.

After about five months of peace and quietness, there are again rumours of trouble in the near future owing to dissensions which are said to have broken out in the camp of our present rulers. At present it is all very vague and people seem disinclined to talk. It is also said that a pro-Sun force under the leadership of Leung Hung-kai is approaching and has already reached the neighbourhood of Kochow.

The long-talked-of scheme for a motor road from here to Limchow has been revived again, and it is asserted by a local merchant who has a hand in the scheme, that it will be available for use in a few months time. As to that, we must wait and see. The idea is to cut an entirely new road a little to the east of the existing track, and to provide a service of motor-cars, the returns from which are to recoup the original outlay; anyone wishing to use the road for their own vehicles will be charged a toll. It will certainly be a great boon to the neighbourhood if it can be accomplished, for there is considerable traffic between the two places even under the present lack of facilities.

The long-awaited doctor for the C.M.S. Hospital has at last arrived and a well attended meeting was held in the Memorial Hall of St. Luke's Church to welcome Dr. and Mrs. Watson.

Thieves have been working overtime at their nefarious jobs lately, and have not confined their unwelcome attentions to foreigners, though these are generally regarded as fair game.

CHINESE NEW YEAR IN LONDON

Celestial Beauties at a Banquet

The London Chinese celebrated their New Year with a banquet at the Chinese Café, Oxford Street.

The Chinese and Japanese Ambassadors, students and business men wore evening dress suits, but the scene was made brilliant by the national silk costumes of the women, seated at tables decorated with yellow and white chrysanthemums. One Celestial beauty was a striking picture. She wore a red rose in her hair and a dress of green silk starred with white flowers.

It took the guests two hours to eat the meal, which comprised the following dishes:—

Bamboo skin Awabi soup.
Fried sole with rich gravy.
Steward chicken with mushroom.
Steamed whole duck in soup stuffed with mushroom.
Roast and steamed pork and bamboo shoot.
Chinese pudding
Rice.
Tea.

THE BAROMETER OF DOMESTIC BONDS

Increasing Popularity with Investors While Sir Francis Aglen Is Responsible for Them

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, March 11.

There is no problem so intricate and so difficult to solve as the determination of what makes China's domestic bonds rise and fall. Superficially it has appeared for many months past that neither political nor economic conditions had any bearing whatever upon the bond market and that bank speculation, particularly in Shanghai, was the controlling influence. Foreign investors and speculators, observing that the worse political and economic conditions in China got the higher the bonds went, have long since come to the conclusion that the market was wholly controlled and manipulated by the Chinese banks and that they were playing a consistent game, pushing the bonds up whenever conditions seemed to warrant a fall, and pushing them down whenever there were hopeful signs of improvement in general conditions.

THE RULE OF CONTRARIES.

Some speculators have operated in a small way upon this assumption and have made money and so have some Chinese, but the Chinese bankers trace what seems to be the contrary course of the bonds to causes other than manipulation and try to show that there is a fundamental economic urge behind the bond movements which can be little influenced by speculation. They point out that in the first place Sir Francis Aglen's staunch defence of the various issues, whether in or out of the consolidated group, has given the Chinese investor, whether in or out of banking circles, great confidence in the security of the bonds. Secondly, the banks started not only gambling but investing in bonds because other investments were hard to find. The Chinese banks pay an average of 7½ per cent. on fixed deposits and a very generous rate on current accounts. They have to turn their money over pretty frequently to make a profit. Commercial and industrial securities are increasingly hard to find and are less and less secure as conditions in China get steadily worse. Lately the gold exchange has been so stable that it has offered few temptations and little profit to the gambler. Not only the banks, but the investors in the interior have bought bonds therefore as the only safe security easily available. Many of the banks have bought them in the hope of manipulating the market and of making big profits on quick turnovers, but an increasingly large number of Chinese investors have bought them to hold. The bonds are now more widely held and have gone more deeply into the interior, for purely economic reasons, than ever before; and the more widely they are scattered among investors the less chance is there of bank manipulation. This is one reason that political rumours, deliberately circulated by gamblers to influence the market, such as the story of the death of Sir Francis Aglen and the more recent story of the death of President Tsao Kun, have had so little effect upon the market value of the bonds. It explains also why, as conditions get worse, and other sound domestic investments are scarcer, there is a greater demand for bonds; and why, whenever there is promise of improvement and therefore a chance of putting money into other lines, commercial or industrial, the bonds drop.

SPECULATORS DISAPPOINTED.

Local speculators, who were looking forward to a sharp rise in market quotations when it became generally known that there were to be amortization drawings of the 8 per cent. military loan and the 7 per cent. 10th year loan, are inclined to believe that the Shanghai banks were responsible for the series of rumours of Tsao Kun's death, that these rumours brought about the fall, and that the banks were waiting for it to buy in before the drawings were publicly announced. The biggest banks here repudiate this theory. They say that the slump came simply because the market was for the moment saturated, that they will recover now that the drawings are in sight and that they will then find a level, and a fairly high one at that, from which speculators and gamblers will be unable to move them and which will be influenced very largely by economic conditions. If there are better investments available they will go down. As conditions get worse and investments are scarcer they will go up, almost to the point where they cease to bear interest and afford only a little better way of disposing of money than burying it.

FROM WUCHANG TO HANKOW

Up-to-date Launches, but Where to Land?: Hankow's Signs of Growing Wealth

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, Hup., March 9.

Our means of communication with Hankow across the Yangtze River have recently been increased by a new line of launches, which run from the Hanyang Gate of Wuchang to the First Ma-t'eo by the new Customs House in Hankow. There are now three lines of launches running between the two cities. The two older lines run to Lung Wang Miao in the Chinese city, at the corner where the River Han joins the Yangtze, and to the Sixth Ma-t'eo on the Bund just opposite the British Consulate.

The new launches are painted a smart-looking blue, and their engines run steadily, instead of with the clanking sound of the older boats, which makes one wonder every moment whether a crank or a piston-rod is going to give way suddenly. Originally, the landing-place was right upon the hulk of Messrs. Butterfield and Swire; but this has been forbidden, and the company have now moored a small pontoon of their own just below the hulk. Even their right to do this is being disputed, and it is a question whether they will be allowed to occupy this position permanently.

Similarly, the right of the older company to have their pontoon at the Six Ma-t'eo is being threatened. A British gunboat is in future to be stationed permanently in Hankow, and the space opposite to the Consulate is obviously a convenient anchorage for it. If both these landing-places are forbidden, the consequence will be that passengers from Wuchang will be forced, either to take a launch which lands them somewhere in the Chinese city, or else to return to the old precarious method of crossing the river by sampan. The same inconvenience will be imposed upon anyone who wishes to cross from the Hankow side. The B.M.C. have been deriving an annual income of 5,000 in rent from the single company alone, for the privilege of landing passengers at the Sixth Ma-t'eo; so that even from a financial standpoint, there is something to be said against taking away their landing on the bund.

OUR MODERN ARCHITECTURE.

One cannot cross the river now without being struck by the immense progress in building which has been made by Hankow even in the last two or three years. The fine, granite-fronted Hongkong & Shanghai Bank building no longer stands alone, but is challenged on the one side by two still newer bank buildings, and on the other by the recently completed and very fine offices of the A.P.C. The whole Bund now is dominated at one end by the new Customs House, which is another fine structure of grey granite.

The newest building in Wuchang is the new Temple of Loyalty which has been erected by the Military Governor next to the experimental garden inside the Great East Gate, and which is not quite finished. This temple consists of two courts, each faced by a low hall built of well-pointed red bricks. The roof is of Chinese design, but made with modern tiles, and the floors are of well-laid portland cement. Close by, an old Buddhist temple has been endowed and renovated by the Governor. Its centuries-old name of the Yu Huang-koh, Pavilion of the Jade Emperor, has been changed to the Temple of Southern Hill and the priest in charge is also appointed the teacher of a day-school, from which the babel of the scholars bawling their books can be heard as one passes along the road in front.

GOOD WORDS FOR ALL.

In all parts of the city, there are now posted up neat white sign-boards, with mottoes written upon them in clear black characters. Their object, apparently is to give good advice to the people; for they bear such legends as, "Idleness is the root of crime," "Riches are not carelessly got, and must not be carelessly spent," "Virtue is more important than wealth," etc. They have been put up by the Hupeh Educational Association. One may question the advantage of spilling all this wordy counsel before the eyes of a largely illiterate population; but at least they are preferable to the "Buy no Japanese goods" with which the city was placarded three years ago, and which still disfigures the walls outside nearly all the shops.

Rather significant is one motto which is posted up not far from the Civil Governor's yamen. It reads "If you are on the earth for only one day, for one day be a good man; if you are in office for only one day, for one day be a good official." In view of the fact that we have had several Civil Governors during the last few years, and that for a considerable period we have been without one, one cannot help wondering if the obvious irony is designed or accidental.

THE WAR IN SZECHUAN

Remnants of Southern General's Forces Rounded up by Yang Sen

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tzeliutsing, Sze., Feb. 29.

The military situation had been very quiet here till a few days ago when there were considerable troop movements, first from Suifu, apparently to head off the retreating troops of Hsiong Ke-wu. Now large numbers of Yang Sen's from the north fill every available shop and home.

It is said there are 10,000 troops here. No able carrier appears on the street. The soldiers seem to be made up equally of Kueichow, Yunnan and Szechuan men. Last week one of the large pawnshops was looted and the owners severely injured and taken to the Mission Hospital. There have been no battles near here. Most of the Canadian Methodist Mission hospital's military accounts have been paid without much difficulty.

There is a pressing demand for money orders on Shanghai, and other large centres, both far and near, much more than can be issued.

Many scores of foreigners have been travelling to and from yearly meetings, but we have heard of no case of incivility from the hordes of soldiers, though inconvenience is frequently encountered.

A Chinese has come from Chêngtu to establish an engineering School. Work is being continued on the $40,000 five-arch stone bridge which crosses the river here.

The beans, wheat and rape all look like a good crop, but rain is needed. Food stuffs are naturally very high. The dollar is 3040 cash.

MOROS DEFEATED IN MINDANAO

Forty-eight Moros were killed and seven of the constabulary were wounded at Cotabiga, Mindanao. The Daeu Santiago, the notorious outlaw, escaped during the battle.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANG TSO-LIN'S RAILWAY SCHEMES

New Line to Taonanfu: Dreams of Waste Places to Develop: The Great War Question

From Our Own Correspondent.

Fakumen, Man., March 8.

The branch railway from Chengchiatun (Liaoyuanhsien) to Taonanfu, about 170 miles in length, was completed last autum. The regular schedule of trains began in January. The new section brings the mileage of the Szeupingkai-Taonanfu system up to 295 or thereabouts, and puts the vast northwest of Fengtien Province into immediate connexion with Mukden. Except for a couple of bridges over the Liao River, which is the main artery of South Manchuria, no engineering difficulty has been encountered. Flat, sandy steppes characterize the greater part of the routes, westward and northward.

A drawback to the efficient working of the Taonanfu line is the shortage of water, which just now involves rather long waits for replenisment at some stations. Indeed, between Taonanfu and the next considerable town beyond the railway to the westward, there is a stretch of some 20 miles of waterless prairie, which is a kind of no-man's-land. Soldiers from either end do not care to enter it and hence it is a happy hunting-ground for brigands.

The city of Taonanfu, at one time talked of as the possible capital of a new province, is an enormous enclosure within an earthern rampart, sparsely occupied. Busy enough as it is in the central thoroughfares, the empty spaces seem to have been intended for expansion. Or quite likely the wide enclosure was meant for future defence. At present the neighbourhood is peaceful. Former brigands, turned soldiers, are well-behaved. The General at the head of the Taonanfu garrison has a splendid reputation.

WILL THE SCHEME PAY?

The prospects of settlement and cultivation depend on the nature of the soil. Marshal Chang Tso-lin is said to be opposed to carrying the railway beyond Taonanfu northward to join the C.E.R. at Tsitsihar. His aim is to have a completely Chinese-owned line from Tsitsihar running to the west of the present S.M.R. and its branches, down south to the Peking-Mukden Railway. Although the Szupingkai-Taonanfu branch is nominally Chinese, it has been built on borrowed Japanese capital. The rolling-stock largely consists of surplus carriages from the S. M. R. and the Korean Railways. The Japanese would, we are told, be very willing to continue the Taonanfu line up to Tsitsihar. But Marshal Chang is an able politician, attentive to his own interests—or the interests of the Republic.

The country through which Marshal Chang's proposed railway would run is, indeed, largely unpopulated in the northern ragion. But as was reported by a B.A.T. man, who made a trip by motor from Tsitsihar in the direction indicated, the land has many good tracts suitable for cultivation. Moreover, the sources of the Liao River lie in the neighbourhood of the southern section. Hence there must be water somewhere. In Marshal Chang's tight situation just now, the railway seems a mere dream. He has no jurisdiction over Jehol, through which the route to some extent would run. And more than all, he can have the enterprises of peace or the delirium of war, but hardly both. Not that he is scraping up every penny to spend it on bayonets and bombs. The Northeastern University new buildings are rising from the pleasant meadows near the North Imperial Tomb. Even so, military ambition, or self-defence, eats up the resources otherwise available for peaceful development.

CHANG'S ARMY FOR DEFENCE.

When the question is mooted—"Will there be war in spring?" the Chinese look glum and shake their heads. Rumour changes from day to day. The practically universal opinion of the Chinese might be summed up in the dictum that, sooner or later, the enmity between Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu will issue in an armed conflict. Beyond that, they do not care to prophesy. There is, however, another angle from which the obscure situation may be regarded.

An observer of authority, with access to Government information, holds that Marshal Chang is only preparing for defence. He has no intention of starting a war. But he is well aware that, when the Chihli leaders have straightened out the rest of China sufficiently to take off their coats to tackle the last recalcitrant stronghold, then Chang's day of reckoning will have arrived.

Against that coming day he means to be ready. That is all. Meantime, his affiliations with Chêkiang and the South may lead to possible military demonstrations in their favour. Such demonstrations would not be intended as a declaration of war.

This view is comforting, especially when recruiting shows no sign of stoppage and when the Mexican dollar exchange into Fengtien paper notes continues high. The Chinese tend to be sceptical of the prospects of peace. Nevertheless, it is probable that this authoritative opinion may not be far from the truth.

WEALTHY ANHUI FAMILY'S PLIGHT

Carried off by Chekiang Brigands: Rescuers Killed

From a Correspondent.

Tunki, An., Mar. 9.

Three days ago a Dr. Ma (trained in Western medicine) rushed up to Chikihsien in response to an urgent call. He brings back an exciting tale.

Shitu is a beautiful and wealthy town 25 li north of the hsien city and not very far from the Chêkiang border. About four days ago 30 bandits from Chêkiang attacked the ancestral home of a very wealthy Mr. Hu. This gentleman is connected with a dozen large industries in port cities. The bandits improved the occasion of his China New Year visit to the old home to carry out a raid. About 20 were armed with pistols. No guns in the party. They seized this gentleman and 18 or 19 of his friends and household and carried them into the mountains. They hold them for $20,000 ransom. A rescue was attempted by local people, two of whom were wounded and two killed. Inquiries are proceeding by the local military.

Tuan Chizue's birthday is at hand, and the Tupan is sending congratulations by special messenger.

Four new launches for the Chientang Ferry are spoken of and the building of an adequate jetty is also projected.

Dr. and Mrs. Gray, of Peking, and Dr. and Mrs. Fearn are expected in the city to-day.

DR. C. C. Wang, President of the Chinese Eastern Railway, has returned to Harbin, where the situation is now reported as being quieter.

MR. ELLY WIDLER RELEASED

After Months of Imprisonment Without Trial and Abominable Ill-Treatment by Yang Sen

The [illegible] news reached Shanghai on Monday that Mr. Elly Widler, who suffered months of imprisonment in dirty Chinese military prisons and was twice told he would be executed, has been released.

It will be remembered that as far back as September 10, soldiers acting under Gen. Yang Sen's orders arrested Mr. Widler on a charge of arms smuggling at the Cosmos Club at Chungking and dragged him bound through the streets to the Magistrate's yamên. After a week in durance vile he was brought before the Magistrate and another official on a mock trial, at which he was threatened with bambooing and execution. The Magistrate said to him: "I can have you bambooed and have you shot. Do you understand?"

Then followed weeks of imprisonment for allegedly selling arms to the Southern forces, in the course of which he frequently was marched shackled through the streets from one yamên to another.

Then came the advance of the Southern troops against Gen. Yang Sen. He prepared to retreat, looting the Cosmos Club, of which Mr. Widler had been manager, and told his prisoner that he could buy his release for $200,000 or be shot.

At the time of Yang Sen's hurried flight in November, after spending weeks in a dirty military gaol, Mr. Widler was dragged out, fettered, and made to march with Gen. Yang Sen's retreating army all the way from Chungking to Wanhsien—10 days' march. He was laughed at, mocked and ill-treated by the rabble composing the Northern army.

Arriving at Wanhsien, he was flung into a public gaol, where presumably he remained until a few weeks ago.

Although he claims Swiss citizenship, Mr. Widler is not recognized as a subject of that country, which now enjoys extra-territorial privileges—hence this story of illtreatment and persecution.

MISSIONARY LADIES' HOUSE LOOTED

Dastardly Attack by Northern Soldiers on C. I. M. Premises at Chuhsien

Ichang, Mar. 8.

A distressing experience of three ladies belonging to the China Inland Mission at the hands of looting Northern soldiers in their advance against the Szechuanese is recounted by one of the ladies, who is passing through Ichang on her way home on furlough.

She, with the other two ladies, was stationed at Chuhsien, some five days' journey overland from Wanhsien, Szechuan. On January 15 the Szechuanese Army was forced hastily to evacuate the city as they were hard pushed by the Northern troops under Gen. Yang Sen. As the Szechuanese left the city, the advance guard of the Northern forces, consisting of two companies, entered at the other end. A party of soldiers, intent on loot, forced their way into the house occupied by the ladies announcing their coming by firing shots into the house. They demanded $5,000 as the price of security, but, though the ladies collected all they had, it did not amount to more than between one and two hundred dollars. This they handed over, but it failed to satisfy the looters, who demanded the full $5,000 on pain of shooting. Some stood over the ladies with their rifles pointed at them, while the others ransacked the whole house, turning out all cupboards, wardrobes and boxes. They even went so far as to search the persons of the ladies, robbing them of watches, spectacles and other articles. They carried away clothes, bedding, clocks and all useful things from the house. Some of them amused themselves by shooting at various objects all over the house, putting bullets through the pictures on the walls. One of the soldiers made a bayonet thrust at one of the ladies, but the bayonet was turned aside by her skirt and she was not injured.

The ladies, now at their wit's end, thought of the Chinese pastor, who was in the Church buildings in another part of the city, and sent there to see if they could get some help. This place, however, they learned, was also being systematically looted by other soldiers, who carried off all the clothes of the pastor and his family, as well as all the money on which they could lay their hands. It would appear that some of the Christians had considered the Church buildings a safe place to hide their money, for the soldiers got a large sum. Help, however, came at last in the shape of two soldiers, who informed the ladies that they were Christians, and stood by them, warning off other parties of looters.

Finally the gang left the house, after taking a parting shot or two at the ladies which fortunately missed.

It is understood that Bishop Cassells came to Chuhsien immediately and made representations to the military commander, who repaid the money taken. No compensation, however, was made for the many articles looted from the house.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FATHET VAN PRAET'S ORDEAL

Saw 40 Fellow-prisoners Shot: His Ghastly Experiences While in Captivity

Some amazing information has come to hand regarding the recent capture by bandits and subsequent release of Dr. Thompson and Father van Praet, the story being told in a letter received by Mr. A. de C. Sowerby from the Trans-Asia Photo Scientific Expedition. At Paotou, where Dr. Thompson was captured, the expedition got into touch with Father van Praet, the priest recently released after having been captured by bandits about 340 li south of Kueihuacheng. Father van Praet was taken into the Ordos Desert and kept at the headquarters of the Northern Ordos Mongols, the band who held him prisoner being composed of men of this tribe, with a sprinkling of Chinese. He had a terrible experience before he was released, for the bandits summarily executed many of their Chinese prisoners and he had to witness the shooting of 40 of them.

The terms enforced for the release of Father van Praet included the enrolment of the chief of the district and 250 of his men in the Chinese army. Another remarkable and really ludicrous fact was that the ransom for Father van Praet's Chinese bodyguard was paid in cigarettes, which apparently the bandits valued beyond money. The bandits are said to be mounted on excellent horses and are well armed with Mauser rifles and pistols. The money raised for the release of Dr. Thompson is said to have been retained by the bodyguard.

FOLLOWING MARCO POLO'S ROUTE.

The quest of the expedition from whom this information has been obtained is most interesting, the object being to traverse the whole of the Central Asian route followed by Marco Polo on his supposed journey into India by Kashgar, on the way taking moving pictures and other photographs of scientific, ethnological and geographical interest, and collecting biological specimens. Despite the hardships and dangers of such an expedition starting in mid-winter, there is a lady amongst the travellers. Mr. Eugene Lamb and his wife, Mrs. Corinne Lamb, with a Chinese biologist, Mr. Wong Hai-cheng, made a start on the journey early in February, when they left Peking for Kalgan. The next stage was to Datungfu and thence to Shihyan, or Kueihuacheng, where they took a number of [illegible]. Here also, on February 12, they were joined by the other member of the expedition, Mr. Floyd S. Tangier Smith, who had been delayed in Peking securing various permits. The party continued on to Paotou, the terminus of the railway, where they ascertained the story of the bandits.

The expedition now is on its way across the Ordos Desert, travelling by camel caravan to Ninghsiafu, from which place a route will be taken southwest to Lanchowfu, on through Chinese Turkestan, and round the north of Tibet. The travellers report having seen a certain amount of game, etc., up to the present and they have passed through very cold districts, the temperature in places being minus 10 degrees.

KIAO-TSI RAILWAY'S FUTURE

Commission Appointed to Ascertain Possibilities of Future Development

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 13.

The Ministry of Communications has appointed a Commission for the purpose of making an extensive investigation into the present state of the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway as well as into its future possibilities. This Commission, composed of Mr. Kin, the Director-General of the Kirin-Changchun Railway, Mr. P. D. Griffith, Assistant General Manager of the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, Mr. S. T. Chow, Traffic Manager of the Tientsin-Pukow Railway, Mr. G. E. Baker, adviser to the Ministry of Communications and Mr. Sun, Technical Expert to the Ministry will shortly arrive here, and will be assisted in the investigation by the various chiefs of the Railway Administration, headed by Mr. T. Ohmura, the Traffic Manager.

A report as to the results of the investigation will eventually be forwarded to the Ministry of Communications and will, in turn, be submitted to Marshal Wu Pei-fu. It is the aim of the Ministry of Communications and of the Managing Board of the Kiao-Tsi Railway to prove to the Marshal the impossibility of financing the squadron under Admiral Wen, or for that matter any other squadron, at the expense of the revenues of the railway.

The impression seems to be that the promise made to Marshal Wu Pei-fu by Mr. Liu Kuen, the Managing Director of the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway, to finance the squadron to the extent of $50,000 monthly was made entirely by himself without the sanction of his superiors.

INTEREST DUE TO JAPANESE.

According to Mr. Ohmura, the improvements which the railway so much needs if they could be carried out without interruption, would be the means of doubling the present revenues by 100 per cent. within the next six years, in other words, by 1930, the annual revenue of the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway should be in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000. As the interest due to the Japanese Government is fixed, namely, $200,000 monthly, Mr. Ohmura sees no reason why the amount due to the Japanese Government for the retrocession of the Railway should not be available upon maturity of the agreement arrived at in Washington. Mr. Ohmura says that the Japanese have no designs on the Railway at all, and that if they had, they would have allowed the Chinese militarists to go to work and convert the Railway into a second Kin-Han line until even the interest due to Japan could not be paid, when the Japanese would step in and seize the railway on the pretext of force majeure. That said Mr. Ohmura, was certainly not the line of action of the Japanese Government.

IMPROVEMENTS AT TSINGTAO.

The marines hitherto occupying barracks in Pacific Road have been removed to barracks far removed from the residential and business districts. Hitherto, they have made themselves a nuisance by constant blowing of bugles and beating of drums. This, together with road mending now visible everywhere, and cleaning of parks, indicate a true desire on the part of the Administration to encourage the coming of holiday makers for the summer.

WAYFOONG'S NEW TIENTSIN HOME

Foundation Stone Laid by Lady Macleay: Her Tribute to a Great British Financial Institution: "The Powerhouse of Trade" in the Far East

Tientsin News Service.

Tientsin, Mar. 9.

In the presence of a large gathering of Tientsin and Peking residents, including representatives of the Consular Services and Chinese Officialdom and Chamber of Commerce Lady Macleay, wife of the British Minister, laid the foundation-stone of the new branch office of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank here to-day. Sir Ronald Macleay was also present.

Mr. G. H. Stitt, after thanking Sir Ronald and Lady Macleay for the honour they had done the bank in coming to take the principal part in the opening ceremony, reminded his hearers that Tientsin was one of the largest ports in China, being second only to Shanghai, and the port of the Capital of the country. With an enormous and growing trade all its concessions were rapidly developing. In their growth the Hongkong Bank had shared and for their future development the bank was being prepared, they could well understand the old building, which had done service for so many years was no longer adequate. The new building, which would be erected on the old site, would be a credit to its architects, Messrs. Atkinson & Dallas, and he hoped would be a lasting tribute from the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation to the soundness and stability of the trade of the port and to the Concessions.

LADY MACLEAY'S SPEECH.

Mr. Stitt then read a telegram from the Chief Manager, Mr. A. G. Stephen, which said: "Following for Lady Macleay: The Directors and Chief Manager greatly appreciate your kindness in laying the foundation-stone and feel sure that the building begun under such gracious auspices will have a long and prosperous career." Another telegram from a former Tientsin resident, Mr. A. B. Lowson, read: "Success to the rising edifice. Shanghai staff."

In the course of her speech, Lady Macleay said:

Before declaring this stone well and truly laid, I must thank Mr. Stitt and the other dignitaries of the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation for the honour they have done me in asking me to lay this foundation-stone and to give the first impulse of life to the magnificent building which will replace the former premises, and which, by the grandeur of its structure and the beauty of its architecture, will eventually arrest the attention of the passer-by and make him pause and reflect on what British enterprise and financial genius have achieved in the Far East.

Monuments to our commerce and industry, such as this imposing building when completed is destined to become, loom as landmarks not only in the vast portions of the earth covered by the Union Jack, but are to be found wherever British courage and foresight have established new markets and have secured a firm footing.

They represent the history and traditions of our race, they embody our national pride, they are an influence for peace and civilization and have a practical as well as a moral significance. They are the mainspring of business, the power-house of trade; and if we have encircled the globe with our commerce it is because there have been men such as the founders of the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation, who by their incessant vigilance, their just and loyal dealings, their faithful performance of duty and their careful methods of keeping abreast of the times, have succeeded in spite of early difficulties and temporary periods of depression, in building up a mighty financial institution, which has won the confidence and respect of British and Chinese merchants alike, who have now come to look upon "Wayfoong" as the trusted custodian of their wealth and the sturdy bulwark of their credit. I am not competent to pay a tribute to these men, which should be worthy of their merits. But of such is the British Empire.

Miss Betty Johnston, daughter of the Tientsin manager, handed Lady Macleay a magnificent bouquet, and Mrs. A. G. Stephen a silver trowel, suitably engraved. Mrs. Stephen said she felt it a great privilege on behalf of her husband, the Chief Manager, to say how grateful he was to Lady Macleay for her kindness in consenting to lay the foundation-stone.

With the trowel Lady Macleay then pronounced the stone "well and truly laid."

BRITISH COMMUNITY'S CONGRATULATIONS.

Mr. E. C. Peters, of Ewo and Chairman of the General Chamber of Commerce, said it was not difficult on an occasion like the present to find words to express the thoughts passing through the minds of the Tientsin British community to-day. The history of Tientsin was so interwoven with that of the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation, that they felt a pride equal to that of any member of the Corporation in to-day's ceremony. They saw the foundations well and truly laid, which reminded them of the pioneers of from 40 to 50 years ago, who dug deep, dug broad the foundations of British reputation and prestige. It was the great Cecil Rhodes who said "everything was too short in this world-life, fame and achievement." They envied those representatives of the old pioneers—he referred to their eminent citizens—Mr. James Stewart and Mr. J. M. Dickinson, who were there that day to see the flourishing and ever-growing city of Tientsin. They must not forget that in spite of floods, famine, plague and an occasional revolution, with all the chaos those things brought, Tientsin had never looked back. Surely this was great testimony to the wonderful recuperative powers of their Chinese friends and their great faith in the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation. The Hongkong Bank, like many others, had weathered bad times and come through those terrific gales, which periodically assail commerce, with colours flying and not a leak in her stout timbers. He liked to think of Wayfoong, however, not so much as staunch vessel, but as a wonderful lighthouse, the Eddystone, so to speak, of the China Coast. In calm weather taken for granted, but in financial storms of typhoon intensity, a source of much comfort to the weary mariner, and not less so should he have the misfortune to find himself on the rocks."

On behalf of the British community, Mr. Peters asked Mr. Johnston to accept their warmest congratulations, coupled with the hope that the Tientsin manager would still be with them when the noble edifice was completed.

In the cavity in the stone, Mr. Johnston then placed a sealed glass jar, containing local newspapers, bank-notes and coins. The playing of the National Anthem by the band of the Royal North Lancashire Regt. brought the ceremony to a close.

At the reception which followed, Mr. B. C. M. Johnston proposed the toast of the Tientsin branch, which was enthusiastically acclaimed.

Mr. Henry Edward Ranson Hunter, of Brook Street, Grosvenor Square, W., late of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, a director of Hambros Bank, the Imperial Bank of Persia, the Yangtsze Insurance Association, the Anglo-Eastern Finance Corporation, and others, left estate of the gross value of £63,161.

The special auditing commission which is to examine the accounts of the Chinese Government, is reported to have appointed nine experts to do the work and to have asked the Ministry of Finance to prepare for the examination of the books. Definite dates will be set for the examiners to do their work.

NINGPO STEAMER WRECKED

Pingyang Piled Up on Haimen Rocks During Voyage from Wenchow: No Lives Lost

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wenchow, Mar. 9.

Since last writing telegrams have been received here announcing the loss of one of the Chinese steamers which has been trading with this port from Ningpo with great regularity every week for several years.

Said to be an old gunboat, the Pingyang was the most comfortable of the three Ningpo steamers for travel. About a month ago she left Wenchow for Ningpo viâ Haimen and Chusan as usual on the Friday. A few days after, telegrams were received reporting her loss in the vicinity of Haimen, one to the effect that 200 lives were lost, another that while no lives were lost, pirates had looted her cargo.

A young Chinese told me that his brother had been among the passengers at the time of the accident, and had returned home. His report was that the vessel ran on the rocks in a fog some four or five hours out of Haimen, on the way to Ningpo, that two hours later she slid back and sank losing all cargo and baggage, but that no lives were lost as a great many small boats came and took the passengers and crew off. This is the second mishap within a short time that has happened to Ningpo steamers.

Rumour was current recently that the str. Kwangchi was to resume her sailings which had been dropped before the New Year, between Wenchow and Ningpo, she having been chartered last year from the China Merchants' S. N. Co. for the trade by another Chinese company. Friday, however, her usual day of arrival here, did not witness her arrival and it was said that she had lost $20,000 last year, that if the other Ningpo companies would reimburse her to that amount she would not give up the trade, that the Yungchuan and Yungning companies were willing, but that the Pao Hua Co. refused. There has also been a rumour that a rival steamer of the China Merchants' was to start the run between Shanghai and Wenchow, but so far no such steamer has been forthcoming.

PIONEER WENCHOW MISSIONARY.

The str. Feiching which has been laid up in Shanghai for overhauling during the past six weeks has resumed her sailings, and among her passengers will be Rev. W. R. and Mrs. Stobie, and Miss Stobie, who are returning to England by way of Canada. At the kind invitation of the Commissioner and his wife a large party of the foreign residents met at the home of the Commissioner on Tuesday evening to bid them formal bon voyage.

The Rev. A. H. Sharman, who succeeds Mr. Stobie in the Chairmanship of the Wenchow Methodist Mission, will for several mouths look after nearly 170 churches, besides superintending the rebuilding of churches destroyed in the typhoon of September, 1922. It is 27 years since Mr. Stobie and 23 years since Mrs. Stobie first arrived in Wenchow, and the former has seen the Mission increase in that time from about 90 to 270 churches, the erection of a large hospital and of a Middle School which has now enrolled 242 students under the able principalship of T. W. Chapman, M.S., whose name as an educationalist is widely known among Chinese far beyond Wenchow and its adjoining prefectures. Over quarter of a century ago that middle school existed in embryo in the house of Mr. Stobie and consisted of a few Chinese boys gathered together to learn English among whom was a diligent and bright little fellow who is now Dr. Timothy Lear of Peking.

27 YEARS AGO AND TO-DAY.

To-day the appearance of the city presents a marked contrast to 27 years ago in the widening of considerable portions of the main street, erection of very many foreign and semi-foreign buildings, mostly occupied by Chinese, the more foreign appearance of many of the shops, the kind of merchandise offered for sale in those shops, foreign tinned goods, flour, foreign clothing and foot and headwear, foreign lamps, foreign tools, the large number of shops selling clocks and watches, and many another foreign articles which 27 years ago would have been "anathematized. "Hundreds of rickshas ply on its narrow streets, the electric light makes night more pleasant to the student of Chinese, telephone wires stretch through the air in all directions. Two different lines of telegraph now connect us with the world outside, so that no longer is it true to say, as an old resident said in those far off days of one who came to Wenchow describing the difficulty of getting away again, "One coming to Wenchow is as a frog in a well." Foreign style umbrellas too and even walking sticks are numerous, though there is still a good trade done in Kittysols. A merchant, who does a business in Kittysols of about 30,000 export annually told me yesterday that thousands of Kittysols are sent to America and that about 300,000 are exported annually hence.

One of the greatest changes is to be seen in the street where I live, a change which 25 years ago it seemed impossible would come about so soon. Whereas then that little street was crowded with opium dens, to-day not one is to be found, though also opium does still find its way here and some opium smokers are still to be met with. But to one who has seen such a change as this, who has seen and known what a frightful incubus, what a dreadful curse and bondage this one habit was, and sees things now there comes inevitably the feeling of certainty that China can and that China will sooner or later and probably sooner, throw off her other weights and snap her other fatters, and rise free and strong and kindly and noble to take the place that is awaiting her in the progress of the race to its destined heights of world-wide, liberty, brotherhood and righteousness.

PEKING DAY BY DAY

Dismissal of Gen. Wang Held Up: Police Partly Paid: Tsao Jui's Birthday

Peking, Mar. 16.

To-day being the anniversary of the birthday of Mr. Tsao Jui, former Civil Governor of Chihli, Admiral Wu Yu-lin and other Cabinet Ministers, left Peking for Tientsin last night.

The men of the Metropolitan Police force, but not the officers have reached an advance of their arrears of wages amounting to three dollars each, pending payment of the arrears.

A Chihling mandate was issued yesterday approving the proposal of Mr. Cheng Keh, Minister of Interior, that Major Chang Yu-lin and his men be withdrawn from the duties of parliamentary guards and that he be replaced by Major Tang Cheng-chang. Major Tang took over his new duties this afternoon. Supporters of Mr. Wu Ching-lian oppose this action on the ground that Major Tang was appointed by the House of Representatives and that there is no occasion for this mandate being issued in confirmation of this appointment.

There seems to be difficulty in reaching a decision in Government circles as to the dismissal of Gen. Wang Yung-chuan and the appointment of Gen. Chow Yin-jen as assistant director of military affairs in Fukien. The Cabinet has drafted a mandate dismissing Gen. Wang and appointing Gen. Chow, but it is being held up between the Military Council and the Presidency.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FILIPINO'S FUNDS NOT TO BE WASTED ON MARE'S NESTS

Voluntary subscriptions to the Independence Fund, after weeks of soliciting, are under 9,000 pesos. It is generally felt that the Filipino populace are apathetic toward independence propaganda.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Younger Generation in the Grip of Modern Craze: Dancing in Every Restaurant

From Our Tokio Correspondent.

The "Miyako" has just published a cartoon of kimonoed beauties "shimmying" gaily to the wheedling of the saxophone. The paper condemns this change, but the young men and women do not pay the slightest attention to the be-spectacled editor's laments over foreign "crazes."

Jazz has come into Japan and it has come to stay. It promises to invade Japan as completely as it has done Europe. Everybody now is learning to trip it gaily on the light fantastic toe. At many restaurants there is now dancing, a gramophone doing duty in the less pretentious places and a regular orchestra in the more fashionable resorts. Proprietors of cafés and refreshment houses find that, with the added attraction of dancing, their income is gratifyingly increased. Even the geisha is learning to jazz.

At a dance at any one of the bigger hotels can be seen young diplomats, university students and young women of all classes. Jazz tunes are popular and messenger boys will ride their bicycles whistling or humming bars from "Oriental" or "Yes, we have no bananas."

Tokio took the lead in launching the dancing craze, and now Osaka, Kioto and Kobe have taken it up enthusiastically. Husbands are becoming progressive, thanks to the influence of jazz, and permit their wives to dance with friends. This is dubbed by the "Miyako" as "dangerous" and the paper then proceeds cynically to conclude that "perhaps these husbands are looking more to the pleasure of being able to dance with another man's wife."

REVOLUTION IN SOCIAL CUSTOMS.

The Japanese have now grown to accept the new dancing as an old custom—that is those Japanese who have succumbed to jazz. These laugh at the criticism hurled by the more conservative element of the population. Changes are coming in a flood, and changes that, for Japan, are almost revolutionary. Young Japanese men now whisper sweet nothings to young ladies and most frequently at dancing parties, a thing that is supposed to be anathema according to strict Japanese etiquette. Thus jazz is even tending to change the customs of the nation. It certainly has been responsible for the passing of that rigid formality which was once a commonplace of Japanese social life.

Anxious comments are heard that jazz may definitely oust the ancient classical "No" dance—a dance that is a combination of religious dances and popular tales. An attempt was made to resuscitate the old measure, but the young men and women will not have it. The call of jazz is irresistible in Japan to-day.

NATIONAL SPORTS SUPERSEDED TOO.

English Association football and American baseball, working hand in glove with tennis, golf and boat-racing will soon supersede jui-jitsu, "sumo" (wrestling) fencing, and other national sports.

For physical exercise, Japanese are readily and enthusiastically taking to the imported games of the West, while in their amusements world the cinema leads the way.

Japan's own sports differ greatly from those of the West. Japanese sports must be played single-handed. They are contests between two persons and their effect, consequently, is the creation of a sense of individual superiority—a decidedly aristocratic feeling. Outdoor sports of the West, on the contrary, are based on team work. Co-operation takes the place of individual excellence. The psychological change that the games are bound to bring about, although it cannot be clearly discerned as yet, is bound to be intensely interesting. People are remarking that the younger generation of Japanese are much more sociable, especially in the bigger cities. This is attributed this to their changing taste in games.

Japanese youngsters were taught fortitude and Spartan stoicism when learning their games, whether the game was jiu-jitsu, fencing or "sumo."

IS IT I CHANG F R THE BETTER?

To-day, they play baseball or football under the blue sky, amid laughter and cheerfulness, as against the oppressive atmosphere of jiu-jitsu or fencing within the four walls of a drab room. The result is that a feeling akin to emancipation enters into the lives of the youngsters. But if they are more, light-hearted, they are also more restless and less diligent. Two decades hence, these youngsters are bound to bring about a change in the country's business, politics and diplomacy.

YANG SEN'S TROOPS BESIEGED

Successfully Resisting Remnants of the Defeated Southern Forces at Luchow

From Our Own Correspondent.

Luchow, Sze., Feb. 21.

The annual meeting of the Canadian Methodist West China Mission, has just closed. All departments of the mission report a good year and look forward to another good one in spite of the chronic state of this province through warfare and brigandage.

The delegates from Chungking and below first attempted to come by steamer. They got within less than 100 li of Luchow, but owing to engine trouble and repeated attacks by robbers were forced to return to Chungking. They then started out by land and reached here without mishap.

The last delegates left here on Monday last and they only just got away in time, for we are now in the midst of another battle. I can hear the rattle of musketry and the whizzing of bullets as I write. The disturbers just now are the remnants of Hsiong Keh-wu's 1st. Army which were driven out of Chêngtu about two weeks ago by Yang Sen and his 2nd. Army. They are making a determined effort to get in, but Yang Chuen-fang's men are holding the city for Yang Sen, who is reported to be not far off. The battle began the day before yesterday at noon, and has been going on intermittently ever since, with the attackers across the little river and the defenders on the city walls and the hills just outside.

This morning about 3.30 we were wakened by a veritable barrage of rifle fire and some little gun fire. It recalled old memories of those early mornings in France, when suddenly at the zero hour, thousands of guns of all calibres belched forth their hell of fire and the land monsters and the death-dealers of the air moved forward to the attack, to accomplish what flesh and blood and nerve alone could not accomplish. This is but that in miniature but it is realistic enough to bring it all back.

Many stretcher cases have come into the Mission Hospital to-day, some besiegers, some defenders, and some civilians. One old lady of more than 60 years had one of her feet blown off while in bed. Another woman, a mother of four small children, was brought in, shot through the mouth. Her husband pleaded that something be done for her, but she was beyond surgical skill and she passed away shortly afterwards, another silent protest against this senseless warfare.

If the 1st Army succeed in getting into the city, they will bleed the long-suffering people once more before Yang Sen's men arrive to attack them and drive them out. One wonders when this giddy round will cease. The city has already been turned over five times during the past year, and apparently the end is not yet.

REPORTS have reached Peking, states the "Eastern Times," that Sun Mei-sung, a younger brother of the Lincheng bandit leader, has captured Tachushan (an important military stronghold) with 300 men.

PICTURESQUE SCENE IN KANSU CAPITAL

New Year Celebrated with Ancient Splendour: Myriads of Lanterns Under Full Moon

From Our Own Correspondent.

Lanchowfu, Kan., Feb. 27.

The New Year festivities were celebrated in Lanchow with a splendour unknown for 15 years. During the time of the Republic, the streets were not canopied, and the city lanterns not used. But Lanchow is rich once more, and its rulers are rich—with the ill-gotten opium gains to gloat over. So this year Governor Luh gave orders that the full glory of ancient days should be restored.

The merchants (out of whose pockets the funds must largely come) replied that in the face of much existing poverty, when hundreds attend the daily soup-kitchens, and many do not know how to make ends meet, it would be better to devote the money involved to charitable purposes. Also that the old-time lanterns were worn out from disuse and so forth. The Governor there upon lent them (mark the word — lent them) Tls. 10,000, so that they might purchase the cloth, prepare the lanterns, and make ready for the "15th." The merchants, unable to get out of it, made the requisite preparations. And the lanterns were lit, and the crowds admired, for several consecutive nights. The moon was about its full, hanging as a beautiful white lantern above the eastern sky. Even the astronomers of China had kindly arranged, it would appear, to prevent any dimming of the moon's brightness on the night of the "15th." The "15th" should of course be full moon. But the full moon was really February 20, and an eclipse was due that night. So the day before or February 19, was called full moon, or the "15th," and all that night long the moon shone with undiminished splendour. I suppose our people thought it was a lucky omen, to have no eclipse that night. But to my thinking there is something sad and portentous, in a sham joy, a happiness based on a lie. Is that what is coming over the great land of China?

HEAVIER OPIUM CONSUMPTION.

Opium is to be grown again throughout the parts of this province not under Ma Chi's rule this year. Prices, already high, are threatening to soar still higher. The rich grow richer, the poor are still poorer. The number enslaved by opium steadily increases. In many homes, opium is given to the guest much as afternoon tea is served with us. Lethargy among the wage earners, the farmers and merchants, is more pronounced than ever. Opium increases the cunning of those addicted to the drug but decreases their physical power, and his activities. The Moslems for the most part keep free of opium, growing ever more powerful, richer, more numerous. The Chinese at all these points are losing. What will be the end of it all?

THE CHINESE TRADEMARK LAW

United Protest to Consular Body by All the Foreign Chambers of Commerce in Shanghai: Obnoxious Points in Law Tellingly Exposed

The following letter addressed by all the Chambers of Commerce of Shanghai to the Consular Body has been sent to us for publication. It sets out most tellingly the objections to the Chinese Trademark Law, the most obnoxious features of which are appended.

Mar. 7, 1924.

Sir,—The Chambers whose names appear at the foot of this letter, being apprehensive of the consequences likely to ensue from a recognition of the proposed Chinese Trademark Law in its present form, desire to lay before you and your colleagues on the Consular Body, the following considerations regarding the law.

Their main cause of anxiety is not merely the fact that the Law makes no provision for foreign participation in the administration of the Bureau but the further fact that, in case of dispute with the Bureau as to whether a trademark is registrable or not, articles 29 to 36 provide only for appeal to purely Chinese bodies, namely, in the first instance to three trademark judges, who are to be appointed by the Bureau, next to the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce and finally to the Administrative Court.

The articles in question are enclosed as an appendix to this letter.

PURELY CHINESE BODIES.

In asking the Consular Body to invite the attention of the Doyen of the Diplomatic Body to them we would ask you at the same time to lay before him the following considerations:—

1. In the event of dispute with the Bureau these articles preclude diplomatic assistance being given to foreign trademark owners until they have exhausted the remedies provided, that is to say until after the question in dispute has been before three purely Chinese bodies, the last of which is the Administrative Court in which the appellant is "to bring an action in conformity with the rules of law," whereafter it is expressly laid down in article 35 that "a decision having been given no person whosoever shall be permitted to ask for another hearing on the same facts and evidence." Diplomatic representations, necessarily stayed until the resources of the law have been exhausted, will then have to encounter the difficulty presented by this very categorical closure of the case.

2. Whereas in European, American and Japanese Law, appeal from the registrar of trademarks may be made to a Court of Justice, under the proposed Chinese Law no provision is made for appeal to any court of justice as that term is ordinarily understood. Thus the all-important quotation as to whether a mark is registrable or not, on which the right to use it will depend, is to be decided not by judges in our sense of the term but by bureaucrats. China has undertaken to protect foreign marks, yet the machinery which she is providing for their protection is in this respect greatly inferior to the protection which trademark owners enjoy in Europe, America and Japan.

A DANGEROUS LIMITATION.

3. It follows that when cases of infringement arise the scope of inquiry of Chinese Courts will be restricted to ascertaining whether or not a mark has been registered. Thus, while a foreign trademark owner, finding the sale of his goods is being interfered with by the appearance on the market of a mark similar to his own, will be able to bring an action against the owner of the infringing mark, he will not be able to get assistance from the Court if the defendant is able to prove registration. The foreigner's safeguard, it may be contended, lies in watching the advertisement of marks before they are registered. On the other hand the value of the safeguard will depend upon the efficient administration of the Bureau, which, as the law at present stands, is to be officered entirely by Chinese who can lay claim to no experience whatsoever in the registration of trademarks. In this connexion we would draw attention to the fact that the Trademark Gazette published by the Ministry of Commerce is published entirely in Chinese, a fact which increases the difficulty of watching advertisements.

DIFFERENCE IN TRANSLATION.

4. We desire also to draw attention to article 43. There is a discrepancy of considerable importance between the Chinese official translation of this article and the translation of it made by the British and American Legations. According to the former the judicial procedure provided by existing treaties is to come into force only when one of the criminal offences specified in articles 39—42 has been committed by foreigners. According to the latter it is to come into force whenever foreigners are concerned either as prosecutors or defendants in criminal proceedings. The legal remedy which foreigners will have when they are plaintiffs in civil actions against Chinese for infringement, or when Chinese commit any of the criminal offences mentioned in articles 39 to 42 is not in any way defined. This point appears to our Chambers to be of vital importance. The Law as it stands is open to the interpretation that foreigners, when plaintiffs in cases of infringement of foreign marks by Chinese, or in cases where Chinese commit any of the criminal offences mentioned in articles 39 to 42, can only have recourse to purely Chinese Courts, i.e. where there is no foreign representation.

EXTRATERRITORIAL RIGHTS.

5. It must also be observed that disputes with the Bureau regarding registration are likely in practice to turn on questions of precisely the same character as those which arise in cases of infringement, questions, for example, regarding priority of registration, priority of user, similarity of marks, and the nature of the business in which the marks concerned are employed. In cases of infringement all such questions are, at the present time, tried either in extraterritorial courts, or in the Shanghai Mixed Court or in Chinese Courts in which foreigners have a treaty right to be represented. Whatever the correct interpretation of article 43 may be, there is grave objection to the exercise of powers analogous to judicial powers by the Bureau, the three trademark judges, the Ministry of Commerce or the Administrative Court, none of which are properly speaking judicial bodies. The exercise of such powers by them, especially if foreign representation is excluded, will in our opinion constitute a modification of extraterritorial rights both in principle and practice.

NO GAIN FOR THE SACRIFICE.

6. We are unable to see what compensating advantages foreign trademark owners will obtain for the very serious sacrifices which the preceding paragraphs disclose. It is true that the new law supplies a code in a department of Chinese life where before there was none, but in the present disturbed state of China there seems to be very little reason for supposing that the new code will meet with readier observance than other laws promulgated by the Central Government.

7. A remedy for the objections detailed above appears to us to be essential if the rights and interests of foreign trademark owners are to be safeguarded. We submit as a legitimate and practical proposal that the suggested foreign assistance should include the same participation in the settlement of disputes regarding registration as is at present provided for in all other cases of disputes between foreigners and Chinese.

MODIFICATION INDISPENSABLE.

We earnestly request that representations be made by your Colleagues to the Diplomatic Body to use every possible endeavour to ensure that the rights and property of foreigners are not jeopardized by the recognition or acceptance of the new Trademark Law, without such modifications as will provide for adequate foreign representation in the Trademark Bureau, and on every Tribunal which may be called upon to give any decision affecting foreign interests in connexion with Trademarks.

The term Tribunal as used above includes

(a) the Courts which will try cases of infringement.

(b) the bodies which are to deal with disputes incident to registration.

There are many other serious objections to the Act in its present form, but foreign representation as indicated above is in our opinion vital if property worth many millions of taels is to receive adequate protection.

Peking's Reply to Diplomatic Body's Note: Vague and Unsatisfactory

Peking, Mar. 20.

The Chinese Government yesterday afternoon replied to the Diplomatic Body's Note regarding the Trade Mark Law. The Givernment agrees to extension of the period for registration till June next year instead of six months after recognition of the Law, complies with the Ministers' request for phblication of an English supplement of the Trade Marks Gazette, and says that foreign expert assistance may be employed when necessary.

The Diplomatic Body have not yet considered the reply, but it is not anticipated that these vague assurances will be found satisfactory.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OUTPORT PRIDE

There is a parable told of a man who had a horror of dying at Wuhu, which illustrates the pride and jealousy of outports.

A Chungking resident was on his way back from Shanghai and falling mortally sick had to be landed, to his intense chagrin at Wuhu, of all places! Before he died he begged the doctor not to put on his tombstone the bald statement "Died at Wuhu" but to add the words "on his way to Chungking" so that posterity might think better of him than to suppose it was anything but a mere accident that his bones came to lie in such a spot.

The doctor promised, but when the tombstone was ready, local pride caused his gorge to rise and the epitaph he carved was this "Died on his way to Chungking. The prospect killed him."

Chungking's pride was sorely wounded when they heard of this outrage. They sent and caused the following additional words to be carved "To him who dies in this place, oh Death! where is thy sting?"

The battle between the outports was now joined. Wuhu countered with "He took a short cut" carved below their first inscription, Chungking took the sting out of Wuhu's insinuation by adding "Heaven was his home."

The controversy vexed fast and furious. Wuhu continued, "He did not belong to us." Chungking replied, "He was glad to go," and again Wuhu "His work here was finished;" and again Chungking, "He had rather be a doorkeeper in the House of the Lord."

The tombstones of outports are very large. There is no end to this parable.

JAPAN AND SOVIET RUSSIA

Negotiations Again Delayed Owing to Soviet's Anti-Japanese Measures

Peking, March 11.

M. Karakhan visited the Japanese Minister again yesterday and the questions that have recently arisen between Japan and Russia were discussed. No appreciable progress was made.

Tokio, Mar. 14.

To-day's meeting of the Cabinet decided to instruct Mr. Yoshizawa, the Minister at Peking, to insist on a settlement of the recent issues in Vladivostok before the question of formal negotiations with Russia can be taken up.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Mar. 17.

The Japanese Minister, Mr. Yoshizawa, called on the Soviet envoy, M. Karakhan, on Saturday following instructions from Tokio to endeavour to reach a settlement in regard to the questions which have recently arisen between Japan and Russia, the settlement of which, it is understood, must precede any discussions relating to recognition of the Soviet Government by Japan.

At a previous meeting, M. Karakhan had expressed the opinion regarding the arrests of Japanese at Vladivostok that Japanese naval and military officers could not be recognized as officials as they were in Russian territory only to study the language, but he was prepared to recommend the release of the Vice-Consul and of the two Consular interpreters who were engaged on official duty.

On Saturday Mr. Yoshizawa asked for the release of all the arrested Japanese and M. Karakhan promised to telegraph to Moscow recommending the immediate release of the Consular officials at least.

The direct result of the recent Russian activities in connexion with the Japanese has thus been to set back informal negotiations which might otherwise have already led to an understanding on which formal negotiations could have been started.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Vladivostok Japanese Released

Tokio, Mar. 18.

A special telegram to the "Asahi" from Vladivostok reports that Captain Matsui and the other Japanese arrested by the Russian authorities have been released owing to insufficiency of evidence, but it is expected that they will all be deported.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN AND THE RUSSIAN FISHERIES

Reported Agreement

Tokio, Mar. 18.

It is reported from Vladivostok that an agreement has been reached by Russian and Japanese unofficial fishery representatives, the latter agreeing to pay immediately Y. 500,000 of the Y. 1,750,000 outstanding, the balance to be remitted in three annual instalments. The Russians agree to reduce the percentage of increase on future leases of the fishing grounds.

This indicates that the differences between Russia and Japan in this and other questions are gradually being smoothed out.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PHILIPPINES FORTIFIED ZONE

Manila, March 14.

The Tsudushima Maru has been fined 200 pesos for approaching too close to the Corregidor.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

The "Journal of Commerce" reports that as the result of a gambling party (a struggle for the gambling taxes?) an armed conflict took place between the Hunan and Yunnan troops in Canton. Many casualties are reported and martial law has been declared.

"THE SLOW AND PAINFUL PROCESS"

Bandit Cut to Pieces by Soldiers: Fresh Outlawry in N. Kiangsu

From Our Own Correspondent.

Suchien, N. Ku., March 12.

A week or two ago, fresh soldiers were brought to the city and every day detachments are out in the country fighting bandits. These brigands do not give in easily; and daily wounded soldiers are being brought into the Mission Hospital.

Last Sunday two men were brought some 20 odd miles, on a wheelbarrow, badly wounded. While the doctor was attending to the one that seemed more serious, the other died, evidently from internal injuries. Yesterday the people of a village about six miles from here left their homes and came into Suchien to escape from the bandits.

One of them, who had been caught with 80 guns in his possession, was heavily manacled and led through the streets by a band of soldiers before he was killed. He had been so beaten, to make him confess, that the man could hardly walk. Arriving at the place where he was to die, it seems the soldiers literally cut him to pieces. The report is, they first cut off his ears, then his arms, and legs and finally cut out his heart. Some of the "wiser heads," to quote the Chinese phrase, say the bandits will be revenged.

ELEVEN EXECUTIONS.

To-day other 11 were killed. As there was no firing heard to-day, one does not know how they met their death. In the country not far from here the soldiers surrounded the bandits and set fire to the house they were in, sending back into the flames, any who tried to escape. The cruelty both of soldiers and bandits is appalling. I saw the wife of a soldier drying quite a number of garments on the city wall, that her husband had taken off wounded or dead brigands. Last week end, four men were caught right in our midst. One of them had been seen with the end of his revolver peeping out from under his coat. These men confessed to having abducted a little boy who was taken out of his bed not far from the big street. They say the child is dead, evidently from exposure. These things make every one close his house doors very early. Our city soldiers are very much on the alert. In the towers which guard the big street, the soldiers stand by their posts with cannon ready.

Only to-night I heard of a man living quite near who is demented after his ordeal in bandit hands. He is a representative of one of the richest homes in Suchien. The bandits attacked his home in the country. If he goes out at all, it is at night attended by one or two followers, and he spends his days amusing himself striking matches!

CANAL DEEPENED.

The canal bed is being dredged by squads of men, but the work is going on very slowly. It is being deepened some three feet but as the canal here is broad, it will take a considerable time to finish.

RUSSIAN CIGARETTES

An Important Harbin Industry

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Mar. 8.

Harbin is steadily growing in its industrial undertakings, and undoubtedly must become the Chicago of Manchuria thanks to its excellent geographical position. Among other undertakings that is having the serious attention of those who are directly interested in the future of this vast territory must be mentioned the tobacco factories. The Kirin tobacco leaf has long been famous throughout China, so that it is but natural that modern plants have been put up in order to supply the great demand for cigarettes.

But this is not all. Thanks to the large Russian population in the Railway Area and the close vicinity of the Russian frontier, there is a big local demand for Russian cigarettes which are likewise finding approval among other foreigners and Chinese alike. The well-known firm of Choorin & Co., the universal providers of the Russian Far East and who have been established at Harbin ever since the C.E.R. was inaugurated, have now a model factory in operation which is specializing the manufacture of Russian cigarettes of the highest quality. One of the principal partners of this firm has recently returned from Soviet Russia, where he made arrangements for the shipping to Harbin of Crimean leaf grown from Turkish plants and famous for its excellence of quality. Notwithstanding the short time the factory has been in operation it already has made a name for itself, receiving the only gold medal reward at the recent exhibition of Manchurian products held at Harbin under the auspices of the Manchurian Research Society of which Dr. C. C. Wong, the president of the C.E.R., is the head, it being largely on account of his initiative that this Society was founded.

Thanks to the excellence of these Russian cigarettes, which according to experts compare favourably with the old established Russian tobacco manufacturers, Messaksoudi, Gabai and Vostandjoglo, Choorin's products are now being exported in ever increasing quantities into Eastern Siberia and even into China, where the demand for Russian cigarettes is becoming greater every year.

HOLIDAYS IN MANCHURIA

Little-known Resorts on the C.E.R.: Good Scenery and Gay Nights

From Our Own Correspondent.

Ertzintzansku, two hours from Harbin by rail, combines the attractions of a Continental seaside resort with the advantages of a spa. Situated in magnificant scenery it is certainly an ideal place for summer holidays; if its name could be changed it deserves to be one of the best known holiday centres for residents in northern China.

There is an up-to-date hotel, the charges at which are reasonable, situated in its own extensive grounds where are facilities for tennis, croquet and boating, on an artificial lake, in which people can bathe. The establishment may really be termed a sanatorium. It has its own doctor, whom people visit to drink the waters here which have been found efficacious for all kinds of stomach trouble. At the bathing place on the lake there are hot and cold douches, and at the hotel, under the supervision of the resident doctor, people take the waters inwardly as at the famous European spas.

Food is prepared under the supervision of a former chief of a famous Petrograd restaurant. There is electric light, hot and cold baths, music at meals and all the comforts of a good modern hotel.

At nights the grounds are prettily illuminated. During the season concerts and other entertainments are given by artistes from Harbin in the grounds of the hotel and in its splendid dance hall.

There are several good reasons why the summer resorts recently opened along the Chinese Eastern Railway should be patronized by holidaymakers. Harbin is now only 40 hours by rail from Peking. The journey can be made in perfect comfort. A good room can be obtained at the Ertzintzansku and other hotels for $100 per month, and finally there is no chance of a dull evening, as at watering places in China and Japan, for few if any of them can boast concerts, dancing to a good orchestra and other distractions every evening.

PEITAIHO police force is being increased this year, the "North-China Mail" is informed by a resident, who adds that a big inrush of visitors is expected at Eastertide. The old picnic days of Peitaiho are fast disappearing, several new up-to-date residences having been built at this resort.

Airship Explosion Attributed to Wireless Radiation

Tokio, Mar. 20.

The sunken submarine 43 is lying horizontally on the sea-bottom with a damaged conning tower and flooded forward compartment, the occupants of which, including the commander, are believed to be dead. Communications have been established by under-water telephone with the after-compartment and reveal that two engineer officers and 16 men are still living, but are facing a horrible death by slow suffocation. Rescue work is being hurried on to enable air tubes to be introduced.

The collision occurred as the vessel was coming to the surface, causing the breaking of a joint in the conning-tower.

In connexion with the explosion of the dirigible, which is one of the Navy, it is believed in some quarters that the disaster is to be attributed to radiations from Funabashi wireless station. A message received from the craft five minutes before the explosion stated: "Antennae of Funabashi in sight. Dirigible unsteady and threatens to overturn." If this is true, the accident is regarded as unprecedented, though possible.

Sasebo, Mar. 20.

The crew of the submarine which sank yesterday morning at first answered a signal, saying "Quick! We are gasping!", but since last night there has been no answer.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE world's oldest battleship will shortly celebrate her jubilee. This is the Vasco da Gama, the pride and glory of the Portuguese navy, which was completed at Blackwall on the Thames in 1876. The Vasco has a displacement of 2,422 tons and carries a collection of Krupps and small guns. As she can be rarely coaxed from her moorings, she is usually retained as a floating battery to overawe the revolutionary-inclined citizens of Lisbon.

TRADE FIGURES FOR TSINGTAO

Shipping and Business Statistics during February: Composition of Imports and Exports

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 14.

It has been ascertained that the total tonnage of cargoes shipped to the United States during the month of February was 4,906 tons, 82 per cent. of which went forward in Japanese bottoms. The shipments consisted of 3,018 tons of peanuts, 335 tons of groundnuts, 1,509 tons of groundnut oil, 25 tons of strawbraid and 19 tons of raw hides. These shipments were taken care of by three lines as follows:—

2,029 tons by Mitsui steamers,
1,385 tons by the Admiral Line,
1,354 tons by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha.

The total tonnage of shipments made to Europe was 10,587, of which 9,057 tons consisted of peanuts, 1,478 tons of groundnuts, 30 tons of strawbraid, 12 tons of human hair and 1 ton of raw hides. In the case of shipments to Europe, Japanese vessels only carried 37 per cent. of them, the rest being taken up by non-Japanese steamers. For example 3,569 tons were shipped in five German vessels, 2,241 tons in one Danish steamer, 1,681 tons in one Japanese steamer, 1,573 tons in two Dutch steamers and 1,422 tons in one British steamer.

RAILWAY THROUGH TRAFFIC.

In order to facilitate transportation of merchandise and produce by the overland route, the Kiao-Tsi Railway Administration is now negotiating with the Tientsin-Pukow Railway Administration for a resumption of the through-traffic arrangement in existence during the German regime, but which was discontinued with the Japanese occupation. It is proposed to run the train of one railway right through the line operated by the other without resorting to the process of unloading and reloading at Lokou or Huangtachiao as up till now. The freights will be intercollectable. This arrangement if carried through will be a boon to merchants.

SHIPPING ACTIVITY.

According to a report issued by the Kiao-tsi Railway Administration covering the receipts of the railway for the month of February, there has been an increase over the previous month both in freights and passage receipts. The receipts during February aggregated $638,000, being $237,700 for passage receipts, $399,773 for freights and $517 for miscellaneous items. This represents an increase of some 50 per cent. over the same month last year.

Since the commencement of March, the daily receipts in respect of passage tickets and freights have averaged $25,000, or an average increase of 25 per cent. over the receipts for the same period last year.

According to the report now issued of the Kiaochow Customs Trimonthly returns for the second 10 days of February, 43 vessels of an aggregate of 66,817 tons entered into and 46 vessels of an aggregate of 61,918 tons cleared from the port of Tsingtao during the period. There were 21 Japanese entries of 32,807 tons, 4 British entries of 11,231 tons, 2 American entries of 8,774 tons, one Italian entry of 4,798 tons, 9 Chinese entries of 3,591 tons, [illegible] and 2 Danish entries of 548 tons. The clearances were composed of 27 Japanese steamers of 35,722 tons, 4 British steamers of 11,231 tons, one Italian steamer of 4,798 tons, one American steamer of 8,517 tons, 9 Chinese steamers of 3,599 tons, 2 Norwegian steamers of 2,542 tons and 2 Danish steamers of 548 tons.

OUR TOKIO LETTER

The Talk About Shifting the Capital: Rival Glories of Yedo and Tokio

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tokio, Mar. 3.

"Tokio shall not only reserve its position as the capital of the Empire, but shall also be restored to added prosperity."

Such was the announcement issued by the Prince Regent in September when, with Tokio or the greater part of it a heap of ashes and heart-breaking ruins, the thoughts of the people naturally formulated this question, desiring to know whether the city was to continue to be the capital of the Empire.

There was considerable talk of the capital being removed from Tokio to Kioto, and the past glories of Kioto, the ancient seat of the Government and of the Imperial Family, were brought formidably to the fore by powerful journals in Osaka and Kobe that the capital be transferred from the lowlands of Kwanto to the mountoins of Kwansai.

All speculation, however, was set aside when the message of the Prince Regent was issued, the message having coupled with it an appeal to the people to unite in aiding a better and finer Tokio to arise, phoenix-like, from the ruins of the old city.

RUMOUR AGAIN REVIVES.

The report that the capital of the Japanese Empire will be removed seems to have been revived again. An article in the London "Daily Telegraph" from the pen of Mr. Percival Langdon, the well-known correspondent of that English journal who is now in the Far East, declares that the thoughts of the authorities and of the people are veering towards shifting the country's capital most probably, to Kioto. A third serious quake, declares Mr. Langdon in effect, is all that is needed to send the institutions hurrying post-haste to the mountains of south western Japan.

I asked several influential Japanese to-day whether any such scheme was being contemplated, those with whom I spoke including officials attached to the Home Department and to the Foreign Office. Their reply, in substance, was almost a paraphrase of the announcement made in September by the Prince Regent to his subjects.

"But," I ventured to ask one, "suppose as some say a third quake should overwhelm this city and destroy it again including the Imperial Palace (a rather dangerous and almost blasphemous supposition to make) would not some change be desirable?"

The answer, almost solemn and laconic, was: "The capital will remain in Tokio. Such is the wish of the Prince Regent to whom his Majesty the Emperor has delegated authority. Such is also the wish of the people. If the palace is destroyed, it will be rebuilt again."

PEOPLE WANT TOKIO.

A Japanese journalist, who has represented some of the best papers in the Empire abroad for many years, told me that if any one seriously proposed changing the capital and the plan for removing it showed any signs of success, that man's life and those of his supporters would be in extreme danger. From conversations I have had with representatives of the various strata of life in the capital, conversations in the street, on the trams, in the parks, I am in a position to say that the people emphatically desire to see Tokio remain the capital and the city restored to even more than its former grandeur and dignity.

One of the most potent reasons for this is the sentimental chord the very mention of Tokio strikes in the sensitive Japanese breast, for it was Tokio that, as the capital of Modern Japan, saw this country emerge from a group of almost unkown islands and advance meteorically to one of the proudest poritions in the firmament of nations; it was with Tokio as the capital the Empire rejoiced that the country's voice was convincing enough to have London, Washington, Paris, Rome listen and pay attention when Tokio saw fit to talk.

CITY COUNCIL'S VIEW.

"Change the capital!" exclaimed one of the city fathers of Tokio indignantly. "Why, certainly not!"

He then reached forward to one of the little wooden boxes ranged alongside his desk and drew out a file from which he selected a paper. "This," he said, "is the message that Tokio City issued when a meeting of aldermen was called for the first time since the disaster smote us. It remains as true to-day as it was then."

The message of Tokio City, through the aldermen, to the rest of Japan reads:

"Our city has been almost destroyed and must be rebuilt in its entirety. Let us set aside the blemishes of the vanished Tokio, profit from the stern lessons we have learnt and rebuild a new Tokio, with wide avenues and safe houses, abundantly provided with the essentials of a modern city, with no more fire-trap alleys and side-streets, a city that should be worthy of being the capital of the Empire."

FOREIGNERS AGAINST CHANGE.

Foreigners generally do not favour the shifting of the capital—not that their opinion will carry very much weight if the Japanese authorities think the change ought to be made.

The British Embassy has already commenced permanent reconstruction of its brick and stone buildings, which occupy one of the prettiest and most picturesque portions of Tokio. While the fire did not wreak much havoc at the official residence of the representative of his Britannic Majesty in Tokio, the buildings were badly battered.

The French are planning a fine structure too—on the same site.

The Russian Embassy has been knocked about a bit, but was in a section of the city where the fires did not reach. No repair work has been taken in hand as yet, but this, so say many, will soon be done, for it is expected that before the end of this year a Bolshevik envoy and his retinue will be housed in this old Tzarist pile of buildings and the Red Flag will fly from the mast-head where, even to-day, without a representative, the Monarchist emblem of Imperial Russia flutters in the breeze.

RECONSTRUCTION WELL UNDER WAY.

On no hand are there signs of people hesitating to rebuild in Tokio for fear that the capital may be transferred elsewhere. The business centre, Marnouchi, which has some of the tallest buildings in the city, several of which were only partially damaged, has practically repaired all these and business is humming. New skyscrapers are being erected; half-completed ones are being hastened to completion to be ready for the prosperity everyone believes Tokio will enjoy within a decade.

JAPANESE SHIPPING

Seriously Threatened by American Preferential Tariff: Reprisals Discussed

Tokio, Mar. 20.

Execution of Article 28 of the American Shipping Law giving preferental railway rates on cargo carried to or from America by American vessels is regarded as seriously damaging to Japanese shipping in the Pacific.

The Japanese Ambassador at Washington has been instructed to protest on the ground that this Article violates Articles 1 and 6 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of 1911.

In some quarters enforcing of the Law is considered impracticable in view of existing contracts.

It is understood that the question of reprisals is being discussed should satisfaction not be obtainable by diplomatic means.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

LOYANG'S IMMENSE INFLUENCE

Sweeping Changes in High Official Posts: Honan's Civil Government

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kaifeng, Ho., Mar. 13.

Mr. Li, the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs here, whose transference to Loyang was mentioned in my last letter, has now departed. The Bureau is to follow shortly, after which the Commissioner will be represented by two "advisers" in the old Honan Waichiaopu.

The Chinese press reports the coming of a new Commissioner to take charge of the provincial Department of Finance. Mr. Liu Tsi-ching, who at present holds this office, is said to be on the point of taking up "a very important appointment"—nothing less than that of Civil Governor of the province. The question naturally will be asked, What will become of the present Civil Governor, Mr. Li Chi-cheng? It will be remembered that he has been holding office but a short time, was formerly Marshal Wu's chief-of-staff and that previous to his appointment as Civil Governor, he was sent to Kaifeng as Tupan in order that the Marshal might more effectively control affairs here. The assumption is that Mr. Li is to be transferred to Kiangsi as Tuli of that province. This step by step, say the political wiseacres, the Marshal is increasing his power.

THE NEW FINANCE COMMISSIONER.

The new Commissioner of Finance is a Mr. Chow, who at present is acting Chief Officer in Marshal Wu's commissariat department. Having had this training in providing the forces under the Marshal with all things needful, he will no doubt be well qualified to turn as much as possible of the provincial revenues into the military coffers. Of his immediate predecessor, Mr. Liu, it is said that he had a similar training in the army supply department, and for that very reason Wu Pei-fu had found him a thoroughly desirable Financial Commissioner.

When the present Tuli came to Honan, he was Commander of the 24th Division, which rank he no longer holds. Another of the Marshal's close, personal attendants is given this command, "as a reward for the death of Lao Yang-jen, and the dispersion of the brigands in western Honan." It is a reward for that meritorious action, no doubt, and incidentally it robs the Tuli of Honan of his greatest power, and adds that much to the immediate following of the Marshal.

MARSHALL WU OFFERED VICE-PRESIDENCY?

You had the news that Gen. Chang Shou-tseng, ex-Premier of China has been recently a guest at Loyang. From Loyang the ex-Premier came to Kaifeng and was the Tuli's guest for several days. There is a conviction here that Gen. Chang went to Loyang to make the Marshal a definite offer of the vice-Presidency.

Marshal Wu played coy with these advances, rejoining, so it is asserted that, "He would rather be deified in the temple of Kuan Yu, than follow in the train of the civil sage." This may be, but the opinion is firmly rooted in the minds of those who have had the opportunity of being close to him, that the Marshal is so trimming his sails in these days of comparative calm that he may sail triumphantly into the port of highest power when a storm eventutlly comes up.

At a military conference held in Canton under the chairmanship of Dr. Sun Yat-sen several days ago it was decided (1) to order several military commanders to start out on the expedition against the north; (2) to appoint several overseas Chinese to collect funds for the expedition; (3) to send several gunboats to aid Gen. Chuang Tsz-ping, Commissioner of Defence at Amoy, in an attack on Swatow; and (4) to urge the Diplomatic Corps to refrain from supplying Peking with money, arms or ammunition.—"Sinwanpao."

THE STEREOSCOPE IN PHOTOGRAPHY

Interesting Lecture on a Most, Fascinating Subject by Mr. G. Hummel

The fascinating subject of stereoscopic photography was presented to the Photographic Society in the Union Church Hall on Wednesday by Mr. Gerald Hummel.

In introducing the subject Mr. Hummel said that the meaning of "stereoscopic" was practically "solid vision." This meant that in a photograph the eye saw objects standing out in their true natural relief. In the early sixties this form of photography excited universal attention, and at the Photographic Exhibition held in 1862 it was the most popular form of souvenir. Then, however, interest in it seemed to wane, and the reason for this was probably to be found in the fact that while stereoscopic photography was simple and easy to understand it required great care in each of the operations connected with it, and this had probably not been given it. In recent years, however, interest had again revived, especially among amateurs, and as proof of this renewed popularity he pointed to the great number of patents which had been taken out for stereoscopic appliances.

A REFERENCE TO EUCLID.

Dealing with what was usually spoken of as the least interesting part of stereoscopic work, which was comprised in the theory of binocular vision, Mr. Hummel referred his hearers to the work of Euclid. Two thousand years ago Euclid studied and wrote on binocular vision, though naturally he knew nothing of photography with a binocular camera. He, however, demonstrated the fact that each eye saw differently when looking at an object, and that it was by the union of these dissimilar pictures that the eyes saw the object as a whole standing out as in nature. This was what stereoscopic photography aimed at.

This could not be accomplished by the ordinary single-lens camera taking one object only, for all objects were thus presented on one plane only. As it were the camera was looking with only one eye. As in the case of the eyes the camera had to have the means of taking two pictures about the same distance apart as the eyes and then there must be a means of superimposing them. This was achieved by the use of the stereoscopic camera and the stereoscope.

While Mr. Hummel recommended the use of a two-lens camera for steroscopic work, he mentioned that good pictures might be taken of absolutely still objects with an ordinary single-lens camera. The best method, of course, was when the two pictures were taken at exactly the same moment, and while this was the only method by which instantaneous work could be done it had the advantage in ensuring that the two exposures were taken by exactly the same light.

Dealing with the subject of the distance between the two lenses Mr. Hummel thought that the best method was to have an adjustable front so that the separation could be regulated to suit the object being photographed. Half an inch in the separation would make all the difference between naturalness or exaggeration of relief.

THE CHOICE OF SUBJECTS.

In reference to the choice of subjects Mr. Hummel mentioned that provided his technique was good, the success of a photographer depended upon his artistic ability, training, or capacity to select or arrange his subjects. The most suitable and effective subjects were those in which immediate foreground, middle distance and extreme distance were found, the most important of these being the first. There must be something in the foreground to give the requisite relief. Nothing made better or more effective slides than avenues, country lanes, suitable interiors colonnades and places where objects stood out in relief 10 or 12 feet away from the camera. Water made a good foreground especially if there was something floating on the surface, such as leaves or water lilies. Portraiture and still life studies were among the most successful branches of stereoscopic work.

Mr. Hummel illustrated a lecture of great interest by showing a number of stereoscopic slides.

THE AERODROME AT LUNGHUA

Departure of Machines for Hangchow

Important developments are understood to have taken place in the local aerial situation within the past few days. Recently the aerodrome at Lunghua housed at least 20 aeroplanes—probably more—and a number were being flown with a certain amount of regularity. Now, it is understood, all except a very few have gone, and it is understood that they are at Hangchow.

This means that the centre of local aerial activity will for the future be at Hangchow. It is understood that the space available for landing, etc., at Lunghua, cramped the activities of the Chinese air force from the point of view of training, as there was always the danger of a machine on landing running into another machine on the ground. It is believed that a great deal more space is available at Hangchow and that accordingly the force hopes to make more rapid progress there with its instructional work.

WITH reference to the round-the-world flight by United States Army aviators, we understand that the flying men are due to arrive in Shanghai on May 1. They left Chicago on the 18th instant for Los Angeles, the first stop.

THE nominations to the Tientsin British Municipal Council for the ensuing year correspond with the number of vacancies, so there will be no contest. The British Concession, therefore, retains the services of Col. P. C. Young, Messrs. E. W. Carter, K. H. Chun, W. M. Howell, H. A. Lucker, E. C. Peters and A. E. WEDDINGS

Miller-Chapman

The wedding of Miss Margery W. Chapman and of Mr. Herbert Frederick Miller of Griffith John College, Hankow, was celebrated in the Holy Trinity Cathdral on Saturday morning. The Very Rev. Dean Symons officiated.

The bride, who looked charming in a simple white satin gown, carrying a bouquet of white carnations, was given away by Mr. O. P. R. Beynon, while Miss Joan Huggett, of Shantung Road Hospital, acted as bridesmaid and little Miss Joan Berry as flower girl. The latter was dressed in white silk and carried a basket of violets and pink roses.

Dr. Austin performed the duties of best man.

Following the ceremony a small reception was held for the immediate friends of the family at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Beynon, 3 Shantung Road.

Mr. and Mrs. Miller will make their future home in Hankow.

Buijs-Bell

The wedding of Miss Ellen Edith Bell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Bell, of Roseville, Sydney, and of Mr. Nicoles Buijs, of the Merchant Service, son of the late Mr. Buijs of Holland, was celebrated on the 13th instant at St. Andrew's Church following the civil ceremony at H. B. M. Consulate-General before Mr. Sidney Barton, Consul-General. The Rev. T. W. Hall officiated.

Miss Bell, who was given away by Mr. S. Kemp, a friend of the bridegroom, wore a charming dress of cream satin crepe which was daintily trimmed and carried a bouquet of white carnations and fresias.

Mr. A. Horne, friend of the bride, acted as best man. After the ceremony a reception was held at Shepherd's Hotel, where intimate friends, of both bride and bridegroom assembled.

Abily-de Liniewska

A very pretty wedding took place on Saturday morning in St. Joseph's Church, which was exquisitely decorated for the occasion, when Mlle. Emilie de Liniewska, the youngest daughter of Col. and Mme. W. de Liniewska, was married to M. Germain Abily, son of M. and Mme. G. Abily, formerly agent of the Messageries Maritimes in Japan. The Reverend Father Maumus, S.J., officiated.

The bride, who was given away by M. M. Darre, wore a handsome gown of white French charmeuse and lace, with white roses and lilies of the valley. The long embroidered lace veil was held in place by a coronet of white roses. The bridemaids, Mlles. Mireille, Xavière and Josette de Boissezon, wore exquisite white taffetas and carried baskets of pale rose carnations. In the absence of the bridegroom's mother, Mme. A. Fabre accompanied him to the altar. Witnesses for the bride were Messrs. J. Beudin and Ch. de Boissezon, those for the bridegroom being Messrs. H. de Boissezon and J. Donné.

A very pleasant reception was held at the residence of M. and Mme. Darre, 53 Rue Molière, which was attended by a large gathering of friends.

The civil ceremony took place on the previous day at the French Consulate, and was performed by Monsieur A. Wilden, Consul-General for France.

THE engagement of Miss Faith Chang, second daughter of the late Mr. Y. C. Chang, formerly of Shanghai Shantung Road Hospital, to Mr. Hugh Pao of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co. (comprador's staff) was announced last Saturday at the residence of Mr. E. S. Ling, among the lady's relatives and intimate friends. Miss Chang is connected with the Beulah Academy on North Szechuen Road.

THE str. Callandria arrived in Shanghai on Tuesday after a voyage of 42 days across the Pacific Ocean from Vancouver, B. C. Very bad weather was experienced shortly after leaving port and the heavily laden vessel, with 8,550 tons of wheat in the holds, was practically at the mercy of the winds and seas. Then to add to her difficulties she was at first unable to get coal in Honolulu, for the usual merchant supply had been taken up by the large number of vessels which had just visited the port. Special cables to the Naval Department in Washington resulted in permission to bunker with navy coal and she proceeded to Shanghai.

CHINA'S WEAKNESS IN AN ANCIENT DAY

Dr. Ferguson on the Southern Migration of the Sung Dynasty

The troubles times of the Sung Dynasty formed the subject of a fascinating historical sketch by Dr. J. C. Ferguson, before members of the Royal Asiatic Society on Wednesday. The lecture was well attended and was followed with the closest interest.

Dr. Ferguson's theme was the causes which brought about removal of the Sung Dynsaty from Kaifeng in Honan province to Hangchow and he first pointed out that the period covered by the reigns of Che Tsung, Hui Tsung and Ch'in Tsung must be considered as one epoch. It was during this time that the waning fortunes of the Sung Emperors came to a climax, and the immediate cause of their decline was the controversy which grew up around the political theories of Wang An-shih (A. D. 1021-1086). Fierce discussion was engendered by Wang's revolutionary theories on private property, the relation of the citizen to the State, and public taxation, the methods he recommended being that the State could conscript labour, call upon the citizens to bear arms and compel a socialistic form of taxation. These political theories had been made necessary in order to provide funds to maintain the extravagance of the Court and to make possible the military expoditions against the Tartars who were pressing him from the north, and they were opposed by the Conservative party under the leadership of Ssu-ma, Kuang Ch'eng I, Su Shih and Liu Chih.

CORRUPT AND LICENTIOUS COURT.

The southern migration of the Sungs was thus brought about, its primary cause being the weakness and incapacity of the Emperors, coupled with constant submission to flattery and deceit by their couriers, such as T'ung Kuan and Ch'in Kuei. These rascals pandered to the expensive tastes and vicious habits of the Emperors. They also interfered with the succession, and in several instances younger brothers were placed upon the throne in defiance of the legitimate heir.

Although the Sung Emperors favoured art and literature and extended their patronage to artists and learned men, there was but slight restraint upon their own personal caprices or those of the Court, and the Government was constantly pressed for funds in order to satisfy the whims of Imperial favourites. Meanwhile, the Tartars frequently sent bands to ravage the cities on the Northern frontier and finally combined in an expedition against Kaifeng, in which the young Emperor Ch'in Tsung and his father Hui Tsung were captured and taken into captivity in Manchuria in 1127. One of the Princes, K'ang Wang, who was visiting Nanking at the time and who is known in history as Kao Tsung, was proclaimed Emperor and finally, after many years of wandering made his capital at Hangchow. These wanderings took the the new Emperor to Ch'i-chow in Shangtung, to Yangchow, Chinkiang, Changchow, Soochow, Kashing, and Ningpo before final establishment of the southern Sung Dynsasty at Hangchow in A. D. 1139. Thus it would be seen, Dr. Ferguson concluded, that the break-up of the country and its subjection to a stronger, hardier race such as that which came from the north, became inevitable.

A great crowd of Chinese assembled outside the Shang Seung Guild, Nantao, on Monday afternoon in anticipation of witnessing the execution of two members of a robber gang who attacked and wounded three or four Chinese police. Preparations for the event had been made by sand-bagging the guild house and placing a cordon of police round the square, but although the crowd waited patiently all the afternoon and well into the evening, the principal actors in the scene made no appearance. It was a disappointed crowd that went home when darkness fell.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY BALL

Brilliant Success this Year at the Carlton: The Biggest Since Pre-war Years

Shanghai Irishmen were well content on Monday with their celebration of St. Patrick's Day, it being generally agreed that the festivities in every way were on a wider and more pleasant scale than ever before. The Irishmen one met coming away from the ball in the early hours of this morning all were demanding to know, with the fervour of their race, what nationality had organized a better ball than theirs, and, having attained so high a standard, it is unlikely that the St. Patrick's Society ever will be content with anything less.

Early in the day telegraphic greetings were sent by the Society to the Irish Societies at Hankow, Tientsin and Hongkong and cordial replies later on were received. Then at noon, Mr. L. M. ff. Beytagh (the President), members of the committee and several ladies assembled at the War Memorial, on which was deposited a handsome wreath in the shape of an Irish harp, 2½ ft. high, with the inscription in gold lettering on green ribbons:—"To the glorious memory of the Allied dead, 1914-1918, from the St Patrick's Society of Shanghai."

600 GUESTS AT THE BALL.

The big event was the ball in the evening at the Carlton Café. It was one of the biggest public functions yet held there and the most ambitious event fostered by the St. Patrick's Society for several years, so the greatest credit is due to all concerned with the arrangements, for it was in every way a great success. The Municipal Council and the police assisted by allowing the suspension of the closing order for as long as was required and Mr. Louis Ladow and his assistants did everything in their power to help, for which the committee wish to tender their cordial thanks. The Carlton Café proved to be an ideal place for such an event. The floor has its limitations, but the Committee met that by a strict censorship on the list of invitations, first ensuring that none of Irish nationality missed the opportunity of attending and then finally closing the list at 600 guests, a number large enough comfortably to fill the ball room without crowding. Then the café is better equipped than the Town Hall for a big ball. The balcony the space under it and the roomy corridors afforded plenty of space for all to sit out between dances and of course the fine dining room easily could cope with the wants of such an attendance, eliminating the scrimmages which occur round the supper room entrance at the Town Hall. Last night 350 sat down to the first supper in perfect comfort and the remainder at a second sitting.

CHERRY BLOSSOM AND SHAMROCK.

In another particular the Carlton Café also relieved the Committee of much worry, for it requires very little extra decoration. Indeed, it needs practically no more than just those touches essential on such an occasion to indicate the national character of the festivities. Arched bamboo foliage adorned the front corridor and the lower hall. In the ball room the pretty cherry blossom decorations had been left standing and on the pillars in between the trees there were hung shields of the coats-or-arms of famous Irish families and the various counties. In the centre of the stage curtain there was mounted the Society's framed portrait of St. Patrick, draped with the St. Patrick's Crosses and guarded on either side by the flags of the Irish Free State and the Northern Counties, with a big Union Jack in between. The Saint had undergone renovation and with a powerful spotlight thrown on him from the balcony he looked very well. A simple but pleasing decoration on the stage was the work of Miss T. Dunne, who had spent several hours during the day hanging the orchestra's music stands with curtains of interlaced shamrock and emerald green ribbons bearing little golden harps. It was a very pretty feature. The balcony was hung with various flags. In the corridors and the dining room more of the heraldic shields were employed, but there was little other attempt at extra decoration. Over the President's chair the Union Jack and Irish flags were draped. In fixing the decorations the Committee had the able assistance of a party of naval ratings from H. M. S. Diomede, so it goes without saying that everything was arranged neatly and quietly in the shortest possible time. The corridor leading to the theatre was arranged as a bar.

OFFICIAL GUESTS.

Mr. Beytagh opened the ball at 9.30, being played around the ball room by Mr. Kieran Begdon, official piper to the Society, who was dressed in the old Irish kilt and full piper's regalia. The official guests, most of whom then had been welcomed by the President were:—

Mr. [illegible] (H. M. Consul-General) and Mrs. Barton, Sir Skinner [illegible], Farmer, Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Murray Anderson, Judge Peter Grain, Mr. W. H. Trenchard Davis (President, St. George's Society) and Mrs. Davis, Mr. C. H. Rutherford (President, St. Andrew's Society) and Mrs. Rutherford, the Consul-General for [illegible] and Mme Wilden, the Consul-General for Italy and Mme de Ross, the Consul-General for the United States and Mrs. Cunningham, Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Lobingier, Mr. Stirling Fessenden, Mr. K. J. McEuen, Col. W. F. L. Gordon, Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Vaughan and Mrs. Lavers.

"TH 'WEARIN' O' TH' GREEN."

Dancing then went on merrily for several hours and the official programme must have been nearly doubled. Excellent music was played by the Carlton orchestra and a pleasant feature was the introduction every now and again of famous old Irish airs, played to dance time, such as "St. Patrick's Day," "When Irish Eyes are Smiling," "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Killarney," "My Wild Irish Rose," "Come Back to Erin," "Tipperary," and "Th' Wearin' o' th' Green." Although the Committee had worked all the time on the idea that it should be a ball and not half a concert, they were unable to resist the introduction of just a few Irish numbers and these all proved to be very popular. Miss Dunne singing "The Meeting of the Waters" and "The Minstrel Boy," Mrs. O'Hara two Irish songs by Gough, and Mrs. Lavers playing some selections on the harp. There was also Piper Begdon again at supper time to arouse still greater enthusiasm with the bracing music of the pipes as he played the President and his party in to supper.

YE PUNCH-MIXER.

An Irish ball in Shanghai never is complete unless Mr. J. J. Sheridan attends in his particular role as official punch-mixer. This time he had the assistance of Mr. D. P. Griffith and they concocted a real Irish brew that appealed to the taste of all.

The President and Mr. T. P. Givens (hon. secretary) deserve special praise for the great success achieved, but it was not accomplished without a great deal of hard work on the part of all the members of the commitee, who divided the duties as follows:—

Master of Ceremonies: Mr. L. P. Ridgway. President's Table: Messrs. L. M. ff. Beytagh and H. P. Wilkinson. Music: Mr. J. J. Dunne and Dr. J. A. O'Driscoll. Decorations: Messrs. L. M. ff. Beytagh, J. J. Sheridan, J. F. Feely & G. L. Peet. Publicity: Messrs. L. W Hartigan and T. P. Givens. Refreshments: Messrs. J. J. Sheridan, S. W. Wolfe, J. J. Dunne & L. L. P. Ridgway. Ushers: Dr. J. A. O'Driscoll, Messrs. J. J. Murphy & E. H. Lynch. Stewards: Messrs. J. F. Feely and T. P. Givens. Punch: Messrs. D. P. Griffith & J. J. Sheridan.

Mr. Beytagh, President of St. Patrick's Society.

The Dresses: Some Bewitching Creations

As is usual at these national balls the dresses of the ladies present were handsome and original and the present vogue for bright colourings and rich materials made this occasion particularly brilliant. Mrs. L. M. ff. Beytagh, the wife of the president of the Society, received the guests in a charming gown of soft green, shimmering shot satin, cut with a round decolletage and sleeveless the skirt trimmed with deep bands of bandsome silver lace. A wide sash was knotted at the side and caught with a large pale pink chrysanthemum. Her green apera cloak from Liberty's demands special mention for its marvellous collar of Nile green and grey ostrich.

Mrs. H. P. Wilkinson, who assisted Mrs. Beytagh in receiving, wore a Parisian creation of blue and silver lamé, with silver slippers and a silver headband in the style of a Russian head-dress. Lady Pearce, in compliment to the occasion, wore a becoming gown of green georgette, cut on long, straight lines, with a band to match about her head. Lady Turner was distinguished in black velvet, cut on severely simple lines and skilfully draped at the side, the fulness caught by a jet ornament with long strings of jet beads. Her ornaments were crystals. Miss Turner was an effective contrast in a sweetly pretty white lace frock, with a silver sash and silver shoes.

Mrs. J. J. Sheridan wore a picturesque robe de style of blue shot taffeta, with a plain long-waisted bodice and an extremely bouffant skirt, shimmering with ruffles of silver lace, arranged in a panel down the front and edging the skirt. About the waist were set ermine tails and a large flower ornament completed the captivating picture.

Mrs. Murray Anderson, wife of Rear-Admiral Anderson, wore a striking gown of brown and silver brocade, cleverly draped with silver lace, and cut with a panel train. Miss Addis wore white georgette, richly embroidered with silver bugles, with a big bow at the side. Miss Fox wore a piquant red and silver brocade, cut perfectly straight and opening over a silver underskirt in front. Mrs. Brooke-Smith appeared in a handsome green and silver brocade, with the fulness drawn to the side and falling in graceful lines. Mrs. W. F. C. Gordon, wife of Colonel Gordon, wore Honiton lace artistically draped over a white satin underdress which followed the long, straight mode.

Mrs. D. P. Griffith selected a gown of gold lace over gold satin, trimmed with a chic multicoloured floral ornament. Mrs. H. Yorke Irwine presented the smart slim silhouette of the moment, in purple and silver, with which she loyally displayed the national emblem. Mrs. W. E. O'Hara wore an effective plum velvet, trimmed with silver lace and skunk fur, with a side train, and handkerchief back. Mrs. J. A. O'Driscoll wore a stylish bottle-green silk, heavily beaded. Mrs. J. J. Dunne wore black crepe de chine, modishly draped, and caught with a jet clasp, with black silk lace sleeves and a small train. Miss Dunne wore crimson, set off with cut steel beads and Miss Theresa Dunne wore a bouffant gown of green chiffon trimmed with silver lace. These represent but a few of the bewitching costumes which the evening brought out but are selected as representative bits of the picturesque ensemble.

SPANISH WAR VETERANS (SHANGHAI POST)

Charter Granted to Local Organization

That a charter will be issued to the local organization of Spanish War Veterans (American) shortly, is the information conveyed in a letter from Ralph H. Carroll, Adjutant-General of the Society, to Mr. William Van Buskirk, which he received in the last mail. The message also brought to Mr. Van Buskirk his appointment as Aide-de-camp to the staff of the Commander-in-Chief and empowers him to call the first meeting, institute camp and supervise details of organization, such as election of officers and transmitting the list of charter members to headquarters.

The movement was begun in December on the initiative of Mr. Van Buskirk, who was an active member of Lawton Egbert Post in Manila, prior to his arrival in Shanghai, where he is now Deputy U. S. Marshal. The following Shanghai men signed the application for the post:—Messrs. Whitney Essler, Charles Hannigs, Hubert S. Honigsberg, Clifford French, Dennis Carrol, Samuel L. Frost (deceased), James D. Sullivan, Chauncey P. Holcomb and Charles F. Long. There are in addition to these 33 more veterans in Shanghai known to the committee and it is urged that they all get into immediate communicaion with Mr. Van Buskirk at the American Court as well as any others newly arrived in the Orient. The fees are nominal, but G.$10 being necessary for the granting of the charter.

A special dispensation has been granted in connexion with the formation of the Shanghai Post because of the long distances involved and much of the red tape has been done away with, while a special time limit has been fixed to allow for the difficulties of communication.

Adjutant-General Carroll writes, extending his best wishes to the new Post—"Comradeship is less than than love but means a great deal more than friendship"—and urges all veterans to become associated at once.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS NEW HOME

Monday's Formal Opening Ceremony

A large and distinguished company on Monday attended the formal opening of the offices of the Yamên for Foreign Affairs, in the New West District, in Chinese territory beyond the creek at the far end of Route Ghisi. The guests were welcomed by Mr. Hsu Yuan, Special Commissioner for Foreign Affairs for Kiangsu, Gen. Ho Feng-ling, Defence Commissioner, and the staff of the Yamên. Amongst those present were all the foreign Consuls and many members of their staffs, Rear-Admiral Anderson, Mr. Stirling Fessenden (Chairman) and Mr. E. S. Benbow Rowe (acting Secretary), representing the Shanghai Municipal Council, officials of the French Municipal Council, Judge Sir Skinner Turner, Judge Peter Grain, Col. W. F. L. Gordon (Commandant of the S.V.C.), a number of foreign naval and military officers, the Very Rev. Dean C. J. F. Symons, Mr. John Prentice, Dr. D. MacGillivray, and others.

Prominent on a small dais in the room where the reception was held were a number of tablets, silver shields, cups and other gifts sent to the Commissioner, these including a tablet from the Consular Body and a silver cigarette box from Col. W. F. L. Gordon.

In welcoming the visitors, Mr. Hsu Yuan said:—It is a great pleasure for me to extend my heartiest welcome to the Consular Body, the Chinese local authorities and other foreign and Chinese friends here to day and I desire to thank you all for honouring me with your presence and also for the souvenirs you have so kindly sent on this occasion—the opening of the new offices of the Yamên for Foreign Affairs for Kiangsu.

Most of our friends, if not all, will remember that in the Ching Dynasty, the Shanghai Taotai's Yamên was situated inside the city and, in order to save our friends the irksome journey to the city in a sedan chair, a bureau, known as Yang Wu Chu, was established by the Taotai in Bubbling Well Road, where foreign visitors were received. With the advent of the Republican Government, a Special Commissioner for Foreign Affairs was appointed in the place of the former Shanghai Taotai, and the office known as Yang Wu Chu was then occupied by the Commissioner, where all matters concerning foreigners received attention. It has, however, been considered by my predecessors as a temporary office for the past 12 years.

When I was appointed Commissioner in 1920, I found there was vacant ground at the south end of the beautiful boulevard, Route Ghisi, on the other side of the Siccawei Creek which might be developed into a fine residential place. With the assistance of Gen. Ho, Magistrate Shen, and other colleagues, I have succeeded in carrying out my plan and starting this new Feng Lin Chow, linking up the French Concession, and the proper Ramên has been built up on this site. Although this new structure is not built with modern luxuries, it is a building of our own.

I am very glad to say that the Shanghai Taoyin, the Superintendent of Customs and the Deputy Salt Commissioner have also decided to build their offices in the locality. With these offices gathered together, I am sure matters can be arranged much easier. In a few years, I hope this locality will be developed to its fullest possibilities.

We hardly know which deserves most praise—the pluck of amateurs attempting such a play as "Le Vertige" or the success which crowned their endeavours. The performance was a real success and held the interest of the audience from start to finish. It is a thousand pities that it cannot be repeated. The talented amateurs responsible for such a production may be glad to hear a few criticisms which are given by a sincere admirer. A synopsis of the play was inserted in the programme for the help of those who are not quite at home with their French. We do not reproduce it here as it was only a very brief explanation of the play and did not disclose dramatic events which really had to be seen and not to be told, for to have too lengthy an explanation would have spoilt many of the fine episodes of the drama.

Natacha, the daughter of a small merchant of Kiev, met in her young days, an officer named Dimitrieff. They fell in love. He hoped to win her; she had very little hope of marrying him, well knowing that his family would do their utmost to prevent the union of their son to the daughter of a merchant. Natacha's father failed in business and old General Mihailoff, attracted by the beauty and charm of Natacha, saved the family from ruin by marrying her. The General was of a brutal and jealous disposition. He treated his young wife as a slave. When Petrov, the General's servant, informed him that Dimitrieff and his wife were meeting and intended to elope, he violently accused Dimitrieff of treachery and shot him.

When the revolution started, the General and his wife managed to save the greatest part of their fortune and went to Paris. One day Natacha, coming from the Russian Church in Rue Daru, met on the street Henri de Cassel, a nobleman of merit and means. He was immediately attracted by her beauty, followed her and got into conversation. He asked her to tea at his apartment. She accepted and to his astonishment, gave herself entirely to him. Why? He did not say. Who was she? He did not know. Her name, her condition in life, he ignored entirely. She was an absolute mystery to him. The play begins at this point, Charançon, a member of the French Foreign Office, comes to see him and learns from Cassel's confession his love for the unknown; in a very witty dialogue, the story of the lovers is unveiled to us.

On Charançon's departure, Natacha calls and Henri de Cassel presses her for an explanation. He wants to know who she is. She refuses to tell him anything, but plainly lets him see that she loves him—the next minute only to try and finish everything between them; then changes her mind again and is ready to fall in his arms. She goes into another room to arrange her hair but leaves her bag on a sofa. Henri finds it and is tempted to look inside, where he finds her visiting card. He is dumfounded to find a photograph of a Russian officer who bears a very strong resemblance to himself, so much so that Henri thinks at first that it really is a photo of himself. After Natacha leaves, Henri telephones to Charançon and tells him that at last he has discovered who she is and gives name.

In his diplomatic carrière, Charancon has met the General and his wife; wishing to help Henri to meet Natacha again, he invites the General and his wife and two lady friends, Mesdames de Jurieu and Laurens to join them at a supper at the Café de Paris after attending a performance at the theatre. The General is struck by Henri's marvellous resemblance to Dimitrieff and also perceives the emotion of his wife on meeting him, After having indulged too heavily in champagne, followed by liqueurs, the memory of the past drama takes possession of the General who confuses Dimitrieff with Henri; Mihailoff acts like a maniac. During a short fit, which renders him unconscious, Natacha takes the opportunity to tell Henri about her former love affair. The General decides to leave for Nice, hoping to separate Natacha from Henri. They have a final and dramatic meeting at Charançon's apartment and to the despair of Henri, Natacha obeys her husband's command and follows him.

Henri completely smitten with "vertige" (madness) follows the Mihailoffs to Nice with the firm purpose of winning Natacha. The two men meet at Nice in the evening at the Mihailoffs' villa.

Henri suggests a duel which the General accepts. While Henri writes down the conditions under which the duel is to be fought the General tries treacherously to kill him. Natacha having previously unloaded her husband's revolver, the latter misses Henri who kills him on the spot.

The wave of "vertige" having subsided, Henri looks upon himself with horror as being a murderer. Natacha throws herself in his arms and they both run away, looking forward to a happier life.

THE PLAYERS.

The acting was very good all through the play. Of course here and there were some small inequalities which always happen in every production, even when given by professionals. But last night, two amateurs proved that they could compete with the best of the latter; Madame Jeanne Beudin and Monsieur Marcel Lambert as Natacha and General Mihailoff. There was never a moment of defaillance in the acting of Mr. Lambert who from the beginning till the end was and remained the aristocratic brute that the author means him to be, acting with strong passion and never falling into common melodramatic fits. Madame Beudin was simply grand, and one inclines to believe that no one amongst the French amateurs, past or present, has ever achieved so high a level in dramatic art, especially in the first three acts. However, in the last act, in our opinion, she could in her final scene with Henri de Sassel, have abandoned a little of that frigidity which was otherwise so plausible in the other acts.

Mesdames Fano and Donné, who appeared only at the supper party given at the Café de Paris, were two charming light-headed Parisiennes, able to engage in the most empty chatter with charm and conviction.

Mr. Jean Schlisler and Mr. Henry Dreyfus were quite at ease in the respective parts of Henri de Cassel and Charançon. Their dialogue in the first act, brilliant and witty, was thoroughly enjoyed as every word could be heard, so fine was their delivery. Their acting, in general was very natural, although Mr. Dreyfus could at times show a shade more of animation, as even in a budding diplomat too much restraint in the delivery of his lines fathers monotony. As for Mr. Schlisler, we cannot but admire his acting in the first and especially the fourth act; but in his scenes of violence with the General, he did not always show the elegance and dignity which could be expected from the interpetration and impersonation given previously by him to the character of Henri de Cassel. In the part of Louis, Mr. R. Mazet demonstrated once more that here was no small part for a good actor; tenue, diction, acting were, with him, always what they ought to be. All the minor parts were equally well filled.

The programme does not mention the name of the stage manager; if he wishes to remain anonymous, it is our duty to respect his desire; however, it does not preclude us from congratulating him on the setting of the four acts and of the success of the play.

The scenery was in the good hands of Mr. Nabias. Any one who knows the stage of the Cercle Sportif Français is bound to recognize the efforts of the anonymous stage manager and of the scenic artist in mounting a play of the importance of "Le Vertige" on such a diminutive stage. If they will allow us a small criticism, let us state that in the beautiful Chinese style drawing room of Henri de Cassel, the absence of any ceiling mouldings, the white crudeness of a ceiling unbroken by chandelier, as well as the flatness of the window jar with the gorgeous setting of the apartment.

THE ST. GEORGE'S SOCIETY SCHOLARSHIPS

The examinations were held on Thursday for the scholarships which the St. George's Society are offering for competition by English boys and girls of Shanghai schools, within a certain age limit. The object of these scholarships is to test candidates' knowledge of English, of English literature such as boys and girls of their age might be expected to be acquainted with, of English history and their general powers of knowledge, observation, thinking and expression. The papers, of which there were four, besides a test in reading aloud, were carefully designed to defeat anything like preliminary cramming. Altogether 30 boys and girls entered from the Public Schools for Boys and Girls, the two Cathedral Schools and the two Thomas Hanbury Schools. The examination was held in the "North-China Daily News" Building, and the candidates were entertained at lunch at the Palace Hotel, by the St. George's Society when Mrs. Symons, Mr. Trenchard Davis, President of St. George's Society and Mr. O. M. Green presided. It is hoped that the results of the examination will be declared before the end of this month.

AMONG those who left port on Tuesday on the str. West Orowa was Mr. J. E. Doyle. "Dinny," as he is known to all lovers of sport and members of the American Club, will be greatly missed. He was a familiar figure at the baseball matches acting as coach or umpire, while to the Japanese "rooters" his "Mr.—san will be pitcher, etc., arragato ball," brought screams of laughter. Mr. Doyle will probably return to Shanghai before the year is out.

THE CHAPEI STRIKE

Merchants' Demand Conceded by the Authoritics

What is described as a "merchants' strike" provided a minor diversion in Chapei last Friday.

For some time past the merchants of the district have nourished ambitions in the matter of reorganizing local government, their desire being to relieve the Nanking authorities of this duty and establish an independent Municipal Council. It is understood that Nanking agreed to this, and a definite step was to have been taken towards the innovation a few days ago, but it would seem that at the last moment the authorities went back on their word.

This disappointment apparently upset would-be local councillors and a number of them and their supporters closed their shops by way of protest. Banners were displayed with inscriptions not too complimentary to the Powers that be.

If the information reported on Monday in the Chinese press is correct, the Chinese merchants of Chapei have won the day in their agitation for public control of the water and electricity services. The "strike of merchants and shopkeepers" was continued on Saturday, and the only places open to business were the refreshment houses. A mass meeting was held in the afternoon, and amongst various resolutions passed was one determining to march in a body and take possession of the waterworks and electricity station if the authorities remained firm in their determination not to hand them over Processions were held, and order was maintained by a hundred or more "special constables" who wore badges inscribed "Chapei Public Bodies' Peace Maintenance Officers."

It was publicly announced on Sunday that the Civil Governor has ordered that the demands of the merchants be acceded to, and it is understood that April 30 has been fixed as the date for handing over the two services to public control. Representatives of the merchant bodies motored round Chapei publishing the good news, and the "victory" was celebrated by displays of fireworks and other public demonstrations. A start has already been made towards raising the necessary capital for new plant for the two concerns.

We understand that the Chapei merchants, in their efforts to secure control of the Chapei Water and Electricity Works, have raised $2,000,000 capital and expect shortly to double this sum. With this money it is intended to take over the Works from the Kiangsu Provincial Government and to improve its efficiency. An important meeting of shareholders will shortly be held to discuss matters relating to "their new company." It is also stated that they propose to purchase land facing the Huangpu River for the erection of a huge water tower, 180 ft. high and weighing 26,000 tons, with a capacity of 450,000 gallons. The intake and feed pipes will be 24 in. in diameter.

Col. Lu Yung-chien, Commissioner of Shanghai and Woosung Native Constabulary, has refused to grant an application made by a number of prominent local merchants for the release of an accountant who is being detained in connexion with the terrible fire which broke out in the Silk Filature in Chapei last week. Col. Lu states that the matter must be thoroughly investigated and the guilty parties severely punished.

MALE servants at sing song girl houses have organized a trade union, whose membership will include employees of houses both in this and the French Concession. They declare that the high cost of living makes it imperative that they receive an additional $1 per month, "plus 40 cents Union fees." Having themselves gone on strike they succeeded in getting the female workers in those houses to strike in sympathy last Monday. It is understood that servants in the second class resorts are not yet actively identified with the agitation.

STEAMER SUNK IN THE HUANGPU

Latest Misfortune to Befall Former U. S. Transport Warren: Cause of Accident Unknown

Further misfortune on Thursday befell the former U. S. Transport Warren, and she now lies sunk in the Huangpu off the International Dock, on the Pootung side. The vessel was built in Germany in 1889 and first came out here as the Scandia, owned by the Hamburg-America Line. About the time of the Spanish-American War she was bought by the United States Government and until recently she was worked as a government transport between the Philippines and China. Then she was again sold and became the property of Messrs. Madrigal & Co., of Manila.

A few weeks ago the Warren arrived in Shanghai with a cargo of lumber and various troubles beset her, including a fire, and she also went ashore in an upper reach of the river. The necessary repairs were entrusted to a number of local firms and she was brought down to the International Dock, off which she was moored to await her turn to go into dry dock.

CREW OF 50 SAFELY LANDED.

About an hour after midnight on Wednesday, the wireless operator noticed that the vessel had taken on an ominous list and he promptly reported this fact to the Captain. Further examination showed that she was taking in water very rapidly, whilst she had heeled over to a dangerous angle. There was only sufficient steam in the boilers for the heating and lighting of the ship and therefore it was impossible to move her. As nothing could be done, the men on board—over 50 all told—were ordered ashore and the ship then was in such a dangerous position that they were unable to save any of their personal effects. All got safely to shore and very shortly afterwards the Warren went down.

As she now lies on the bottom she is canted over to an angle of about 45 degrees, with only the top of her smokestack and masts and a small part of her deck above water at low tide, the masts resting on the dock wharf. She is well away from the dock entrance so that work there will not be interfered with and she also is clear of the channel. Pending an examination by divers, no reason can be given for the accident.

THE STATELY HOMES OF SHANGHAI

Mr. E. S. Kadoorie's Beautiful House: An Artistic Architectural Gem: Transformation of the Jewish Club: Munificent Offer For the Assistance of Shanghai Charities

Though one must have been a resident in Shanghai for at least 15 or 20 years really to appreciate the enormous growth and changes in the Settlement, enough is happening every day for even the griffin to say, as one hears so frequently, "Shanghai is not what it was." All this development means that the Settlement now ranks with the great cities of the West in every particular and so, whereas men used to come here with the idea of making sufficient of a competence upon which to live in retirement in their own countries, nowadays many are almost forced by circumstances to recognize that Shanghai will be their home for life, or for the greater part of it. An outcome of this change has been the building of more permanent and comfortable private residences than once was the case, and it is not out of place now to refer to the "stately homes of Shanghai." Many of our commercial princes have done lasting credit to themselves by the beautiful homes they have built, surrounded by tastefully laid out estates. The houses of the late Mr. Edward Ezra, Mr. Moller, Mr. Parker, Mr. H. E. Morris and others would rank high amongst even some of the old country houses of England.

To the list of Shanghai's "stately homes" there now must be added Marble Hall, in Bubbling Well Road extension, the residence of Mr. E. S. Kadoorie, which must be regarded as the most beautiful of all, and for reasons which will be given later Shanghai will feel particularly proud of it. The original idea was that it should be a Jewish Country Club, but as the work progressed it was obvious that everything had been planned on too large a scale for the needs of that section of the community and so Mr. Kadoorie has taken the place for his own residence. The original building was designed by Messrs. Lafuente & Wootten, but this was gutted by fire and then Mr. Kadoorie commissioned Messrs. Graham-Brown & Wingrove to design the new place and they, together with Mr. G. Finocchiaro (the monumental sculptor), Messrs. Arts and Crafts, Messrs. Andersen, Meyer & Co. and others who have assisted, certainly have completed an architectural gem. It may seem a big thing to say for Shanghai, but it is probable that Hampton's or any other of the great London firms would concede that they could not do better, and this is but one more proof of the splendid work that can be accomplished in Shanghai in these times, in almost any line.

Mr. Kadoorie now has made up his mind upon another piece of princely generosity and his scheme is one that should appeal to all charitable associations. He has promised to place the whole of the house and grounds at the disposal of any charitable society, of any nationality or creed, for any worthy money-making purpose and he will pay all expenses so far as the house goes. Mr. Kadoorie will defray not only such incidentals as lighting, but says that, if any persons wish to organize a reception or a bazaar, or something of that nature, he will provide teas free, or, say, for a ball, he will give the dinner. All he asks is that it shall be a genuine effort for the good of some charity and that it shall be run on lines that will guarantee a reasonable profit. For instance, obviously it would be going too far to ask Mr Kadoorie to spend $1,000 on his side and then show a profit of $500, for he might as well give the money direct. The place is admirably suited for such purposes, with large and handsome salons, a wonderful verandah 225 ft. long, a ball room only a few square feet less than the Carlton Cafe, a kitchen capable of attending to the wants of a very large gathering, and outside, ground for six tennis courts, which are being specially laid, and other lawn games, besides a great flagged court which could be utilized for many purposes.

To describe the building itself, one can only say that it is palatial. It has been built on a lavish scale, yet at the same time it is not ostentatious. There is marble everywhere—150 tons of it altogether—but without a suggestion of vulgarity, the work having been executed with wonderful good taste, giving a most pleasing effect where it would have been so easy to overdo it. The grounds occupy nearly the entire block bounded by the Bubbling Well Road extension, Tifeng Road and Great Western Road. At the entrance are handsome iron gates with heavy brass balusters and brass enrichments in the architraves. Passing by the main east entrance to the lawns one has a magnificent view of the 300 ft. frontage. Raised several feet above the lawns, the building is a striking example of the free Renaissance style, with a suggestion of the Italian influence. It has a wide stone terrace further beautified by handsome bronze lamps, whilst sculptured sets are on their way for erection there, and then the fine glass enclosed verandah, 225 ft. long and some 30 or 40 ft. in width.

A MARBLE HALL.

At the main entrance under the porte cochere marble steps lead up to a Doric vestibule in oval form with a black and white marble floor and an alcove sheltering a beautiful marble Crouching Venus on a pedestal. Thence into the spacious main hall, which is treated in the prevailing style of Neo Grec, with a carved marble chimneypiece of refined and restrained design and marble pilasters leading up to a most effective coffered ceiling, from which are suspended extremely interesting electric fittings in the form of shallow bowls of leaded glass, elaborate chains and rams' heads ornamentation, designed and executed by Arts & Crafts.

Next one comes to the drawing room, which may lack the more striking attractions of some other parts of the house, but which really is the gem of all the rooms. Large and well proportioned, it has been handled in a masterly manner in the Adam style, the simple, tasteful beauty of which cannot fail to appeal. Square pilastered piers form bays at either end and there is a barrel ceiling with a faithful rendering on a graceful plan of the Adams's work, with all their fastidious care for detail, the centre being a panel of Cupids floating in clouds. The characteristic chimneypiece, the panelled walls surmounted with a fanciful frieze, the dainty furniture, the carpets and the hangings combine to make this room one of the most successful works of Arts & Crafts and they must be genuinely proud of it.

The Adam Drawing Room.

A MAGNIFICENT BALL ROOM.

Yet the wonderful ball room probably will appeal more to most people in this dancing city. Occupying the centre of the building, it is, as already stated, very nearly as large as the Carlton Café floor and it is only just under 50 ft. high, rising above pilastered walls and a heavily enriched cornice in double deeply panelled coves, imparting an imposing effect to a lofty and magnificant apartment, sumptuous and combining the happy freedom of the Italian Renaissance with the more severe and at present popular Neo Grec. Throughout there is perfect harmony and even the immense chimneypieces in grey, black and sienna marble, so big as easily to appear vulgar if not properly treated, under the clever hands of Mr Finocchiaro have been so dealt with that no fault can be found, but only praise. The same must be said of the elaborate fibrous plasterwork of Arts & Crafts. On the north side is a marble-framed stage large enough for concerts and dramatic entertainments, with fine acoustic properties and some truly wonderful lighting effects installed by Andersen, Meyer & Co. It is possible to arrange a blending of lights that is unique in Shanghai.

The panelled billiard room is an interesting apartment in which the Jacobean influence is pronounced, with a novel chimneypiece in artificial stone. The plasterwork follows the style popularized at Home by G. P. Bankart, and the fine oak wainscotting is that adopted by Sir F. Lorimer.

SALONS OF MANY STYLES.

The dining room is a dignified hall of the Stewart period, panelled, and with a chimneypiece of wide and generous dimensions. Indeed, throughout the house the architects and decorators seem to have specialized in artistic fireplaces, which are not the least beautiful features of the place. Mention should be made of two large sideboards, in the planning of which a new note is struck.

The library and card rooms are in the style of William and Mary, with wood-panelled walls in a happy shade of green and gold on the lines of an old house in Botolph Lane, London.

A Corner and Stage in the Great Ball Room.

The main staircase contains the only fault in the building, but already it has been noted and is to be corrected. There is a double flight on an oval plan under a beautiful Adam dome, with generous marble walls and steps, but the numerous spidery brass decorative rails, though works of art in themselves, are out of place. Something massive and grand rather than delicate is required.

The staircase opens out on to spacious lounge halls and small balconies giving views of the ball room from above and in two alcoves there are lifelike portrait busts of Mr. Kadoorie and the late Mrs. Kadoorie. The rooms, all in suites of three, are complete in every detail and most tastefully furnished and decorated, with different wall designs for each suite.

BEAUTIFUL LIGHTING ARRANGEMENT.

One cannot go into detail regarding the tremendous amount of artificial lighting installed in such a beautiful place, but at least it can be stated that it is fully in keeping with all the other work and the style of the fixtures, varying in each room according to the surroundings, is as artistic as the marble work, the panelling, or the ceilings. The material for the lighting, heating and communication services was supplied by the General Electric Co. of New York and all the magnificent lighting fixtures throughout have been specially designed and manufactured by Thomas Day & Co. of San Francisco, Andersen, Meyer & Co., Ld., being the sole agents for the Far East. Special mention must be made of the crystal tear chandeliers in the ball room, drawing room and top stair landing of the first floor, also the exceptionally fine design in the dining room of eight antique Verdi bronze finish 16-candle light chandeliers. All of this work was done by Messrs. Andersen, Meyer & Co. under the direction of Mr. K. V. Aagesen. Much of the lighting is secured by concealed lamps, so cleverly arranged as to give a uniform light, soft and without any of the glare that would destroy the general effect. The firm well may be congratulated on what they have done.

INGENIOUS FITTINGS.

Throughout the house there are fittings as ingenious as things previously described are beautiful. There is a refrigerating room of vast dimensions yet so wonderful is the machinery that it costs but 10 cents an hour to run. The great fireplaces, built seemingly only for forest logs, never will know either wood or coal, for each houses a Magicoal electrical fire which at a distance of five or six feet looks like a real coal fire. There is a marvellous vapour steam heating system in addition, supplied by the American Radiator Co., ensuring warmth everywwhere, and in conjunction with this there is an air cooling system to give comfort in summer. In cunningly concealed niches in all the rooms and corridors, hidden away so that they will not spoil the artistic effect, are numerous inter-communication telephones by the China Electric Co. Then, too, the Shanghai Waterworks have installed fittings of a nature well in keeping with such a place.

Liable to pass unnoticed amongst the larger beauties, save by the art connoisseur, are some fine specimens of the Royal Danish Porcelain, of which Mr. Kadoorie has secured a big collection through the Standard Products Co., the agents for the Far East. A guest at any of the functions in Mr. Kadoorie's house who carelessly flicks his cigarette ash into what he might think is an ordinary ashtray should take a second look, for these Danish porcelains are worked into commonplace articles, beautiful though they are.

In the basement there is a miniature gymnasium, the fittings of which include some clever electrical contrivances. In the grounds there is a range of well-appointed stables and a small but very pretty conservatory, with some beautiful fountains and a lighting arrangement which looks very well at night.

The photographs reproduced with this article are by the Rembrandt Photo Co.

It was reported in the Chinese press on Monday that the Street Unions' Association have addressed the following letter to the Italian Consul-General in Shanghai: — "We learn that Italian merchants are at present concerned in selling arms and ammunition to the militarists of the Chihli party. We all know that these militarists are a great menace to the welfare and peace of this country and that their wicked acts are prolonging civil strife. If these reports are true, then the Italian merchants have committed a breach of international law, and we hope you will make efforts to stop this trade in arms."

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

A Dull Week in Everything But Yarn: Better Business with Mills

Mar. 22.

This has been a very dull week on the markets. Piece goods have been dragging along a weary course, business being almost entirely confined to the auctions. Except for silk, which has been bought for France, exports are almost negligible. Business in local yarn, however, shows an improvement, and the placing of orders for several thousand bales with the mills has resulted in heavier purchases of cotton, both Chinese and Indian.

PIECE GOODS.

While clearances are good and merchants with stocks in hand are able to sell readily, forward business in the piece goods trade is more or less at a standstill. Nor is the outlook promising at the moment, for dealers mention weaker advices both from Hankow and Tientsin. Apparently only actual trade demand is stirring in the market, speculation being for the time being eliminated. A further element of weakness is a drop in the price of Japanese Greys.

On the whole the auctions seem to have reflected the prevailing sentiment of the market. Dealers wanted cargo at cheaper rates than have recently been current, and in great measure they seem to have got them. In the case of Italians, which have experienced a very heavy drop since China New Year, it would appear that prices are being adjusted at the present lower level, but it is too early yet to look for any recovery. The probability is the fluctuations will in the immediate future be within narrow limits. With the exception of Greys practically no cargo is being allowed to remain in godown when once purchased.

In woollens the market continues quiet, with very little doing. The Home market remains as last reported.

COTTON AND YARN.

China Cotton—More activity has been shown in China cotton during the past week than for some time. The principal variety offered has been Shensi, of which considerable purchases are believed to have been made, while local mills have also been buying the Indian staple, which has almost reached a parity with China. Owing to the demand for yarn from the interior, it is reported on the China Cotton Goods Exchange that a bullish sentiment prevails in cotton. On the Exchange yesterday morning's closing prices were:—March 45; April 44.30; May 44; June 43.60; July 43.05; August 42.50. Spot quotations on the market are as follows:—Tungchow 46/47; Shanghai 43.50; Shensi 45; Hankow 42.50; Hokushi 44.50; Nanzu 44, Kashing 43.50.

Yarn—The yarn situation is better this week because of sales to the interior, while it is believed that about 10,000 bales have been booked with the mills. A number of the Chinese establishments, perhaps a dozen, have not re-opened since China New Year, while others are continuing on short time. This week's prices for yarn are between Tls. 2½ to Tls. 3 under the top figure secured after China New Year, but are Tls. 6 to Tls. 7 above the bottom since touched, while the position seems altogether healthier. A steady demand for local cloth continues and clearances have been brisk, some of the cloth having been taken up as soon as manufactured. On the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange a good demand is recorded from the interior, including Tientsin, Hankow, Szechuan and Newchuang, and stocks locally are mentioned as being very short. Accordingly the tendency there is on the bull side. Yesterday morning's closing Exchange quotations were as follows:—March 175.60; April 174.40; May 172; June 170.50; July 169.10; August 168.30.

SILK.

During the week there has been a fair demand from Lyons for silk, resulting in business to the extent of between 1,000 and 2,000 bales. The future tendency is uncertain, as high prices seem to have checked business.

New York is displaying no interest in the situation.

PRODUCE.

In produce there is little of interest to report. A few parcels of goatskins have been bought, but most markets continue lifeless, and such sales as are reported are mainly from earlier stock purchases.

GOLD MOVEMENTS

The Position of the United States

Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co.'s report on the gold market of February 6 contains the following notes:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on January 30 amounted to £126,254,435, as compared with £126,252,000 on the previous Wednesday.

India and the Continent have taken a fair proportion of the moderate supplies of gold offering this week.

Gold valued at $4,000,000 has arrived in New York from London.

The Southern Rhodesian gold output for December, 1923, amounted to 55,268 ounces, as compared with 54,937 ounces for November 1923, and 55,737 ounces for December 1922.

The "Financial Review" of New York has an article dealing with gold in which the following paragraph and tables appear:—

"Notwithstanding the appreciable increase in world's gold production, with the exception of the United States, this essential precious metal has become scarcer than ever before in history. It can truly be said that most of the world is starved for gold, which, in the opinion of competent authorities, is bound to hasten the utilization of some more easily obtained precious metal, i.e. this country now holds more than half of the entire monetary stock of gold in the world to-day. Our total now stands at $4,170,000,000, making our monetary structure the strongest of any nation."

1923	*292,730,108	34,165,303	258,564,805	—

*11 months.

An analysis of the figures reveals that taking the period 1900/14, the U.S. gold movement was an outflow averaging about $5,000,000 per annum, that is to say, the U.S.A. exported that quantity from its own production, whilst, taking the period 1915/23, the movement was an inflow averaging about $233,000,000 per annum. In the former, period the average world production was $391,000,000 per annum; in the latter $382,000,000. Hence on a falling world production the United States swung over from the position of an exporter of some of its own production to an importer of about 74 per cent. of the rest of the world's production (i.e. $382,000,000 less $67,000,000 own production).

If the world be "starved" for gold—a debatable expression, for practically only India diverts from the United States any material proportion of the metal offered for sale in London—it is plain that the United States, which has accumulated, as the article states, more than half the entire monetary stock of gold in the world to-day, is solely responsible for the starvation. Let the United States purchase with the trade balance other commodities than gold and it will stimulate its own trade, and at the same time employ a powerful lever by which the debilitated currencies of Europe will pluck up strength, recuperate, and be assisted to the gold parity. The United Kingdom has always preferred trade to unnecessary stocks of bullion, and has not been without ultimate reward.

The world would evidently run the risk of food starvation if its chief creditor nation declined to be paid in anything but grain, but that would be countered more easily than a like policy with regard to gold, for more grain could be grown. Gold production cannot be increased substantially at will. Indeed the very scarcity brought about by the action of the U.S.A. makes production more difficult by raising the cost of mining.

Finance authorities and leading bankers are holding a conference this evening to decide on means for stemming the collapse of the yen exchange. Some of the experts, it is understood, are of opinion that lifting of the embargo on the export of gold is essential. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

M. C. L. BAZAAR

Very Successful Afternoon in Charming Surroundings at the New Carlton

The young people of Shanghai who have given up some of their play hours during the last few months to make articles for the bazaar, the ladies in charge of the artistic stalls, the officers and committee members, and all who had contributed in any way to the aggregate of effort which made the bazaar of the Ministering Children's League so triumphant a success must have felt a thrill of satisfaction on Saturday evening on realizing how well their work had been rewarded.

The pink-bowered Carlton Café made a delightful picture with the tastefully arranged stalls and the throngs of children and grown-ups who filled the rooms all afternoon. The president of the League, Mrs. A. C. Clear, introducing Lady Stubbs, said as follows:

"Lady Stubbs and Fellow-members of the Ministering Children's League, this is our great day, our harvest, and we fondly hope the results of this day's harvest are going to maintain our splendid record of help to those pathetic little men and women—bruised human flowers, who throughout the world win our deepest compassion, and who, under better conditions, would be as healthy and happy as we are.

"Our Shanghai boys and girls are trying hard to help. We have a splendid new membership this year, and I confidently foretell that, good as to-day's receipts may be, next year's are going to be far finer, representing the united efforts of all Shanghai's young people." —

Lady Stubbs then spoke of the great honour she had felt the invitation to open the Bazaar had been. She had thought of explaining to the children what the Ministering Children's League meant, but as Mrs. Clear had done that so well already, she would only tell them to go on in the spirit of the League as they had done, bringing comfort into the lives of many by helping the poorer children. Again urging them to carry on the work as they had been doing she added that she had much pleasure in declaring the Bazaar open.

At the close of her speech 12 children, each carrying a flag with the name of the stall represented, came on the stage pulling a sledge completely filled with flowers, which they presented to Lady Stubbs. The youngsters' names, with the stalls they represented, are as follows: Susan Bolton, St. Joseph's School; David Edgar, Girls Public School; Nancy Neild, Cathedral School for Girls; Embgene Clark, Public School for Boys; Creighton Lacy, American School; Roberta Fryer, School for the Blind; Charlie Mackie, Home School and Nursery; Elizabeth Wright, Mothers' Union; Tubby Ford, Sports; Victor Toeg, Sweets, and Isobel Lowson, Mascots.

Strolling round the hall one was inclined to linger at every stall, for seldom has a more attractive display been arranged and the skill and originality of those in charge must have been taxed to set forth their wares in such alluring manner. The Sweets Stall in its pink and white setting, with carnations arranged between the luscious baskets, looked as toothsome as a cream puff. The Store Cupboard had a most tempting array of dainties, all in such dainty containers and so prettily tied up as to enhance their gastronomic charms. Jellies of every kind, honey, pickles, baskets of eggs, peanut butter—the list was endless and each better than the last.

The Public School for Boys handled the live stock of the show in a masterly fashion and also sold articles which they had made in their manual training courses, their masculine display contrasting effectively with the distinctly feminine appeal of the Home School room and Nursery Stall, in the charge of Lady Pearce, Mrs. C. G. S. Mackie, Mrs. O. M. Green, Misses Petersen and Hilda and Bonnie Calder Marshall, with its fascinating fluffs and furbelows, its dolls, prams and bassinettes, its golden baskets and candle sticks.

The tableaux arranged by Miss L. M. Hall, gave a realistic depiction of the unhappiness of child life in China which it is the object of the Ministering Children's League to relieve.

Appealing posters, "A Russian Refugee" and "One Kind Deed Every Day" marked the stall of the Public School for Girls, Boone Road and Yu Yuen Road, where a variety of fancy and useful articles was cleverly arranged. Many of these articles were made by the girls themselves. The Bran Pie was very realistic, and the Children's Stall in the centre of the room, devoted entirely to things which would delight young folks, had a multiplicity of gifts set out which would wheedle pocket money away from any child. The Tombola, managed by St. Joseph's School, was very popular and the Bank and Stamp Stall had individual appeals. The Stall of the Cathedral School for Girls with its purple setting was very effective, and the Mothers Union Stall was much admired.

HOUSEBOAT ON FIRE

Romola Nearly Burned to the Water's Edge: Interior and Furniture Destroyed

Fire broke out in the motor houseboat Romola on Monday afternoon and nearly burned the vessel to the water's edge.

The flames had got a good start and when noticed from the Bund were shooting high into the air.

Three of the coolies on the boat did valiant work at trying to damp down the flames over the roof, but could not really make any headway, as the timber appeared very dry and the flames, worked their way with amazing rapidity toward the fore part of the ship. It was impossible to get to the seacock, but a coolie got into a sampan and hacked at the hull in a vain attempt to make a breach and sink her before she was completely gutted. Before he had made any noticeable impression on the timbers, the Brigade were at work with three jets.

One light motor was run on to the bunding and the water tower got into action, but the lack of pressure and the distance from the flames prevented adequate results, so two lines were speedily got into sampans and taken over. A foreign fireman clambered into the rear of the vessel as soon as the deck flames had been partly got under control. Directing the nozzle into the cabin, he brought quantities of water into efficient action and soon a larger amount of steam than smoke was issuing from below.

Handicapped by adverse tides and lack of sampan men to control the boats, the men made the best of it and one Chinese fireman seized the yuloh and put the sampan into proper position.

The Romola is rather a large boat, being 55ft. over-all and 14ft. beam, with a draught of 3ft. 6in., tonnage 39.88. The hull is of teakwood, one and a quarter inches thick, and has a wheel house fitted with control levers for navigation. There was ample space forward for the crews and saloon, cabin and bath-room amidships. The entire vessel was completely equipped with chairs, settees curtains and carpets, circulating hot water system and cooking and dining supplies.

It is impossible to estimate accurately the damage done.

A burglar entered the house of Sir Edward and Lady Pearce in Hart Road on Friday night, fortunately, however, without stealing anything. Sir Edward and Lady Pearce had been at the theatre and on returning they found the servants much excited. One of the boys who had been sitting up realized a little before their return that some one was in dining room. He roused the other boys and they went to see what was happening, but the burglar realized that he was detected and had made off in the hall, through which he had got in. The room was in great disorder, but the only things missing were two silver teapots, which the burglar dropped in his flight through the garden, where they were afterwards found.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Excerpts from Minutes.

Police Reserve—Compensation to Acting Head Constable J. A. Rebsamen.—The Commissioner of Police recommends cash compensation to Mr. Rebsamen in addition to the hospital expenses and doctors, fees which the Council has already authorized as a result of injuries received by an armed robber whilst in the execution of Police duty. The Acting Secretary submits precedents in respect of compensation which has been paid by the Council. After discussion it is agreed to recommend issue of Tls. 5,000 as compensation.

Russian Refugees.

According to a report submitted by the Commissioner of Police, the number of Russian refugees in Shanghai is computed at about 7,000, of whom approximately 4,200 are adult males. Of the latter, some 2,430 are entirely dependent upon charity and a further 400 are supported by funds provided by former officers. In addition there are two groups of Russian Cadets, formerly members of the Omsk and Habarovsk Cadet Corps, together with their officers and tutors. These cadets, aged from 11 to 21, number approximately 500.

Of the female unemployed Russians, about 500 are dependent upon charity; this number includes 35 girls under 18 years of age who are accommodated in the Orphanage at Siccawei. The number of women working in bars, cafés, and other such places is estimated at about 400.

Over 2,200 unemployed Russians are supported from day to day by five charity organized soup kitchens, while others are maintained by unorganized charity.

In addition to the Russians in Shanghai, there are about 700 refugees on board the ships at Woosung.

It is noted that since October last some 300 refugees have arrived in Shanghai, including 100 from General Gleboff's ships, while during the same period some 300 have left, a few for Soviet Russia but the majority to work as lumbermen near Harbin.

Fire in Chapei.

The following is an extract from a report by the Deputy Chief Officer, Fire Brigade, on the subject of the recent fire in Chapei:—

March 13, 1924.

Although this fire was outside the Settlement, Hongkew Division, who turned out on a Watch Tower call, rendered all possible assistance to the Chapei Brigade, and the fire was confined to where it was found. This fire emphasizes the appalling death traps and fire menaces which exist on the Settlement border.

The Chong King Silk Filature consisted of two four storey brick buildings, approximately 120-ft. by 60-ft. each, about 8 feet apart, connected by a bridge on the third floor, and possessed no fire walls whatsoever. Terraces of Chinese houses are built on three sides about 6 feet from the Filature. The entrance to the compound in front is reached by passing under a gatehouse in another terrace.

In the Filature there was apparently only one wooden stair case, and all the windows were fitted with iron bars and wire netting, so that the employees who were unable to get down the staircase, were caught like rats in a trap, without any chance of escape whatsoever.

Lotteries.

Letter from Mr. C. Grosbois requesting permission to conduct a lottery in the Settlement, with reply:—

Shanghai, February 28, 1924.

Dear Sir,—Our Committee is conducting lotteries for the benefit of Russian refugees, since last October. The money is used for the support of 600 children of the Cadets Schools and for the sending away of the Russian refugees.

We expect to send the Cadets to Servia in May and we sent back already to Russia 250 men.

As you know the lotteries are authorized by the Consul-General for France and drawn at the French Town Hall.

Could the Shanghai Municipal Council give us permission to have the drawings in the Shanghai Race Club buildings, provided the stewards allow same. It would be much easier for us as Mr. A. W. Olsen who has accepted to supervise the drawings could attend more regularly.

Hoping the Shanghai Municipal Council will not have any objection.

C. Grosbois,
Chairman,
Relief Committee of Russian Orphans of the Great War.
E. S. B. Rowe, Esq.,
Acting Secretary,
Municipal Council.

Council Chamber,
Shanghai, March 10, 1924.

Sir,—I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 28, requesting the Council's permission for the drawings of the Lottery which is conducted for the benefit of Russian refugees, to be held upon the premises of the Shanghai Race Club.

In reply, I have to inform you with regret that the permission sought cannot be accorded, inasmuch as the Council in pursuance of its general policy to prohibit the sale or distribution of Lottery tickets and/or the conduct of Lotteries in the Settlement, having already prohibited such sale or distribution of tickets for this particular Lottery within its jurisdiction, cannot consistently depart therefrom by permitting the Lottery to be conducted inside the Settlement.

E. S. B. Rowe.
Acting Secretary.
Charles Grosbois, Esq.,
Chairman,

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

During the past week attention has centered in transactions for March Settlement on the 25th instant, and little other business has been recorded. "Rubbers" have weakened further upon the report of the fall in price of the raw material, but close slightly firmer with more enquiry, and provided there is no further drop in the price of raw rubber, a firmer market is anticipated after March settlement. Cottons are easier with little enquiry from purchasers. Other stocks remain quiet but steady.

The tone of the market generally has been quiet but a firmer tone is expected after March Settlement.

London market quotations are a shade firmer, and the following are the latest prices cabled to us.

greatest enemies of distribution. It is particularly unfortunate that this irregular taxation should have been allowed to go unchecked just at a time when the Chinese Government had undertaken to take steps for the abolition of all likin under the Washington Treaty. The Powers who signed that Treaty cannot fail to ask whether the Government really has the power to control inland taxation in any way. It would certainly be a grave handicap to trade if higher import duties were imposed whilst the Provinces were left free to impose provincial taxes on trade at their own free will. China needs to develop her trade, and this policy of taxation is an enemy to her real welfare.

CHINESE CREDIT INVOLVED.

There is another aspect of this irregular taxation which we must bear in mind; it strikes a severe blow at the credit of this country. These irregular taxes have been imposed in defiance of treaties and agreements voluntarily undertaken by the Central Government. The breach of these agreements has attracted very great attention throughout the world. China's credit has gained much in the past from the belief in the money market that she does stand by her bargains. Her credit will certainly suffer from the disregard of existing agreements in regard to internal taxation.

TRADE-MARKS.

Much has been said and written in the Press on the most important subject of the new Chinese Trade-Mark Law but I feel that I ought to put the present situation briefly before you.

In 1919 the Board of Trade in England, after considering a draft Trade-Mark Law which had been drafted by a Joint Committee appointed by the China Association and the Shanghai British Chamber of Commerce, prepared a shorter and simpler draft Law. This Law, after discussion with the Board of Trade, was accepted by the said Joint Committee. It was then approved by the Shanghai American Chamber of Commerce and sent to H. M. Legation who handed it to the Waichiaopu. That was the last we heard of this draft, but on May 3 last year the Chinese Government promulgated the new Chinese Trade-Mark Law. As far as I am aware no opportunity was given to the Diplomatic Body, or any of the Foreign Legations at Peking to consider or discuss the new Law, and they were not consulted in any way prior to its promulgation although it seriously affects foreign interests and is clearly an attempt on the part of the Chinese to make an in-road into our extra-territorial rights.

The main objection we have to the new Law is the way in which the Chinese Government provides for its administration.

The Law provides for a Bureau of trade-marks in Peking where trade-marks may be registered. This Bureau is staffed entirely by Chinese, and the three bodies to which appeals therefrom may be made, consist of Chinese and Chinese only. According to the Reuter's telegrams which have appeared in the Press, the Diplomatic Body have told the Chinese Government that they are prepared to recognize the new Law subject to certain considerations and conditions. One of these considerations is a suggestion for foreign expert assistance in the Bureau. In the opinion of the leading foreign merchants here this suggestion is entirely inadequate. Not only is foreign expert assistance necessary but we consider that foreign control or supervision is essential in the Bureau, and in every tribunal to which appeals from the Bureau may be made, and our opinion is that this should have been made a condition precedent even to consideration of the Law by the Diplomatic Body. Although the Law cannot be made strictly binding on foreigners, who are nationals of Powers having extra-territorial rights, when they are defendants in their own Courts, until it has been recognized and accepted by their respective Legations, a Chinese Court of Appeal has already held that a subject of a non-Treaty Power cannot be convicted for an infringement of a foreign trade-mark unless such mark has been registered under the new Law. This was decided in what is now generally known as the "Harbin Case."

Article I of the new Law provides as follows:—

Any person who desires exclusively to use a Trade Mark in order to distinguish goods as having been produced, manufactured, worked, selected, sold, or dealt with in his business shall have such Mark registered in accordance with this Law.

Registration, or the right to register a Mark, involves the whole question of the ownership or the exclusive right to use such a mark, and as I have indicated, this is to be left entirely to the discretion of Chinese bureaucrats.

This is not only a distinct breach of Article 7 of the Mackay Treaty, under which China undertook to protect British trade-marks, and to establish Offices for their registration under the control of the Maritime Customs, but it also strikes at the root of the extra-territorial right of subjects or citizens of the Treaty Powers to have a representative of their nation on all tribunals or courts, before which any questions affecting their rights or interests may be heard or tried.

The Joint Committee appointed by the China Association and the Shanghai British Chamber of Commerce, are fighting hard for foreign control or supervision, in addition to expert technical assistance on the Trade-Mark Bureau and tribunals. They are also pressing for certain other amendments which time will not permit me to mention in detail here, but one of the most important of which is extension of the time for registration, under Article 4 of the new Law, to six months from the date on which the Law is formally recognized by the Powers. I think I can say that the Chambers of Commerce of all foreign Treaty Powers are fully in accordance with the views of this Joint Committee.

I cannot emphasize too strongly how vitally important it is for Foreign Trade-Mark owners to stand together, and use every possible endeavour to prevent recognition of the new Law until proper protection and safeguards are afforded to what is one of, if not the, most valuable forms of foreign property in China.

CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

We are all traders with and well-wishers of China and our business cannot I think increase, but will sadly diminish unless a properly recognized government is established and the practice of illegal taxation and of holding up foreigners for ransom peremptorily checked. The prestige of Westerners and Americans has regrettably declined in China, and since a firm government can hardly be set up without their help, it is very necessary to enhance that prestige of the foreign nations in the eyes of the Chinese masses while doing everything possible to assist the Central Government to be master in its own house and not too dependent on foreign control. The only way out of the present appalling impasse is, to my thinking, to extend the system which has worked so admirably by placing trained foreigners in the employ of the Chinese Government with administrative powers, similar to those excellent services the Chinese Customs, Chinese Postal Department and Chinese Salt Gabelle. With regard to the Salt Revenue, I would like to quote from Mr. Lang's speech at the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank's annual meeting in which he stated "that further inroads on the collections had been made by the Provincial Authorities, and in some cases the efficient organization established by Sir Richard Dane has been broken up and replaced by the nominees of the independent provinces in defiance of all international agreements." If the Powers at the Washington Conference who showed their forbearance and and good will towards China are driven eventually to the conclusion that moderation will not be properly appreciated, there will be regrettably no alternative, as suggested in a "Times" article last June, but to adopt more drastic methods.

RELATIONS WITH NATIONAL CHAMBERS.

My predecessor in the chair, Mr. G. H. Stitt, referred at the last annual general meeting to the necessity for closer relationship between this Chamber and the different National Chambers upon matters of general interest to the trade and commerce of the Port. During the past year several of the Chambers have consulted with each other on various matters and it has been possible to clear up existing differences of opinion and find a basis for mutual agreement in regard to subjects of considerable importance. Unity of action among the Chambers has been secured in cases where deemed desirable, a notable instance being in connexion with the new Chinese Trade-Marks Law.

I trust the various Chambers will continue to meet in conference on all matters where such procedure would be conducive to mutual understanding.

MEMBERSHIP.

The roll of membership totals 125 against 122 last year. Membership of the Chamber suffered during the years of the war and I should like very much to see a considerable increase in the ensuing year. Your Committee is called upon to deal with an increasing volume of business of vast importance to all branches of the commercial community and many of the business houses whose names are absent from the list of members would do well to accord the Chamber their support, more especially in view of the growing difficulties which are besetting commerce in China to day. The Chamber, formed in the year 1847, has seen many difficult situations arise during the 77 years of its existence, but it is doubtful whether there was ever a period when greater need existed for unity amongst the merchants and traders taking part in the enormous business of the port than exists at the present moment.

There were no questions or comments on the report, which was carried unanimously on the proposal of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Massey.

There were 12 nominations for the 1924 Committee, and a unanimous appointment was made as follows: Sir Edward Pearce, Messrs. A. Brooke-Smith, B. C. Haile, M. Nodaira, T. H. R. Shaw, N. Lees Smith, E. Sigaut, H. A. Wiley, G. A. Bena, E. T. Byrne, A. M. Cannan, and A. B. Lowson, the last four named being new members.

This was all the business of the meeting.

THE SMALL BORE RIFLE CLUB

The Annual Meeting: Three Competition Trophies Promised

Dr. S. A. Ransom (the Chairman) presided at the first annual meeting of the Small Bore Rifle Club of the Shanghai Rifle Association, held in the S.V.C. Lecture Hall on Wednesday, and there was a fair attendance of members.

In his report, Mr. H. W. Lambert, the hon. secretary, stated that they were in debt to the S.R.A. for $813, but they had assets more than covering this amount. The S.R.A. also had given them a loan of $2,000. The full scheme of contemplated improvements at the range would cost Tls. 900 and therefore had been shelved, but certain additional comforts would be provided. Small bore clubs were being formed at Hankow and Tientsin, so that Interport matches were hoped for. Arrangements also were being made for matches with Home clubs. Three handsome trophies had been promised for competition amongst the members. There were 62 members on the roll.

The report and accounts were passed.

Messrs. A. L. Mottu, T. Mitchell and J. Watson were elected on the committee, the other members of which will be nominated by the S.R.A.

The Chairman expresed the hope that during the ensuing year not only the membership but interest in the club would show an increase.

THE BRITISH WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION

Annual Meeting: A Brilliant Year's Working: The Question of Increased Subscription: Mr. Benjamin's Generous Gift

The annual meeting of the British Women's Association took place at the Lyceum Theatre on Wednesday. The theatre was full and the attendance an enthusiastic one.

Mrs. E. M. Gull took the chair, and was supported by Miss Ayrton, Mrs. Byrne, Mrs. Dovey, Mrs. Green, Mrs. Gull, Miss Hyland, Mrs. Irwine, Mrs. Matheson, Mrs. McMichael, Miss Murphy, Mrs. Symons, Mrs. H. P. Wilkinson, Mrs. McGillivray, Mrs. Burton Sayer, Mrs. Clear, Mrs. Craddock, Mrs. Bichard, Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Roberts, Mrs. Hodges, Mrs. Maitland, Mrs. Alister Campbell and Mrs. Snodgrass (secretary).

Mrs. Gull, after recalling that she had been out of China for most of last year, said in part:—

Let me first of all congratulate you on the results of a very exceptional year, a year which at the same time I pray may never be repeated in our history. The complication of carrying on the Fayre preparations under the shadow of that indescribable calamity in Japan must have been difficult beyond expression, and the manner in which the Association, under the able captaincy of Mrs. Green, pulled through must always command keen admiration and gratitude. The optimism, the pluck and the determination which enabled the Association to render such yeoman service in the relief work, and then on the top of that to go ahead and carry through the most wonderful bazaar, with Mrs. Stitt at its head, that has, from all I have heard, ever been seen in China, can never be forgotten.

MEMBERSHIP AND COMMITTEE.

In regard to the Association's membership, our position remains fairly stable. How many members are temporarily absent it is always difficult to estimate, and this fact makes our nominal roll almost impossible to estimate accurately. However, as a working basis we count 1058 members as our total and to 1058 did notices of this meeting go out. This, notwithstanding the fact that the financial statement shows only 817 paid up subscriptions. Those figures do not, I will say at once, compare quite favourably with those of last year, since they leave us over 100 members short. On the other hand, 238 new members have joined up in 1923, as against 190 in 1922. Of formal resignations there have been 25, 10 being accounted for in leaving Shanghai. I assure you that your Executive have spent many valuable hours in trying to solve the problem of getting in subscriptions promptly, and in trying to find out whether unpaid subscriptions are the result of carelessness, apathy or are an impolite way of relinquishing membership. The problem remains unsolved.

Your Executive Committee has held 21 ordinary and 2 special meetings during the year at which the attendance averaged 13.6., Mrs. Symons again topping the list in having sat at 21 out of 21 meetings. The acting chairmanship has three times changed hands during last year and in order to avoid misunderstanding I should like to be allowed to say that it was only under very considerable pressure that I agreed to remain nominally Chairman while I was away. Mrs. Simms' term of office was brief family afflictions in the shape of infections diseases, together with her impending departure from Shanghai, making it impossible for her to carry on. Her cheery presence and philosophic outlook on life are greatly missed by all of us. Mrs. Green, however, stepped into the breach, as arranged before I went away, and was acting-Chairman from the beginning of October until the end of last year; great is our gratitude to her for all she has done to complete an uncommonly arduous and difficult session. The fact that there were two changes in the secretarial department during Mrs. Green's term of office did not exactly facilitate matters for her, while to add to the complications a change of Headquarters had to be undertaken, a change indeed for the better, but nevertheless entailing a good deal of work both to Mrs. Simms, Mrs. Green and the House Committee, to all of whom our thanks are due.

On account of pressure of work and impending departure for home leave, Miss Cardwell has relinquished the duties of Hon. Treasurer, and has handed over to Mrs. E. T. Byrne. The Association's gratitude to its Hon. Treasurers is no mere formality. Most hearty thanks are due to Miss Cardwell for all her excellent work in the past.

SOCIETY AND PHILANTHROPY.

Mrs. Gull then dealt with the B.W.A.'s social activities, receptions flower shows etc.

The philanthropic side of the Association was of course, the main interest for very many members. British women who had fallen on hard times should feel that they might ask help from the Social Service Board and rest entirely assured that absolute secrecy would be maintained about their affairs. Mrs. Gull dwelt specially on the work of the Hospital Visiting Department, which had evolved during the past year under the guidance of Mrs. Burton Sayer. In the free wards of the hospitals here were discovered, only too often, Englishmen, who through drink, disease or misfortune, had become utterly destitute and sunk low in the social scale. In this regular visiting of the free wards by the right people, the confidence of these "down and outs" was often gained, and this was an admirable medium through which a work of great and constructive charity might be performed. To provide these men with decent clothing was to begin to rebuild their self-respect, while by getting interested in them, keeping in touch with them, when they left hospital, and if possible, putting them in the way of obtaining employment, was to give to many of them a genuine desire and determination to make good. Patience, perseverance, tact and a great understanding were the essential qualities for work of this kind. These who were interested in helping here could be of special service by telling the Committee of possible employment and by sending clothing, magazines, etc: in to them at Headquarters.

As well as this rather special work, numbers of other hospital patients, old-standing and hopeless cases, many of them, were visited, cheered and provided with such little comforts as are not to be found in free wards. "In so gay and friendly a place as Shanghai it is difficult perhaps to realize what a lot of friendless strangers, both women and men, find their way into hospitals here. I make no apology for stressing this work among the "down and outs," because it is reconstructive and seems to me to fall in with the best traditions of our country, and to be the very epitome of social service."

KINDERED SOCIETIES AND THANKS.

Mrs. Gull then dwelt on the cordial relations and cooperation prevailing between the B.W.A. and kindred societies. She expressed special thanks to the Press for the generous manner in which their columns had always been opened to them, and in this connexion would acknowledge how much they owed to the three leading women journalists of Shanghai, Miss Benedict, Miss Douglas and Miss Stops, of the "North China Daily News," the "Shanghai Times" and the "Mercury" respectively. To their assiduous care, energy and revotion the B. W. A. owe a vast amount of exceedingly valuable publicity.

Cordial thanks of the Association were due to their hon. legal advisors, to the hon. auditor and to the Chairman (Mr. Stitt) and members of the Men's Advisory Committee. Also to the Chairmen and Committees of the Country and Union Clubs, to the Chairman and Stewards of the Race Club, and to many other men, whose cooperation and sympathy had been invaluable.

COMPANY MEETINGS

THE SHANGHAI LAND INVESTMENT CO.

Details of Prosperous Year's Working Given by Chairman at Annual Meeting

The annual meeting of shareholders in the Shanghai Land Investment Co., Ltd., was held on Thursday. Sir Edward Peacock presided and the others present were Messrs. C. H. Arnhold, J. W. Bardwell and G. L. Campbell, directors, P. Peebles, general manager, P. A. H. Chambers, J. H. Gordon, C. C. Stevenson, S. Yale and W. L. Atkinson.

The notice convening the meeting having been read, the Chairman said:—

The report and accounts for the year ending December 31, 1923, have been in your hands for some days, and I will, with your permission, take them as read.

When last I addressed you I congratulated you on receiving the best working account the company had ever presented to its shareholders. This year, I am happy to say, your accounts again show a continued improvement, the balance of working account being Tls. 10,666.94 greater than last year. This, in spite of the fact, that we have carried out certain re-buildings with a consequent temporary loss of rent.

A SUPERANNUATION SCHEME.

During the year your Directors put into operation a staff superannuation scheme and in view of the many years' service of most of the staff, they made the scheme partly retrospective. Following the lines of certain other public companies, it was decided to allocate to the superannuation fund an amount equal to 5 per cent. of each employee's salary since the commencement of his service with the company and to credit the same with compound interest at 6 per cent. per annum. The sum involved amounts to Tls. 33,204 which your board considered advisable to write off to this year's profit and loss account rather than debit our reserves which it might legitimately have recommended. Future allocations to be on the following lines—that is to say, 5 per cent. is deducted from the salary of each employee and credited to the fund, the company add an amount equal to 10 per cent. of salaries and credit the fund with interest at 6 per cent. per annum. Needless to say, the scheme has given considerable satisfaction to the staff and your directors feel that not only was it well deserved, but also in the best interests of the company. When I tell you that our present small staff, none of whom were engaged for architectural work, have designed and carried out new buildings to a total cost of over three million taels with a corresponding saving of fees to the company, you will agree that this encouragement given to them by the board is well merited.

RE-DEVELOPMENT.

The re-development of Wills and Chwang Hoong Estates which I outlined in my speech last year was completed and the houses occupied during the summer. Satisfactory increases in rents were obtained for all the new houses the financial return being slightly better than our estimates. A further block of 150 Chinese houses on the Chwang Hoong Estate has now been taken in hand and as soon as this is completed another block of about equal size will be commenced. This gradual re-development will continue until the whole of our old properties have been rebuilt, a programme which will carry us over several years.

NEW FOREIGN HOUSES.

Except for the completion of the terrace of 15 houses on Dixwell Road mentioned in my last speech, we did not take in hand during the year any new foreign buildings. Small well built foreign houses are still easily let, but the demand for them is not nearly as keen as it was. The cost of well built foreign houses is still high, and we have in view only a restricted foreign building programme for the current year.

SALES.

The only sale during the year was Mohawk Road estate. This estate was purchased by the company in 1914 for Tls. 195,000. During the years we held it the rents gave a fair return on its cost and the land appreciated considerably in value and we were able to realize a considerable profit on the sale. The whole profit appears in profit and loss account this year.

PURCHASES.

We have purchased during the year two properties, the first on North Fokien Road at the junction of the Tong Dong Ka Lane. A part of this estate has been resold to the Municipal Council for the purpose of a market, and the remainder is now nearing the completion of its re-development with very well built Chinese shops and houses.

The second, a property developed with good Chinese houses near the junction of Wuchow and Hailar Roads. Both these properties are well situated and have every prospect of a steady increase in value.

ACCOUNTS.

I think I need take very little of your time in dealing with the accounts. We publish these in considerable detail, and the report contains comparisons with those of the previous year.

The increase in gross rents is, I think, satisfactory and the increase in outgoings is not more than we should reasonably expect in view of the steady increase in all fixed charges due to the growth and greater taxable value of our estates. All our properties have been kept in a good state of repair, and naturally each house we add to our property also adds something to the cost of our annual repairs. The interest on our mortgages has more than paid the interest on our bank overdraft due to the fact that for a part of the year, our overdraft was small. During the current year, however we shall be more heavily indebted to the bank and our credit balance of interest account will disappear.

There is nothing on the debit side of working account which would appear to need explanation and profit and loss account is, I think, equally clear. Our recommendations for the appropriation of the balance are set out in the report.

The balance sheet shows the financial position of the company clearly. If you pass the resolution as to the recommended appropriation of the balance standing at the credit of profit and loss account, our reserve for equalization of dividends will be increased to Tls. 275,000 and our improvements and renewals reserve to over Tls. 311,000. These with the steadily growing depreciation of building reserve now standing at Tls. 179,562.95 are eloquent testimony of the soundness of the financial status of the company.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

The good relations which have for years existed between the company and the native authorities have been to some extent marred this year by the high handed policy of the Chapei authorities in laying out and making up certain quite useless roads through our property in the Paoshan district, without giving us any notice or even offering us any compensation before taking possession of our land. The matter is now in the hands of the Consular authorities and will, I hope, be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, and I mention it now as a further piece of evidence of the growing attitude of Chinese to disregard and ride rough shod over foreign rights. The land in question is held under the usual British title deed granted by the Chinese Government, but neither contractual obligations nor Treaty rights would appear to carry any weight with Chinese authorities of the present day. I think there is nothing else on which I need comment, but should any shareholder wish for further explanations or information. I shall be pleased to supply the same as far as I can.

There were no questions the following resolutions were duly carried:—

That the report and accounts as presented be accepted and passed. Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Arnhold.

That the directors be authorized to pay a final dividend for the year 1923 at 6 per cent. and a bonus of 1 per cent. on the paid up capital of the company to shareholders on the register at this date. Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Arnhold.

That Mr. C. H. Arnhold be elected a director of the company. Proposed by Mr. Chambers, seconded by Mr. Gordon.

That Messrs. Lowe, Bingham & Matthews be reelected auditors for the current year at a remuneration of Tls. 750. Proposed by Mr. Chambers, seconded by Mr. Gordon.

An announcement by the Chairman that it was hoped to have the dividend warrants issued by the same afternoon's post concluded the business of the meeting.

ASIA LIFE INSCE. CO.

Annual General Meeting

The third annual general meeting of the shareholders of the Asia Life Insurance Company was held at the offices of the Company, No. 3 Canton Road, Shanghai, on Monday afternoon. The officers and directors of the previous year were continued in office without any changes or additions. They are as follows:—

C. V. Starr President.
Dr. F. B. Baldwin, Vice-President.
A. K. Taylor, Secretary.
C. L. Seitz, Treasurer.
C. H. Getts, Assistant Secretary.
H. A. Pan, Assistant Secretary.

Directors:—

C. L. Seitz.
F. J. Raven.
C. V. Starr.
Thomas L. Miller (Tientsin).
Hunter Mann (Hankow).
B. C. Sienkevitch.
A. K. Taylor.

The report of the Directors showed the Company's progress as is evidenced by its recently published financial statement. The shareholders recorded their complete confidence in the Company's present management and their satisfaction with the growth of the business.

A number of his friends entertained Mr. G. H. Stitt, manager of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, at dinner on Sunday night, the occasion being his departure on Home leave. Judge Peter Grain presided and proposed the toast of the guest, which was supported by Mr. A. W. Burkill, on behalf of the Stewards of the Race Club, Mr. S. Fessenden on behalf of the Municipal Council, and Mr. John Prentice representing the commercial interests of the port. Mr. Stitt suitably replied.

His Honour Judge Grain disposed of a number of small debt cases in H. M. Supreme Court, on Thursday, giving judgment for the Hongkong & Shanghai Hotels for $494.65 and $50 costs against G. W. Bicknell; for Rattan Singh for $50 down, $50 a month and costs against Saraj Din on an eight year-old I.O.U. for $150; and for Mrs. T. M. Wallace against Norman W. Bowler for $358 for board and lodging. Bowler said that he was willing to surrender his furniture held by Mrs. Wallace, but he asked to be allowed to have his private clothes. The Judge said that Mrs. Wallace was perfectly entitled to retain both furniture and clothes until the debt was paid. The case of S. M. Sopher v. A. Baptista, a judgment summons on account of overdue instalments, was adjourned on defendant's statement that he would clear the debt this month.

CLUBS AND SOCIETIES

SHANGHAI GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Exhaustive Review at Annual Meeting of Conditions and Events in China: The Trademark Law Described by Chairman as an Attack on Extraterritoriality

A full and interesting review of the principal matters affecting commerce in China during the year was given on Tuesday afternoon by Sir Edward Peacock, presiding at the annual general meeting of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce. Sir Edward was supported by Messrs. A. Brooke-Smith, P. W. Massey, B. C. Haale and E. Sigaut, members of the Committee, and there were also present Messrs. E. T. Byrne, P. A. H. Chambers, G. H. Sheppard, O. M. Green, B. dos Remedios, V. G. Lyman, G. A. Bena, Gavin Campbell, A. L. Dickson and W. Thomas.

The notice convening the meeting having been read:—

Gentlemen.—The report and accounts for the year ending December 31 last having been in your hands for some little time, I will with your permission take them as read. Before moving their adoption I will refer briefly to the more important matters which have occupied the attention of your Committee. The report as presented to you goes very fully into all the Chamber's activities during the year and leaves little for me to add.

Your thanks are due to the various Sub-Committees who have sat during the year, their work has been much appreciated and exceedingly helpful to the Chamber.

PILFERAGE OF CARGO.

Our recommendations as published in the report have been forwarded in a letter to the Senior Consul, a reply to which is still awaited. It is imperative that the river in future must have a larger number of police, which, due to the increase of shipping now calling at this port, is absolutely necessary. As a proof of the growth I would state that the total Shanghai Customs Revenue for 1922 was Hk. Tls. 21,932,807 as against Hk. Tls. 11,513,062 for 1912, Hk. Tls. 12,061,197 in 1914, Tls. 14,289,736 in 1919 and Hk. Tls. 18,833,046 in 1920.

CONGESTION OF SOOCHOW CREEK.

As far back as January 1923, more than a year ago, we made representations to the Consular Body, pointing out the appalling condition of this very necessary waterway not only within the Settlement limits but extending some three to four miles westward of the boundary, hindering as it does in its present state all means of traffic during low tide and causing endless delay and consequent loss of money to all factories bordering on the creek, whose only means it is of moving their supplies and products. A letter was also addressed to the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce asking for their cooperation in the urgent need for dredging, to which they replied that the people living in the eight districts with which the creek communicates are unanimously willing to contribute towards the expense of dredging the creek and as soon as contributions have been received they will request the Chinese Authorities to commence the work forthwith.

Furthermore, your Committee has reason to believe that the Whangpoo Conservancy is prepared at any time to undertake the dredging of that part of the creek which lies within the Settlement limits and to meet the cost of same out of funds already in their hands and available for that purpose.

All of us who have lived in China can draw our own interences from these facts.

PILOTAGE TARIFF.

During the year your Committee has been engaged upon the question of revision of the Shanghai Pilotage Tariff. The matter was first brought before the Chamber in November 1922 when it was submitted that the 50 per cent. surcharge which had been instituted as a temporary measure to compensate the pilots for decreased earnings due to the decrease of tonnage arriving at the port, during the War period should be withrawn.

In 1920 it had been agreed to continue the high tariff for a further period in order to provide for the cost of construction of the new pilot boat Lingkong but earnings have now increased to such an extent that after making due allowance for the provision of a new reserve pilot boat to replace Yangtze the tariff should be brought to a reasonable level. Special Sub-Committees appointed by the Chamber have investigated this question and obtained the opinions of the National Chambers. Their reports have been submitted to the Consular Body who, together with the Chambers of Commerce and the Harbour Master, form the Pilotage Authority of the Port. The Consular Body now have the matter under consideration.

In addition to tariff revision the Chamber has considered the question of travelling pilots. The opinion is held that it is desirable that this privilege should still be available for steamship companies particularly those maintaining an express service.

They have also discussed the general regulations governing the Pilotage service, the provisions with regard to medical examination and age limit and the period of apprenticeship before qualification for a pilot's licence.

THE LINCHENG BANDIT OUTRAGE.

We publish in our report a copy of the telegram despatched to the Doyen of the Diplomatic Body on May 22, 1923 and the reply received. From the concluding paragraph you will observe that the Doyen informed us "that he has little doubt that the Powers represented at the Washington Conference will consider the measures necessary to guarantee the safety of the lives and property of their nationals in China and will take such steps as may appear to them desirable and practicable to prevent the recurrence of any similar outrage and to remedy the state of things which has rendered such an incident possible."

Since this Lincheng outrage, gentlemen, no less than nine members of friendly nations to China have been murdered and 25 kidnapped by bandits. This does not include cases in which foreigners have been fired on or had close calls and where only property has been seized or damaged. I have in my hand the appalling list of these outrages. This has all happened since the interchange of notes concerning the Lincheng affair when China gave assurances that immediate steps would be undertaken to eradicate banditry throughout the country, and the receipt of the telegram from the Doyen of the Diplomatic Body. We are indeed paying pretty heavily for the privilege of being guests in China, or should I say paying guests.

I think it only right to mention that so far the Chinese Government have evaded the payment of any compensation to those unfortunate people who underwent such a terrible experience.

In addition to the above I have a list of recent acts of piracies against ships in Hongkong waters, no less than three British and four Chinese ships being pirated in 1923, and another British ship as recently as last January.

PROVINCIAL SURTAX OF 20 PER CENT.

The Provinical surtax on cigarettes, imposed in the Provinces of Chekiang, Anhui, Hupeh and Honan, has created considerable disturbance in that particular trade and has attracted very wide attention not only in China, but in Europe, America and Japan. This surtax of 20 per cent. is a tax on goods and similar to the likin tax against which this Chamber, together with all the National Chambers, has made constant efforts to secure the abolition. As merchants interested in the free passage of goods about the country, we know that irregular taxation is one of the the incoming committee will consider the question of an official ball for 1925. After a suggestion that possibly a re-arrangement of the order of the championships might be of financial benefit to the Association, the matter was left to the committee to arrange. The President announced that the use of the Hotel Majestic courts had been granted for another season, but after that the Association would have to consider the question of finding other courts.

Mr. Brown said that he had made inquiries regarding affiliation to the Lawn Tennis Association, but this was not feasible, because the rules were not very elastic and, though a club could join, an association of clubs could not.

Votes of thanks were accorded to Mr. Whitamore for his work as secretary, to Mr. Reginald Brown for auditing the accounts, to the managers and directors of the Shanghai Hotels for allowing the use of the Hotel Majestic Courts, and to the Head Master of the Cathedral School for granting the use of the room for the meeting.

THE BOY SCOUTS' ASSOCIATION

Annual General Meeting of Shanghai Branch

The annual meeting of the Shanghai branch of the Boy Scouts' Association was held at H. M. Consulate on Tuesday evening. The chair was taken by Mr. Sidney Barton C.M.G., supported by Sir Edward Pearce, Judge Sir Skinner Turner, the Very Rev. Dean Symons, Col. W. F. L. Gordon, C.M.G.; R.S.O., and Messrs. I. Tuxford, E. Moller, P. Fowler, H. S. Bartley, A. J. Stewart, C. Grosbois, J. P. Jones, W. J. Hawkings, H. Holgate, E. S. Wilkinson, R. E. Toeg, and Commissioner F. C. Millington, Assistant Commissioner S. Hore, Mr. N. S. Jacobs (Hon. Sec.) and Mr. H. G. Whitcher (Hon. Treas.)

On the proposition of Mr. E. Moller, seconded by Mr. Tuxford the report and accounts were adopted.

Officers were elected as follows:—Patron and President: Mr. Sidney Barton C.M.G.,; Vice Presidents: Sir Edward Pearce and Sir Skinner Turner; Hon. Sec.: Mr. Jacobs; Hon. Treas.: Mr. H. Holgate; Executive Committee: Messrs. Tuxford, Moller, the Commissioners, the Hon. Sec., and the Hon. Treas.

Some discussion ensued on the subject of the Association's by-laws for submission to the authorities at Home, and these were adopted as set out in the report, with a number of small amendments.

Commissioner Millington drew attention to the by-law imposing a subscription of $5 per year on each member. He explained that no fee had been charged for the past five or six years, but they now felt that it would be better to raise their funds for the jamboree, etc., inside the Association than to let the boys sell tickets and "tout" publicly in the streets.

A proposal was made to the Association by Mr. W. Trenchard Davis, of St. George's Society, on behalf of the Patriotic Societies, that the Scouts hold their jamboree in conjunction with the other Patriotic Societies, and the matter was referred to the Executive Committee for their consideration and decision.

Before the meeting concluded, Mr. Sidney Barton presented Mr. Fowler with the "Thanks Badge" as a token of their gratitude for the very valuable assistance he had rendered the scout movement in Shanghai during the past year or so.

Mr. Fowler expressed his thanks briefly and the meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

The total strength of the Association to-day is 14 scout officers and 122 scouts, 5 Wolf Cub officers and 166 Cubs, and 14 Rovers, being a grand total of 19 officers and 302 boys, as compared with 13 scout officers and 140 scouts and 5 Cub officers and 150 Cubs at the time of the last annual meeting.

CORRESPONDENCE

MORAL WELFARE.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The report given in last week's Municipal Gazette, and signed by the Deputy Commissioner of Police, is very timely and illuminating, and it deserves careful consideration. It is not to be expected that all will view it in the same light, and individuals will select the items with which they agree, or disagree; but so long as serious thought is stimulated, the outcome will be salutary, even though opinions differ.

I should be glad to find myself mistaken, but it seems to me that the report is biassed against the elimination policy of the past three or four years. We are told that if among the aims has been "the improvement of public morality, then, of course, the measures adopted at the instance of the Ratepayers have been a failure." The "of course" is very significant, and it speaks for itself! The official mind seems to have been fully made up that the present policy is not a good one, and it is confirmed in that view because, among other things, it lessens the "control" so dear to officialdom all the world over, and it also breaks up "news centres where valuable information was often obtained by the Police."

Our Deputy Commissioner is, however, on ground of common agreement when saying "It is quite impossible to say how far present vice conditions in Shanghai are attributable to those measures and how far they are the outcome of events."

Considering the way the report opens, I am agreeably surprised to find how many indications it contains that things are not as bad as some had supposed, and that in fact the gains by the present policy outweigh the losses. It is frankly admitted that "commercialized vice" has diminished, and that there has been an automatic decrease of deliberate exploitation of prostitutes for profit. Also "from the humanitarian standpoint, the Council's measures have certainly effected an improvement." The girls who remain receive better treatment than they used to get; and we read of "emancipated prostitutes" whose conditions of living are better than those obtaining in brothels. These are results which must surely be gratifying to all who care for our less fortunate fellow-creatures; and they are results which would not have been seen apart from the measures which are said to have proved a failure. There is also less street rowdyism requiring the attention of the police, which is also something to be thankful for.

On the other side, we are told that prostitution in the Settlement has not decreased; but the official voice does not say it has increased during the past five years. Now, seeing that the population increases by over 100,000 during five years, and that no increase in the number of prostitutes is declared, (leaving aside for the moment foreign additions from other causes), there is justification for believing that things have actually improved. Further, as hundreds of brothels have been closed, and it is stated that some former inmates now take their customers to places outside the Settlement, and touts are found in Foochow Road offering to take men to distant places, instead of the girls being near by, it is open to us to believe that the probabilities are that prostitution has decreased in this Settlement. At any rate there is agreement that prostitution is less in evidence than it used to be, and soliciting has decreased in the most prominent places, while it is said to remain "about the same" in others. Our observations show a decided diminution in some of the less frequented places. It is a pity it has increased in places of amusement; but it was always there and it is doubtful if it has increased in anything like the way it has decreased on the streets. Arrests for solicitation are now fewer, and I have regarded that as an indication that things were improving, or that the police were less active, and my belief has been the former; does the police report want us now to believe the latter?

There is admittedly some risk as regards arrests for solicitation; but what can be said in excuse of clause 3, where it is openly admitted that it is known—through some 20 senior officers—that "prostitution is carried on to a greater extent on licensed premises than before"? The licence conditions forbid this, and yet appearently nothing happens. This defiance of law and laxity of action have nothing to do with the new policy, as they existed previously, and they are a standing reproach.

Much might be said about increased activities in public parks, referring to foreigners; but it may be sufficient here to regard them as largely "the outcome of events" in the words of the report. The new policy cannot be blamed for an influx due to quite other causes.

The Vice Commission's recommendations undoubtedly aimed at the improvement of public morality; to this end 16 recommendations were adopted, but the present report is concerned chiefly with only two of the items. Some of the other points have been attended to, but it would be interesting to know how far others are being carried out. To refresh memories, let me quote a few:—

3. That special notification be given to all registered owners of brothel property in order to endeavour to get their co-operation.
6. That the law against street soliciting be strictly enforced.
7. That the law prohibiting indecent advertisements by way of posters or in newspapers be strictly enforced.
11. That parks and other open spaces be well-lighted and policed in the summer months.
14. That propaganada be undertaken by the Health Department relating to the evils of promiscuous intercourse and the dangers arising therefrom.

I cannot trespass on your space to discuss all these, but they have a vital relation to the policy now questioned. If there in increased solicitation, or even if it is "about the same," it is strange, in view of point 6 above, that in this great city an average of less than two cases per night are charged. Then what has been done under point 14? As regards point 7, it is, of course, easy to quibble as to what is "indecent;" but to take a dictionary meaning of "offending against modesty or delicacy," it may be said that there are thousands of Chinese posters placarding our streets which, if translated into English, would be found objectionable and repulsive to people; they would not be tolerated for a day in London. Then, from the point of view of public morality, I believe hundreds of people are daily nauseated by the indelicate and suggestive advts. and pictures in our newspapers and on the hoardings; and what of the nightly revels the notices of which are daily thrust upon our attention, in language often bordering on the vulgar, to say the least, as the newspapers pass round our families? Street posters seem to vie with one another as incentives to passion. Are these things better or worse within the last five years, and do they come within the scope of the Council's "measures"? Can public morality be expected to improve while these things continue? Who raises a voice of protest against the downgrade tendencies, or what paper dares to stem the tide in its advertisements? There are many critics of those who try to make things better, and any plea or plan for improvement is frowned at or scouted by some, while the glaring incentives to folly and vice are passed by in silence—a silence which does us little credit as a community.

The police, and all who are honestly trying to improve things instead of letting them become worse, need the encouragement and help of those who care about morality at all, and I believe they are many. Just which are the best methods for our particular problems we shall only learn by experiments, and let us try these with faith and patience, and with mutual forebearance; along these lines we may still venture to be optimistic.

Sir,—Regarding the letter from "Laissez Faire" on Moral Welfare, did you fail to see that he was writing sarcastically? I imagine that it was a member of the Moral Welfare League who wrote thus, in somewhat bitter irony ridiculing the arguments of those who insist that because a law is violated, or is found difficult to enforce, it had better be withdrawn from the statute books.

The whole difficulty with this matter is, as with the enforcing of Prohibition, whether of liquor selling or of opium smoking, there is need always of an educated public sentiment to back up the law. As long as a large part of the community wants these things, and even thinks it their right to have them, the prohibition of them will not be completely enforced.

Progress whether in civilization, culture, or morals, does not come all of a sudden; the world will not grow better over-night; and all we need is patient endeavour, education, publicity, preaching, and the gospel of Jesus Christ in the hearts of men and women; and all will come well in time.

I do not agree with you that the Moral Welfare League's policy has been proved a failure. If you editors of newspapers will help as much as you reasonably can, it may yet prove a glorious success.

Shanghai, March 12, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—There is nothing new about prostitution or the methods of those who indulge in extra-marital relations but the measures new to Shanghai and introduced with a view to lessening the evil trade have forced those who support it to adopt newer methods in order to come in contact with those they seek. The man who was wont to visit a brothel wherein resided many women, is now forced to look for one in the street and take her to a hotel or visit a small house wherein reside only one or two. As the Deputy Commissioner of Police has said and all clear thinking people realize there is just as much prostitution in Shanghai before the new order for suppression became active.

"Laissez Faire's" suggestion that we should wipe out all laws relating to suppression because it does not succeed is surely the utterance of a feeble mind. He might as well suggest that we should do away with pure food acts or laws because there is still a lot of impure food about or allow every vendor of milk to adulterate it with water because some do so.

Laws of suppression are always useful, but if it is worth while they will be evaded by some and it only remains that they should be made reasonable remembering always that laws are made for the people and not the people for the laws.

Drastic measures bring discredit and disorganization in their train and in this Model Settlement we want more than dispersal of prostitution, we want not to find it at every turn, but confined to limited areas.

THE FIRE AT CHOUTSUN.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In your issue of March 6, appeared an account of "an appalling fire near Tsinanfu,—Choutsun being destroyed by fire etc." March 8, you publish a further account.—this time from your "own correspondent," and in your issue of March 9, you again refer to the "destruction of Choutsun."

The first account amused us, the second amazed us; the third annoyed us. Eight days having elapsed between the fire and this third account, and as Choutsun is only a few hours journey by train from Tsingtao, surely your "own correspondent" might have ascertained the truth,—or otherwise,—of the reports. Having given such publicity to the false reports supplied by Tsingtao, I hope you will give equal publicity to the truth now supplied by Choutsun! I have been closely associated with the city for over 30 years and a resident for 20 years, and send you herewith facts.

I may say also I have been a subscriber to your paper for some 35 years, and rely on it to give me news of the outside world. After reading these most inaccurate and grossly exaggerated accounts, my confidence has received a rude shock, and I wonder now how much fiction of a similar sort I have swallowed during this time! I shall certainly discount any further news appearing under the heading "Reuter's Pacific Service" and "Your own correspondent" at Tsingtao!

I am, etc.,
E. M. SMYTH.

Choutsun, Sung. Mar. 12, 1924.

FICTION.

"Choutsun destroyed by fire.
200 shops and houses destroyed.
More than 300 people lost their lives.
Many roasted while asleep.
One eighth of population on the casualty list.
Thousands homeless.
Suffering from hunger intense
Corpses strew the streets
Bandits swooped down on the city
Colonel Mai arrested the Tuchun's son
Colonel Mai disbanded his troops and fled
His soldiers looted the town."

FACT.

About 40 shops were burnt out
Not one life was lost
Only caretakers sleeping on the premises. Not one was roasted.
Have only heard of one "bandit" here, and his head was off before the fire.
Broke out, and may be seen in a basket outside the North gate of the city
Nobody here knows anything about Colonel Mai arresting etc., etc.
The soldiers not only did Not loot the town, but kept splendid order, and Guarded the property of the shopkeepers as it was got out of the burning buildings.
No looting whatever
Débris is being quickly carted away, and contracts being made for rebuilding by the people who, according to your "own correspondent" were killed, injured, roasted, stripped, looted, and famished!

Later.

Further to my letter of this morning Choutsun is not a "village," but a big city. There are 18 adult foreigners residing here. We have a fine modern foreign hospital, with two foreign doctors, and a staff of foreign and native nurses. As I live at one end of the city and the Hospital is the other, I sent over to ask how many patients had been admitted as a result of the fire! I enclose you Dr. Fleming's reply.

Wild rumours and false reports like those sent you by your "own correspondent" do a great deal of harm, and I hope you will either change your "own correspondent" or at any rate warn him (or her?) to be more careful.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The report which Reuters has been giving you regarding the fire in Choutsun are the products of either a wild imagination or of malice. I have just read the account in your issue of March 10, and aside from the fact that there was a fire in Choutsun on the date indicated, none of the other statements therein are remotely related to the truth.

I was in Choutsun shortly after the fire. About 30 shops in a busy street were burned out. No lives were lost so far as I could learn. Not one injured person the report of the Social Service Board of which she is Chairman. The Board deals with the philanthropic side of the B. W. A. and consists of 20 members including officers. Funds are derived from various sources. The Race Club has twice during the year sent a generous donation of $1,500. The Dramatic and Gardening Sections have also made substantial contributions and donations have been sent by individual members of the Association. Financial help has been given during the year to distressed British women and children in the form of board and lodging, school and training fees, hospital fees and part payment of passages.

Part of the maintenance of an Englishman dying of tuberculosis was paid and a special contribution was made towards the cost of the Xmas dinner given to men of the Merchant Service by the Association.

Other nationalities have been helped by a contribution at Xmas to the Foreign Women's Home and the Soup Kitchen for Russians. The Foreign Women's Home was further assisted by the organization of a Gift Stall at the recent Linen Sale which realized the sum of $196.

Appeals for help from various institutions organised by foreigners for Chinese are constantly received and carefully considered but in the majority of cases financial help is withheld, as it is felt that the Fund at disposal is held in trust primarily for the benefit of distressed members of the British Community. Sympathy has, however, been expressed when possible by small contributions to such institutions as the Salvation Army Home for Girls in Peking, and the Mixed Court Home in Shanghai under the direction of the Moral Welfare League.

In addition to this the Board is in touch with the interests of Chinese through representatives on the Committee of the Institution for Chinese Blind, the Joint Industrial Committee of the Women's Clubs in Shanghai, the International Relations Committee, the Y. W. C. A. and the Moral Welfare League.

The Hospital Aid Department, which meets for a whole day every week at Headquarters continues to send out a regular supply of hospitals requisited to 49 Mission Hospitals throughout China. Eighty parcels have been despatched during the year containing 16,220 articles. Bandages of every sort, towels, sheets, pads and clothing have been sent, even blankets were obtained at special prices and sent to a hospital looted by bandits.

The Fund for materials is provided by a regular donation of $50. a month from the Social Service Board and by private contributions. Gifts in the form of old linen etc., have been gratefully received.

HOSPITAL VISITING COMMITTEE.

The British hospitals were visited regularly during the past year with the exception of a few weeks during the summer.

Fifty to seventy patients have often been visited in one afternoon and the patients without means were supplied with small luxuries such as fruit, biscuits, wine and cigarettes, also necessary clothing before leaving hospital. Flowers, books and magazines were greatly appreciated and gifts of warm garments, sweets and cigarettes were given to 147 patients on Xmas Day. Work was found for a number of men, and destitute British are kept in touch with as far as possible.

EMERGENCY CORPS.

A scheme is being prepared for the organization of women in the case of any emergency arising in Shanghai. The details of this scheme are not for publication but the Social Service Board was approached with a view to enrolling members of the Social Service League for domestic work should occasion arise.

Four staff were undertaken during the Fiscal by this Board and numerous contributions made both by members of the B. W. A. and friends outside the Association, including beer. The total amount raised was $5,159.

THE RESIDENCE SCHEME.

Mrs. H. P. Wilkinson then read a report on the progress of the Residence scheme. The "Fayre", the idea of which was originated by Mrs. Craddock and Mrs. E. E. Parsons, had resulted in a very handsome profit towards this project. The Residence Committee and Mr. Maurice Benjamin had recently held a meeting together, at which the possibilities of a residence had been fully explored. The main outlines had been laid before the Executive Committee, but it was as yet impossible to be explicit.

The accounts were passed by the meeting.

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF HEADQUARTERS.

Mrs. Gull then presented on behalf of Mr. Maurice Benjamin details of a scheme drawn up on the most generous lines imaginable for the advancement and betterment of the British Women's Association. She pointed out whereas in this central district one room similar, say, to their present tea room, would be assessed ordinarily at something like Tls. 55 a month, they were paying under Tls. 27 per month a room while they had the use of five or six attic rooms for nothing at all. Mr. Benjamin's present scheme (subject to constructional modification and alteration as occasion may arise) was as follows:—

Mr. Benjamin proposes to carry the B. W. A. Headquarters through into the adjoining houses on either side of the present quarters and thus to provide for us a magnificent hall for entertainments exhibitions, meetings, etc., measuring no less than 70 feet in length, access to which will be from our present lobby, which will be reached frim the street by means of a lift as well as by the present staircase. Where the attics now are, is going to be considerably transformed, the sloping ceilings to be made flat and the entire space over all three houses to be made into bedrooms, bathrooms, etc. It is just on the cards that another floor of bedrooms will be added, but that is by the way.

On the western side, corresponding with the entertainment hall, the 70 foot length will probably be arranged as a dining room or restaurant, available both for members and residents, as well as kitchen, serving room and scullery. The present tea room will perhaps turn into a cosy sitting room while the reading room will remain as such. The old Committee room is already converted into a secretarial office and a board room, thus bringing the working part of the organization on to one floor in a compact and convenient fashion. As to how many bedrooms there will be, we cannot yet tell; there may be 12 or there may be 15. The rent for the whole is, owing to Mr. Benjamin's munificence, to remain at the old figure of about $1600 per annum.

Owing to the princely generosity of Mr. Benjamin, we seem to be in a fair way to obtaining all that we have ever dreamed of for our Association.

A PRACTICAL TEST.

Mr. Benjamin's scheme will enable us to experiment under the favourable conditions in regard to residential headquarters. He has propounded a pretty considerable financial scheme which will, (if, after testing our residential scheme we avail ourselves of it,) ensure our future financial stability and independence. This scheme has the full and unstinted approval of our financial adviser, Mr. Stitt.

One point Mr. Benjamin particularly wishes me to make clear is that he may be obliged to modify and alter his plans from time to time and must retain freedom to do this as he sees fit. He has stipulated, as you have heard, for a small committee of the B. W. A. Chairman, Mrs. Green and Mrs. Wilkinson to assist him in consultation and has promised to report progress to the members at frequent intervals.

Mr. Gull then proceeded to deal with the work of the Sections in detail. These are too long to give fully and as regular notes on these have appeared through out the year a few notes must suffice.

The Gardening Section with Mrs. Craddock as its Chairman, ends the year with 161 members, less than at the termination of the last year. The Section shows an excellent record with 15 meetings and two flowershows held during the year, the lectures and demonstrations having been well attended.

The membership of the Sports Section, with Mrs. Bichard at its head, is about 100. The annual tennis tournament was played off in September. Hockey began in November and practices take place weekly at the Race Club, several matches, including one with the Men's Junior Hockey Club having been played. Some 15 members play Badminton at the Girls Public School in Boone Road on three afternoons each week.

The Literary Section, with Mrs. Hodges as its Chairman, remains stable with just over 100 members, and has held 12 meetings during the past 12 months, at which papers on current events and on Chinese subjects have been read.

One has to congratulate the Musical Section, with its membership of 123, under the able guidance of Mrs. N. G. Maitland, on an excellent year's work. The Section gives one musical afternoon a month at Headquarters, and they also provide an hour's musical programme for members of the Y.W.C.A. on the first Friday in each month.

There is a decided falling off in the membership of the Art Section, which last year numbered 82 members, against this year's 50. But numbers in this instance by no means represent vitality, under the capable chairmanship of Mrs. R. J. Roberts, the section is actually in quite as flourishing a condition as it has ever been. The recent exhibition of pictures at Headquarters was voted by everyone who saw it as being a great advance on previous shows, and no less than 25% of the pictures shown found purchasers.

Members of the Dramatic Section, numbering 124, have re-elected Mrs. Alister Campbell on her return from England, to be Chairman for the ensuing session. Mrs. Cochrane, after a most successful term, having relinquished this office on her departure from Shanghai. Financially, as well as artistically, the Section has had a distinctly successful year, the balance in hand at the end of December last being $933.34.

The Needlework Section makes up by industry what it lacks in numbers, 38 members, with an average attendance of 12.7 forming the total under the energetic chairmanship of Mrs. D. Lewis. The balance to its credit at the end of last year was about $740: and a donation of $30: was made to the B.W.A. Christmas dinner to merchant sailors at the Hanbury Institute.

No department merits higher praise than the Entertainment Committee, under the able leadership of Mrs. Craddock, they have reduced the running of tea-parties to a fine art. They have considerably added to equipment during the past year and now now own property to the value of about $360: Mrs. A. J. Stewart has been appointed Hon. Treasurer in place of Miss Thomson, resigned.

SUBSCRIPTION INCREASED TO $5.

Mrs. Craddock moved:

That the subscription to the B. W. A. be increased from $3 to $5 per annum.

She pointed out that the expenses of the Association were very much heavier than since its formation. Three years ago they had no rent to pay, no wages excepting those of the "boy," and most of their furniture was lent. To-day they had wages to pay, rent and furniture to provide. Had it not been for that 15 per cent. from the profits of the Fayre she did not know what they would have done: they would simply have been in a condition of bankruptcy. Expenses at Headquarters were very heavy indeed, and although the extra $2 per year from each member would not pay everything, yet it would go a long way. The plea would doubtless be put forward that many of their members would not be able to afford the extra demand on their pockets, but she would remind them that $5 was not very much spread over the whole year, especially when they considered the return they had for the money expended. It was up to them to become self-supporting, like their American sisters, and not to content themselves with remaining in a condition of perennial bankruptcy.

Miss Cardwell seconded the motion and identified herself with the remarks made by the previous speaker.

Mrs. McGillivray, leader of the opposition, warned the meeting that by increasing their subscription they would bound to drive some members from their ranks,—one of the last things they should wish to do. The association was formed originally with certain high ideals of service, and with the idea of providing a meeting place where every British woman, no matter what her position, could meet her British sisters on terms of equality. By imposing the $5 subscription they would prevent this and set foot on the road which led to the degeneration of the Association simply to a club for the more wealthy members. Some there were who said that the present system savoured of "charity," putting the accent on the word charity which had been the means of its degeneration to what it stood for to-day, and forgetting the three great principals of Life laid down in the Bible, "Faith, Hope and Charity,—and the greatest of these is charity." If they wished to make their Association into a club they would have to change its whole constitution. She thought possibly they were getting too luxurious and wanting too much. If they were to have these fine new premises with dining-room, baths, sleeping rooms, etc., they should he made to pay for themselves and the burden should not be allowed to fall on the members.

The subject was discussed at length, opinions being given freely on both sides.

When the resolution was put to the vote, however, it was carried by an overwhelming majority

THE COMMITTEE.

The following were elected to the Executive Committee:

Miss Ayrton, Mrs. Byrne, Mrs. Darroch, Mrs. Dovey, Mrs. Graham Barrow, Mrs. Green, Mrs. Gull, Miss Hyland, Mrs. Irwine, Mrs. Leslie, Mrs. Matheson, Miss Mayhew, Mrs. McMichael, Miss Murphy, Mrs. Alex Samson, Mrs. Symons, Mrs. R. E. Toeg and Mrs. H. P. Wilkinson.

The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

SHANGHAI RATEPAYERS ASSOCIATION

Decision in Favour of Continuing in Existence Carried Unanimously

The annual meeting of the Shanghai Ratepayers' Association, adjourned from last month in order that the question of continued existence might be debated, was concluded at the Royal Asiatic Society Hall last Friday, when it was decided that the Association should be continued.

The chair was taken by Mr. A. J. Hughes, supported by Messrs. G. E. Peet, H. Browett, Campbell Henderson (hon. sec.) Isaac Mason and V. J. S. Rumble. The attendance was considerably larger than at the previous meeting.

The Chairman reminded those present that the last meeting had been adjourned in order that public opinion might form itself on the subject of the continuation or otherwise of their association. After very careful consideration the committee had come to the conclusion that they should continue. In spite of their apparently small membership the committee felt that they had no right to destroy an admirably conceived and properly constituted association of ratepayers such as their's was. It might in time become a factor of great importance in conserving and safeguarding the best interests of both ratepayers and residents of the Settlement. The very existence of the Association was undoubtedly having a salutary effect on the conduct of the affairs of the administration.—(hear, hear). As proof of this they could point to the tremendous improvement in Shanghai's deplorable traffic conditions after their representations. They had held many public meetings on the matter and recommended the forming of a traffic commission. The result was that more had been done during the past year than during the five previous years put together.

The Chairman went on to descibe the improvements in the way of the widening of Broadway and Kiukiang Roads, both on the advice of the Association. They never knew when their services would be needed to meet a crisis, and it was a great thing to have a properly constituted body of ratepayers, even though with a skeleton membership only on which to build, to meet the emergency when it should arise.

He proposed, therefore:

"That it be resolved that in the opinion of this meeting the Shanghai Ratepayers' Association be continued."

Mr. T. M. Yates seconded, and remarked that Mr. Hughes, in obtaining 288 votes in the Municipal elections, gave them encouragement to proceed.

CHANGE OF NAME SUGGESTED.

Mr. Shipway proposed as an amendment that the words "and that the name be changed to The Shanghai Progressive Society." be added. He expressed the opinion that their present title was misleading inasmuch as people who were not actual ratepayers would not join and asked what right they had, not being ratepayers, to interfere in Municipal affairs. Their Association admitted any resident whether he was a ratepayer or not. Then again, he thought there was much they could do, were they not so restricted by their present name. He had just returned from upcountry and it frequently struck him what terrible conditions the Chinese in some of the poorer quarters of Shanghai had to live in. With a rather wider name and increased membership they could do something to remedy that sort of thing, in such ways as restricting the number of people allowed to live in one room. It was appalling to peep into some of the dark and dirty dens the poorer class of Chinese occupied.

The Chairman, while agreeing with much that the speaker had said, was of opinion that by widening their activities they were apt to weaken themselves for the primary purpose for which the Association was formed.

The amendment was not seconded and the original resolution was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

SUBSCRIPTION REDUCED.

The election of a committee was then proceeded with and the following were appointed:

Dr. Margaret Polk, Miss J. Ward and Messrs. A. J. Hughes, G. E. Peet, H. Browett, P. W. Goldring, Z. C. Chen, Isaac Mason, V. J. S. Rumble, Campbell Henderson, T. Sahara, T. M. Yates, N. A. Viloudaky and T. W. Bowern.

This concluded the business of the annual meeting and a special meeting followed for the purpose of making a number of small alterations in the constitution of the association, chief of which was the reduction of the annual subscription from $5 to $2.

THE SHANGHAI LAWN TENNIS ASSN.

The Annual Meeting

The annual meeting of the Shanghai Lawn Tennis Association was held last Friday afternoon at the Cathodral School for Boys. Sir Skinner Turner (the President) was in the chair and there were also present Mr. C. E. Whitamore (hon. secretary) and the following delegates from various clubs:—Messrs. M. B. Brown, E. G. Norman, C. G. Humphrys, J. L. Wade, J. Ebsens, F. A. Leitao and H. J. Jefferson.

The accounts, which were passed, showed that, although the Association had an overdraft, the amount was more than balanced by assets. Last year over $5,000 were taken in gate money. The recipts at the Roper Cup matches were particularly satisfactory, owing to the fine attendance at the matches with the Japanese.

Sir Skinner Turner was re-elected President, Mr. C. W. Atkinson Vice-President and Mr. M. B. Brown hon. secretary.

Miscellaneous matters were discussed. It was decided that the Slazenger ball should be the official ball for the season and

LAW REPORTS

COMPANY'S "DUAL EXISTENCE"

British-registered Co.'s Property Held by Chinese Court: Sued for Tls. 56,570

In H. M. Supreme Court, on Tuesday, before his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner, the Kiangnan Dock & Engineering Works brought an action against the Hing Wha Paste Manufacturing Co., claiming Tls. 56,570 balance due on a contract for the supply of machinery, interest at 8 per cent., Tls. 622 for the wages of watchmen, and a declaration that the machinery is the property of the plaintiffs. Mr. J. H. Teesdale appeared for the plaintiffs and Mr. C. Mansel Reece for the liquidator of the defendant company.

Mr. Reece said he understood that there would be an application for judgment by default. The customary notice as to liquidation had been inserted in the local Press and it was assumed that after that the liquidation would go forward in the ordinary way, therefore he applied for a stay of proceeding so that the liquidation might pursue its course. The company was in voluntary liquidation. The matter had become rather complicated owing to the fact that the Chinese had stepped in and taken possession of the property, all of which was in Shanghai, although the proceedings for liquidation had been taken in Hongkong.

Mr. Teesdale said that the writ was dated April, 1923, but it was only served two months ago. Considerably more than a month had passed since the liquidator was given an opportunity to file a defence, but this had not been done, whilst Mr. Reece apparently had received no instructions whatever from the liquidator, nor had the latter taken any steps to protect the property in Shanghai. The company ought to be wound up here, as all the assets were here and there was no property in Hongkong.

Mr. Reece—We hold a power of attorney from the liquidator in Hongkong and we had instructions to apply to the Chinese Court for an order that all actions be stayed there. They refused to hear our application, so we appealed to Soochow, but there also they would not hear us. The Chinese Court is holding the property, which consists of two flour mills. The Chinese Court ordered that the property should be put up to auction.

JUDGE'S SURPRISE.

The Judge—How can they, if it is a British company?

Mr. Reece—That is what I should like to know. There is no foreign element and they are all Chinese, but it is a British company. There are various big creditors on a list which is recognized by the Chinese Court.

The Judge—How can they recognize it?

Mr. Reece—But what can we do? The Chinese Court refuses to hear us.

The Judge—I believe this is the company that previously was stated to have a dual existence, being registered in Hongkong and also in Peking.

Mr. Reece—I know I am out of time, but what can we do? I have been hoping to get some satisfaction out of the Chinese Court and further instructions from Hongkong. The company is in a very bad way and I do not suppose there is a chance of it paying more than 40 per cent. The Chinese Court holds the property and nothing can be done about it. I cannot make out what the procedure has been. There do not seem to have been any actions, but the Chinese Court simply walked in and took the property.

Mr. Teesdale—There is no seal of the Chinese Court on our property, whatever there may be on anything else, so our property is outside their jurisdiction. Our watchmen are in charge of it.

The Judge refused Mr. Reece's application and ordered that the case should proceed.

Mr. Kwong Kwok-wha, a director of the plaintiff company, said that a first instalment of Tls. 25,666 had been paid on the machinery, but nothing more. The machinery was in a mill beyond Ferry Road, in Chinese territory. It was in the charge of plaintiffs' watchmen and painted on the boiler was an inscription declaring that it was the property of the plaintiffs and must not be mortgaged to others. No claim to the machinery had been made by any other party and he had received a letter from the Chinese Court stating that they did not claim it as part of the property of the mill.

Judgment was given for the full claim, with costs. His Lordship said that he could not make a declaration as to ownership, for it seemed that the plaintiffs already had possession, but he directed that, if the judgment had not been satisfied in 14 days, the plaintiffs could remove or sell the machinery, it being understood that they would account for the first instalment paid by the defendants.

A DIRTY DINNER PLATE

And Angry Steward: Ship's Officer Assaulted and His Forehead Cut Open

An altercation between a ship's officer and chief steward over a dirty plate, in which both used bad language and the steward threw a plate at his superior, led to the appearance before Mr. G. W. King at H.M. Police Court, last Friday of an elderly man named John Edwards, charged with assault.

Prosecutor, Mr. Thomas Ferguson, Chief Officer of the str. Dundrennan, was represented by Mr. T. S. Lewis.

Mr. Ferguson's story was that he noticed that his dessert plate was dirty. He passed it up to the skipper for his opinion and the skipper agreed with him and called in the defendant. Then, "in a sarcastic voice" he said: "Mr. Ferguson objects to this plate." The steward picked it up, looked at it, proclaimed that it was not dirty and walked away with it. He added that he had washed it only that breakfast time, whereupon witness called him a liar, "or words to that effect." The steward retaliated by calling the officer a—"liar" and then walked out to his pantry. Ferguson followed and asked how he dared call him a liar. He had only put his head inside the pantry when something came hurtling at him. He afterwards had reason to believe the implement to be a plate but was not sure. His forehead was cut open, and he closed with his assailant till assistance came from the saloon. He was taken to the cabin of the second officer and afterwards the Water Police took him to hospital.

OFFICER'S INJURIES.

Dr. B. H. Stanley Aylward said he was called in to dress the officer's head at the General Hospital on Wednesday evening. He found him suffering from a long semi-circular and jagged cut over the left eye, which might well have been caused by a plate. He also had other small cuts about the head. He did not think the officer would be fit to go to sea for the next two or three weeks and he most certainly could not be allowed to sail with the ship. The wound was highly septic and should have medical attention for some time.

Asked by the Magistrate whether he had trouble with defendant before Ferguson said he had several times had to call attention to dirty crockery and dirty food.

Defendant called Capt. Robert Shadforth, master of the ship, as first witness. Captain Shadforth added little to the story of the Chief Officer, however.

Edward's story was that he went to the cabin on the Wednesday morning while the officers were being vaccinated. The doctor who was vaccinating dropped some of his cigarette ash on to the plate in question, and when he had gone witness laid the table again. He picked up the plate, wiped it with the towel and then set it down. It was true the ash smeared over the surface, but it was not true that he had not washed the plate since breakfast time. Had the officer pointed out the smear he would have washed it or brought another plate. He did not do that, but called witness a "d—liar" and witness retaliated by calling him a "b—liar." Then he went to the pantry where he was followed by Ferguson, in a towering passion. The officer asked him whether he would repeat that he was a liar, but before witness had time to reply struck him a violent blow which fortunately glanced off his forehead. He struck at him twice more, but missed and witness replied with three blows of the fist which did not miss. The injuries to the officer's head must have been received in contact with the mahogany plate rack. He would not have thought of hitting him first, because he was an officer of the ship.

Asked by the Magistrate why he thought Ferguson should take the trouble to go into the witness box and lie about him, Edwards replied in an emphatic tone: "Because he is bad." He added that when he thought it over quietly the Chief would realize his mistake.

The Magistrate came to the conclusion that of the two stories the officer's was the true one. Defendant would be fined $20 and pay $20 costs, or go to prison for a week in default.

DISOBEDIENT SEAMEN

Firemen in the Str. Misty Law Fined by British Magistrate

J. H. de Jonge, H. M. Pleydell, and A. Penders, firemen on the str. Misty Law, appeared before Mr. G. W. King on Monday charged with having refused to obey the lawful commands of the Master of the ship.

Captain W. Wright told the court that on Saturday morning the three men came to him and said they had finished and would do no more work on board, after which they all went ashore. They returned at 4.30 and demanded money but, in the circumstances, witness refused to pay them. They were all good men at sea and had not previously given trouble.

His Worship—Then why do you charge them?

Captain Wright—The whole crowd was in the same more or less drunken condition and, as discipline has got to be maintained, I must make an example of some of them.

The defendants, who denied that they had refused duty, spoke of a general demand from the stokehold for money, and of other men going off duty.

His Worship fined each of them two days' pay and gave a hint that further trouble might lead to imprisonment.

TWO SIKH GRANTHIS IN THE DOCK

A Charge of Appropriating the Ghee Fund: A Threatened Action Against S. M. C.

H. M. Police Court on Wednesday was again packed to the limits with an excited gathering of Sikhs, all anxious to hear the proceedings following upon the arrest of two former Granthis of the North Szechuen Road Gurdwara on a charge of fraudulently converting to their own use $910, the property of members of the Sikh police. Mr. E. T. Maitland prosecuted on behalf of the police, and the defendants, Sucha Singh and Amar Singh, were not represented by Counsel.

Mr. Maitland said that the defendants formerly were Granthis in the Sikh Gurdwara in North Szechuen Road and on February 1 they resigned. As part of their duties they were entrusted with a special Sikh police fund for the purchase of ghee a kind of purified butter. They collected $910.7 which was not paid in to the account. They had only to collect the money and were not concerned with how it was used. They had simply to pay it to the treasurer and cheques on the fund were drawn by a superior officer of the Sikh police.

Detective Sub-Inspector Yorke said that the defendants surrendered at the Central Police Station. They were looking for witness whilst he was looking for them and Sucha Singh telephoned to witness to say he would come to the police station.

Buddha Singh, Jemadar of the Sikh Police, said the defendants were Granthis from about December, 1921, until December 9 last year, when they were dismissed by the committee and they officially resigned on February 1. Members of the Sikh police committee collected money for the ghee fund. Every month about 200 tins of ghee were ordered from Calcutta and when a consignment arrived a senior Havildar would take it to the Gurdwara. Then the senior Havildar opened the cargo, branded the tins and divided them amongst the stations, leaving some at the Gurdwara to be sold through the Granthis. The money for these latter purchases was collected amongst the police and handed to the Granthis, who were supposed to give it to the treasurer. The Granthis did not have to make any payments themselves. Witness was the only person entitled to sanction payments and he personally drew cheques for the sums required.

Cross-examined — The defendants were engaged from India as permanent Granthis at North Szechuen Road Gurdwara. When they arrived, Sucha Singh temporarily was employed as Granthis at Gordon Road, receiving $50 per month paid by the Municipal Council. Then both were taken to North Szechuen Road at the same pay, $35 being paid by the Gurdwara and $15 by the Municipal Council.

The Magistrate interrupted a string of apparently irrelevant questions, upon which Sucha Singh said it all centred round the defendants' intention to bring actions against the Municipal Council and the Gurdwara over their dismissal.

The interpreter said Amar Singh wanted to ask a lot of questions but "he say no can without his liar."

The Magistrate—without his liar!

Mr. Maitland—I think he means a lawyer. I know the two terms sometimes are confused.

The hearing was adjourned.

THE ROWARTH TRIAL PERJURY CHARGES

Alleged Attempt to Defeat the Ends of Justice by Means of False Evidence: The Missing Amah's Evidence: Goulbourn in the Police Court

The young amah whose absence from the Rowarth trial was the subject of comment by the prosecution was an important witness on Thursday when W. H. Goulbourn, accountant, appeared on remand at H.M. Police Court, before Mr. G. W. King, on a charge of perjury. It is alleged that he knowingly and falsely swore in the Supreme Court that the then accused, Judith Rowarth, did not leave her daughter's house before 8.30 on the evening of May 4. The prosecution also charges Goulbourn, with others not yet in custody, with attempting to defeat the ends of justice by keeping a material witness in hiding and from appearing at the trial of Mrs. Rowarth on a charge of attempted murder.

Mr. E. T. Maitland conducted the prosecution and Mr. Mansel Reece appeared for the defence.

In opening the case, Mr. Maitland said the accused was the son of Mrs. Rowarth, and a Mrs. Maggie Davies, alleged to have been concerned in the conspiracy, was her daughter. The charge against Mrs. Rowarth was that, with persons unknown, she attempted to murder a Sikh money-lender named Pakha Singh, the crime taking place on May 4 and the trial on June 28. The story told at the trial was that on the evening of May 4, between 7.30 and 8 o'clock, Mrs. Rowarth and the Chinese amah went to Pakha's house and telling him they knew the address of a person who owed him money, persuaded him to accompany them to the place. The Indian was taken to a lonely spot near Ward Road Gaol and was there attacked by some Chinese and left for dead, Mrs. Rowarth and the amah running away. One Hassan Ali gave evidence that he was at Pakha's house when the two women called, but unfortunately this man had now left Shanghai. The amah was never found. The defence put up an alibi that on the evening in question Mrs. Rowarth never left her daughter's house except to go to the cinema after dinner. Mrs. Rowarth swore this herself, and so did Mrs. Davies, who went on to say: "There was nothing extraordinary about Mrs. Rowarth. She was there all the time up to and during supper, after which six or seven people went to the Isis." She said she had no doubt as to the date, and this was a very material and important statement. The police had now found the amah who went with Mrs. Rowarth, and the girl would tell the Court how she went into the country with the accused woman and the Indian, having been told to say that she knew where they were going. After the affair, she ran back to Mrs. Rowarth's house and found the old woman already there. A week later, Mrs. Rowarth and Mrs. Davies took the amah to a house in Chaoufoong Road Extension, where a room was rented for her, she being told that it was not good for her to go out too often because she was a young girl and should not be seen out too much. She was kept there in that room and was occasionally visited by Mrs. Davies and Mrs. Rowarth. They paid for her room, bought her rice and gave her sweets, and the police were unable to find the girl until quite recently. It was clearly a case in which perjury had been committed.

His Worship—How does the accused come into the charge of conspiracy?

Mr. Maitland—I do not propose to go into the case to-day.

Det.-Sub-Inspector Quayle, who at the first hearing gave formal evidence of arrest, was recalled and questioned as to the trial of Mrs. Rowarth in H.M. Supreme Court. On that occasion, Goulbourn gave evidence that Mrs. Rowarth never left the house of her daughter (Mrs. Davies) on the night the Indian was assaulted.

His Worship—Did he give the exact date?

Witness—The only date in question was May 4, the date on which the assault took place. Goulbourn further stated (witness continued) that Mrs. Rowarth never left between 7.30 and 8.30 p.m., and that at that hour dinner was served, at which Mrs. Rowarth was present. He added that he was sure about the date and could remember it because of some function which had taken place at the Portuguese Club.

Cross-examined by Mr. Mansel Reece, witness said that when calling at the Union Insurance Office to arrest the accused, he first spoke to the manager to let him know he was taking one of his men away, but did not discuss the case with him, and certainly did not say that he was going to "fix" Goulbourn and get him sentenced.

DATE OF THE ALLEGED PERJURY.

Counsel—In the summons the date of the alleged perjury is given as June 28, but the case for the prosecution had not been concluded on that date.

Witness—The trial started on June 28.

Counsel—Goulburn went into the witness box on the 29th.

Mr. Maitland said he would ask for the date to be amended, but not at the moment.

Mr. Mansel Reece—If you do not have it amended now I shall ask for the charge to be dismissed. It is perfectly simple.

Witness said he now remembered that the trial occupied three days.

Counsel—Can you be sure of the date on which he gave his evidence? Do you still stick to the 28th?

Witness—It was the 28th, the 29th, or the 30th.

Counsel—I must ask you to say definitely when it was.

could be found. The stories about bandits and looting are silly nonsense and could be ignored, were not the Chinese in this province already burdened with enough difficulty in making a good name for themselves. The property loss was serious for the few persons affected, but Choutsun is a city of at least 50,000 population, and the fire therefore was relatively a small matter. It is supposed to save bean started by an overturned lamp.

The lurid tale sent out by Reuter's, when contrasted with the insignificant facts of the case, makes me doubt the wisdom of letting such a news agency run loose in the world. Is this its usual method of serving up the world's events?

THE ITALIAN ARMS DEAL.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—According to reports, arms to the value of over $5,000,000 have been sold to the Northern Government by the Italians.

The "Peking & Tientsin Times" has given much prominence to the sale, but unfortunately on the day previous to expressing its indignation the same paper lamented the fact, that, whereas Danish and German firms were able to tender for the erection and equipment of arsenals in China, British firms were not.

If my memory does not fail me, the Italians also supplied arms and ammunition for the 1920 war.

Sir Ronald Macleay in a recent Shanghai speech said, that foreigners were very much to blame for present conditions in China.

He did not, however, say, on account of our supplying them with arms. But do you not think, Sir, that our (the white man's) conduct in China calls for severe censure? In May last year, 16 Foreign Powers informed the Chinese Government, that the present state of affairs in China was a disgrace to China as a self-respecting Nation. That the Lincheng outrage was only one of many outrages. That the foreign Powers, unless satisfaction was obtained, would use all the means in their Power etc.

Similar diplomatic missives have without a doubt been sent along by individual Legations, whenever the necessity arose, I dare say, the Italian Legation protested, when Father Maloto was kidnapped and murdered. And yet the very same Legation now condones (that is putting it mildly) the sale of $5 millions worth of arms and ammunition to the Chinese. Everyone living in China knows, that bandits are for the most recruited from the ranks of unpaid soldiery. It is therefore not unreasonable to suggest, that further Italian subjects or other foreigners plus a good many Chinese may be murdered by some of the arms just sold.

Apart from all that, it seems to me marvellous, that the Powers most interested in trade in China Great Britain, France, America, Japan and Germany would allow this deal to come off, when the various Chambers of Commerce and the China Association have deplored civil war as the greatest factor in the present bad state of Trade?

When one knows that China (the Chinese Government) is practically bankrupt and fails to meet her foreign obligations and cannot even pay the salaries of her civil and military servants one wonders, where the $5 million are coming from?

One also wonders, what China's alleged friends of Washington Conference fame are going to do in the matter. Nothing I dare say, but sending the usual missile to the F.O.

In closing this letter I have in mind a young man I knew, when he was only a boy. He is now serving a sentence of three months hard labour in H.M. Gaol in Shanghai for being mixed up in the sale of a few revolvers. Compare that unfortunate youngster to the mighty in Peking, who probably still, in spite of the arms deal, enjoy the privileges of select society and their clubs.

My thoughts go back to Hongkong where a month ago three young Danish sailors were sentenced to 12 months' hard labour, not for being caught redhanded in selling arms, but for the simple reason, that revolvers were found in their cabin, and because it was surmised that they were to be sold at Hongkong.

There is then after all some truth in the story, that the small thieves are hanged and the big ones receive honours.

And last but not least, Sir, allow me as a personal friend of yours to call your attention to the fact, that your esteemed paper may be in court charged with being an accessory to gun running.

In the "North-China Daily News" dated March 3 there appears an advertisement (Page 13 column 7) to the following effect

NEVER THREE.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I notice that everybody, so to speak, objects to one match being used to light cigarettes for three persons. "Never three" they will say and even go so far as blowing the light off the match after the second person has used it.

This, I believe, is not a piece of news I am giving to any of your numerous readers for it is commonly known by any man in the street. But why there should be so strong an objection to this I do not quite realize.

It is said, however, that if the light of a stick of match is used for three persons, one of the three will die or meet with some misfortune of serious character. Why is it so and from whom this idea originated, I am at a loss to know.

I wonder if any of your readers has had any such experience and could kindly enlighten me on the subject. I have never had a chance to find out the truth of it if any.

I am, etc.,
Juannou.

Shanghai, Mar. 19, 1924.

THE WATERWORKS.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—The correspondence with the Waterworks recently on the proposal to take over the Waterworks makes interesting reading, as being a matter which will vitally affect the pocket of the the ratepayers ere long. It is to be noticed that as a result of this proposal which has been on the tapis for some months the shares of the Waterworks Company rapidly increased in value, and whatever the motive may be, it is evident that certain parties are only too anxious that the Council shall find $15,000,000 or so to buy out the Waterworks Co.

But what is it all for? Have the ratepayers not already got enough money to raise for their electricity works, for their roads, and their bridges, that they should contemplate such enormous outlay, also the inevitable increase of Municipal staff and consequent enhanced salaries of those already highly paid.

What we want is to have the money of good sound commercial concerns such as this in our Settlement—not to oust it? The Council will want to buy out the tramways next. I repeat what is it all for? I have followed the meagre information on the subject furnished to us during the past few years, and as far as I can see, apart from possible difficulties, between the directors and certain councillors, that never ought to have been allowed to affect the issue, the chief difficulties seem to be the reluctance of the Company to extend their mains on one or two outlying roads without a guarantee of reasonable return, and last but not least, a refusal to recognize that they had to increase the pressure to comply with the unreasonable requirements of the Chief of the Fire Brigade, and to put up fire hydrants free of charge at intervals of every ten feet or so. The Company contend and quite rightly that they exist primarily to supply water in quantity sufficient for ordinary requirements, and not to double their plant to meet the views of the Fire Brigade. In the meantime, if we are correctly informed, the Fire Chief has gone ahead and obtained his pressure with a splendid set of fire engines, so that the primary cause for compulsorily taking over the Waterworks is removed.

Add to the above the undoubted fact, that if the Council were to take over the Waterworks, they would at once have to increase the charges for water, to probably more than double within five years, we reach the present query.

I. S. S. DRAWING.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—It seems to me that their system of placing the balls in the globe for drawing always starting with No. 1 and up to the last number is not quite reasonable. They might say that after each 5,000 balls placed in the globe several turns were rendered, yet in many cases the biggest numbers were turned out. I would suggest that a change should be effected every month. For instance, in January they start with ball No. 1, in February they should start with ball No. 5,000 and in March with ball No. 10,000 and so on until the last number is reached and then revert to No. 1.

EGYPT'S FIRST PARLIAMENT

Opened Amid Great Enthusiasm: Nationalist Ministry's Speech from Throne

Cairo, Mar. 15.

Egypt's first Parliament opened to-day in fine weather. There were scenes of great enthusiasm. Crowds were shouting continuousy, singling out for special applause the senators and deputies who had been imprisoned or deported, but everybody was cheered, including British journalists, who were greeted with shouts of "Sudan", apparently indicating that the crowds desire a union between the Sudan and Egypt.

Viscount Allenby, the British High Commissioner for Egypt, who was accompanied by Lady Allenby, was an imposing figure in Field-Marshal's uniform.

King Fuad, who was accompanied by Zaghlul Pasha, drove from the Palace in a State carriage and was incessantly cheered.

After the King had received the oath of Zaghlul Pasha, he read the Speech from the Throne which stated that the task of Parliament was to realize the complete independence of Egypt and that the Government was ready to negotiate with Britain with a view to realizing their national aspirations concerning Egypt and the Sudan, "free of all encumbrances."

The King and the Premier returned to the Palace amid renewed demonstrations. They appeared on the balcony in response to the plaudits of the crowds packing the Square.

Mr. MacDonald's Message.

Later.

The streets were very animated and the town was illuminated to-night. Thousands witnessed a fire works display.

The British Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, sent a message to the Egyptian Premier, Zaghlul Pasha, congratulating the Egyptian nation on the attainment of representation in Parliament and trusting that under it they would enjoy an era of happiness and peace. He expressed the opinion that Egypt and Britain were destined to be associated in close friendly relations. "It is our desire to see this relationship established on a lasting basis satisfactory to both countries and therefore His Majesty's Government is now and at all times ready to negotiate with the Egyptian Government."

Mr. MacDonald's message was splendidly received, Members of Parliament describing it as excellent. Apparently the bitterness in Egypt for the past three years is rapidly disappearing.

King George has telegraphed his congratulations to King Fuad.—Reuter.

THE INDIAN BUDGET REJECTED

Swarajists Still Obstinate Despite the Viceroy's Concessions

Delhi, Mar. 17.

Speaking on the Finance Bill in the Legislative Assembly to-day, Sir Basil Blackett, Finance Member of the Governor-General's Executive Council, said that the Viceroy had restored the demands on the revenue on account of opium, salt and Customs and taxes on income, which were refused last week by the Assembly.

Amid the cheers of the Swarajists, the Assembly rejected the Finance Bill by 60 votes to 57, after Sir W. M. Hailey had declared that obstruction would prejudice the Swarajists' case in the eyes of the British Parliament, which would view rejection as a demonstration of irresponsibility.

Note.—In the debate on the Budget proposals in the Legislative Assembly on March 10 the Swarajists refused the Customs grant of 75 lakhs of rupees and also rejected the Government's proposals regarding income tax, the salt tax and opium, as a protest against the British Government's reply to the demand for a responsible Government, which they considered wholly unacceptable.—Reuter.

Delhi, Mar. 19.

In the Council of State to-day a message from the Viceroy was read stating that as the Legislative Assembly had refused leave to introduce the recommended Finance Bill he certified it as essential to the interests of British India. The Viceroy recommended the Council to pass the bill.

Discussion of the bill was fixed to take place on Monday.—Reuter.

BOLSHEVIK AGENTS IN INDIA

Eight Natives Charged With Conspiracy and Spreading Communist Propaganda

Cawnpore, Mar. 18.

The trial opened to-day of eight Indians, alleged to be Bolshevik agents, charged with conspiring to establish a Communist international organization throughout India. Four of the accused were absent, two of them, Mahendra and Nath Roy, and another, residing outside India.

Colonel Kaye, the Director of the Intelligence Bureau of the Government of India, gave evidence that Indian revolutionaries convened a meeting at Moscow in 1921 which decided on and drew up a programme for furtherance of Bolshevik propaganda with Roy as the leader.—Reuter.

AN ACCIDENT TO THE PRINCE OF WALES

Another Nasty Fall: Removed on Stretcher Though Not Seriously Injured

London, Mar. 15.

The Prince of Wales rode in an Army point-to-point steeplechase near Wokingham to-day, his first public appearance since he broke his collar-bone in February.

His Royal Highness had a narrow escape in the first event, just steering clear of three horses who fell at a jump.

The Prince was thrown at the first fence in the last event, falling somewhat heavily on his head and hands, and was removed on a stretcher to a farmhouse with his face bleeding. His Royal Highness protested against being removed on a stretcher, saying that he was quite able to walk.

Prince Henry was thrown in another race at the same meeting but was not hurt. The Duke of York was a spectator.

Mar. 16.

The Prince of Wales's accident was not serious. He received a kick in the face from the horse, and bled freely from the nose. He also suffered slight concussion. The Prince was conveyed by motor to Aldershot and did not return to London.

Prince Henry's fall was due to collision with a cyclist who got on the course.—Reuter.

Satisfactory Progress

London, Mar. 16.

The Prince of Wales spent a good night and is feeling much better.—Reuter.

Mar. 17.

The general anxiety and apprehension caused by the Prince of Wales's eleventh riding accident, which might so easily have had a far graver sequel, are expressed by most of the morning papers, which, while recognizing the Prince's courage, strongly urge on His Royal Highness the duty of lessening risks in view of his position.

The official announcement states that the horse ridden by the Prince fell with him. His Royal Highness sustained slight concussion and some abrasions on the face. He spent a quiet day in bed and is progressing satisfactorily, but will not be able to fulfil any public engagements during the coming week.—Reuter.

Parliament's Grave Concern

London, Mar. 18.

The question of the riding accidents of the Prince of Wales was raised in the House of Commons to-day, when Lt.-Col. J. T. C. Moore-Brabazon, Unionist Member for Rochester, asked whether it was within the province of the House to represent to the Sovereign its grave concern at the repeated risks run by the Heir to the Throne.

The Speaker replied that personally he had no touque to speak there except as the House might direct him. The matter rested with the responsible Ministers of the Crown.—Reuter.

THE TROUBLE IN THE IRISH ARMY

Public House Raided by Troops: Several Officers Arrested: Gen. Tobin's Escape

London, Mar. 19.

Late last night troops surrounded a public house in Parcell Square, Dublin, where, it was reported, from 30 to 40 wanted men were assembled, including Gen. Tobin and Col. Dalton. A grave situation, believed to be the sequel of the recent army trouble, is indicated by the fact that several Ministers visited the scene of operations.

It was officially announced this morning that ten officers, who left their posts, had been arrested on the roof of the public house. It is believed that more men are on the roof. A search is proceeding.

Later.

The siege, in which a large force of military armoured cars with machine-guns participated, was raised at 10.30 this morning. No further arrests have been made. Gen. Tobin escaped, while Col. Dalton was not present. Those arrested include Col. O'Mally, three other Colonels and four Commandants.—Reuter.

Generals Forcibly Retired.

Dublin, Mar. 19.

It was announced to-day in the Dail Eireann that the Minister for Defence, Gen. R. Mulcahy, had resigned. The Government demanded the resignations of the Adjutant-General, Gen. O'Sullivan, of the Chief of Staff, Gen. McMahon, and of the Quartermaster-General, Gen. O'Muirthile.

The Minister for Home Affairs, Mr. K. O'Higgins, stated that last night's operations had been undertaken without authority from Gen. O'Duffy or consultation with the Executive Council.

The Home Minister said that the Executive Council were not satisfied that the menacing divisions and cleavages in the Army existed without the knowledge of the heads of the Army. General O'Duffy, who had been appointed Minister for Defence and Inspector-General of the Army would exact absolute discipline.

General R. Mulcahy, the resigning Minister for Defence, said that the Government in his opinion were condoning mutiny.

Later.

It is announced that President Cosgrave will undertake the duties of Minister for Defence.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 20.

It appears that the action of the Dublin Government in demanding the resignations of the staff of the Ministry of Defence is due to the fact that they considered that Tuesday night's operations conflicted with their policy of giving the mutineers until the evening of to-day to return the arms taken away.—Reuter.

FRENCH FINANCE BILL

Most Contentious Clause Now Conceded by Senate: Elections Fixed for May

Paris, Mar. 14.

The Poincaré Government has cleared the first and most difficult hurdle in connexion with the Finance Bill. The Senate, having rejected its own Finance Committee's amendment to Article 1 by 154 votes to 141, subsequently adopted this Article by 161 votes to 129. The Article temporarily delegates Parliamentary authority to the Government more particularly regarding the issue of decrees to carry out reductions in expenditure.

The President of the Finance Committee, before the votes were taken, suggested a compromise in order that M. Poincaré should retain office but the Premier rejected a compromise and insisted on the adoption of the Government's text as a vote of confidence.

(Note: M. Poincaré told the Senate Finance Committee on March 6 that he would resign unless it changed its view regarding the Government's Finance Bill, the three main provisions of which the Committee had rejected.)

M. Poincaré in the Senate today disclaimed any intention to extend the life of the Chamber of Deputies. The Premier said that a general election would be held before May 31.

Mar. 15.

In consequence of the Government's victory in the crucial division in the Senate early this morning, the remaining 108 articles of the Finance Bill will probably be quickly voted as M. Poincaré insists on avoidance of delay. The Opposition offered no obstruction this afternoon, when, after voting Article 2, the Senate adopted without a division the much-criticized Article 3, providing for an all-round increase of 20 per cent. in taxation.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 15.

The French franc was quoted at 90.65 and the Belgian franc at 110.25 at the London Exchange today.—Reuter.

Paris, Mar. 16.

The Senate, after rapidly adopting Articles 4 to 33 of the Finance Bill, lengthily discussed the controversial Article 34, providing for the abolition of the State match monopoly. The Minister of Finance pointed out that the measure was purely fiscal and not political. The Article was then approved by 136 votes to 119.—Reuter.

Recovery of the Franc.

London, Mar. 18.

Francs are continuing their improvement on the London market which closed to-day with the French franc at 84.65 and the Belgian franc at 101. A feature of to-day's market was the fall of Dutch florins which closed at 11.63¾.—Reuter.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT IN GREECE

Premier's Negotiations with Royalist Leaders: Terms of Draft Agreement

Athens, Mar. 16.

The negotiations of the new Republican Premier with the Royalist leaders, according to the newspapers, has resulted in a draft agreement, which has been telegraphed to the King.

Under its terms the King would abdicate voluntarily on condition that he should retain four-fifths of the Civil List and also most of the Crown domains, while internal peace would be obtained by a general amnesty, the reinstatement of capable officers and officials, the proclamation of a Republic by the Assembly, to be ratified by a plebiscite, the establishment of a Senate, with Royalists participating in it, and the holding of elections under an impartial Government.—Reuter.

RUMANIA'S CLAIM TO BESSARABIA

Strong Protest from Soviet Against Ratification of the Protocol

London, Mar. 16.

The question of Bessarabia, which was reunited to Rumania in March, 1918, after long incorporation with Russia, is coming to the fore in view of the Russo-Rumanian conference, opening in Vienna on March 24, at which Rumania will be principally concerned to obtain Russian recognition of the reunion, which is already recognized by Britain and other allied powers.

Rumania will also try to persuade the Soviets to admit responsibility for the Rumanian gold and Crown jewels which were sent to Moscow for safety during the German invasion of 1915.—Reuter.

Riga, Mar. 16.

The Bessarabian question is evoking very lively interest in Moscow, where numerous demonstrations are demanding Rumania's withdrawal. The Soviet press is also conducting a campaign, in which it particularly protests against the French ratification of the Protocol, recognizing Rumania's annexation of Bessarabia, as likely to ruin Franco-Russian relations.—Reuter.

Protocol Passed by France.

Paris, Mar. 16.

The Senate to-day passed the Bessarabian Protocol which has already been adopted by the Chamber of Deputies.—Reuter.

ITALY'S ANNEXATION OF FIUME

Remarkable Celebrations on the Occasion of the Proclamation

Rome, Mar. 16.

Many men-of-war have arrived at Fiume, which is gorgeously decorated with flags and triumphal arches. The King, with Gens. Diaz, Giardino, del Bono and Admiral Thaon di Revel in attendance, from the balcony of the town hall, proclaimed the annexation of Fiume to Italy.

On the occasion of the annexation of Fiume, King Victor Emmanuel bestowed upon Premier Mussolini the Order of Annunciata, the most important and most ancient of Italian Orders. It can be bestowed upon Italian and foreign princes, but only 12 Italian citizens are permitted to have this Order.—Italian Wireless through Reuter.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE EXHIBITION

To Be Opened by the King on St. George's Day: A Unique Pageant

London, Mar. 19.

In the House of Commons today, when moving the estimate of £118,000 expenditure for the British Empire Exhibition, Mr. W. Lunn, Secretary of the Department for Overseas Trade, stated that it had been definitely decided that the King would open the Exhibition on St. George's Day, April 23.

With a view to capturing the imagination of visitors, the Government were embarking on the novel scheme of organizing a unique pageant depicting the birth and growth of the Empire and the Empire as it is to-day. The services of leading British artists had been secured.

Mr. Louis Parker, Sir Frank Benson, Mr. H. Granville-Barker and Mr. Rudyard Kipling will be responsible for the most of the libretto. Sir Edward Elgar will compose the music.—Reuter.

FOREIGN TELEGRAMS

PARLIAMENT'S HEAVY PROGRAMME

Whole Time of House of Commons Required for Government's Financial Measures: Opposition Acquiescent: Discussion of Army Estimates

London, Mar. 17.

The House of Commons to-day unanimously passed a motion that the Government take the whole time of the House until the end of the financial year.

Mr. J. R. Clynes, the Deputy Leader of the House, moving the resolution, emphasized that the taking of the private members' time was inevitable owing to the very heavy programme of financial business. The Government did not propose to take any legislation before the second reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill on March 26, except the Local Authorities Emergency Provision Bill, which was non-contentious.

Mr. Stanley Baldwin, intimating that the Opposition would not oppose the motion, pointed out that the objection previously was to taking the time of the Conservative and Liberal Members and not the time of the Labour Members.

Replying to Commander Bellairs (Conservative), Mr. Ammon, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, stated that the value of Empire trade in 1922 in Eastern waters, east of Africa, was £1,100,000,000 and the cost of maintenance of the British squadrons, including the ships of the Dominion Navies, in Eastern waters and the Pacific was £3,642,000.

The phrase, "Government according to Sermon on the Mount" did yeoman service in the House of Commons to-day at the discussion of the Army Estimates, when Mr. W. H. Ayles, Labour Member for North Bradford, moved a reduction in the gross personnel of 161,000 by 150,000. The amendment was supported by several other members of the Labour party, but was finally rejected by 347 votes to 13.

Mr. Ayles declared that the amendment was intended as a protest against the militaristic trend of Army policy. He stated that the nation that was brave enough to lay down its arms in the midst of an armed world would be the only safe nation.

Many members of the Labour party, however, eloquently opposed the resolution, notably Col. John Ward, Independent Labour Member for Stoke, who drew cheers by stating that a man who would not defend the "Grand Old Country" was not worthy of the name of Englishman. Mr. F. Montague, Labour Member for West Islington, wanted idealism to have its feet on the ground even if its head was in the clouds.

Labour Conditions in China.

Mr. W. J. Baker, the Labour Member for East Bristol, asked what steps the British Government proposed to take in the extraterritorial districts in China under British control to support a request by the Chinese Government that the International Labour Conventions should be applied to territories under non-Chinese sovereignty.

Mr. Macdonald replied that no such request had been received.

The Muitsai of Hongkong.

This afternoon Mr. H. Snell, Labour Member for East Woolwich, asked, "Was the Secretary of State for the Colonies aware that it was part of the duties of a Government official at Hongkong to pass young girls into brothels in the Colony, and whether the House proposed to take any action in the matter?"

Mr. J. H. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Colonies, replied that the object of the practice was purely protective. (Cries of Oh!).—Reuter.

BRITAIN'S NAVAL ESTIMATES

Reduction of £2,200,000: Naval Base at Singapore Definitely Abandoned

London, Mar. 18.

Introducing the Naval Estimates in the House of Commons to-day, Mr. C. G. Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty emphasized the reduction of £2,200,000. He testified to observance of the Washington Agreement and the Government's desire to reduce armaments. The personnel had been increased by 1,000 men. Only 1,400 men would be recruited to man the two battleships and other ships now being constructed instead of the 3,200 normally required. The remainder would be obtained from other ships.

The progress of the battleships Nelson and Rodney had been seriously affected by the boilermakers' lock-out last year and it was very doubtful whether the time lost would be regained during the succeeding contract building period. Mr. Ammon anticipated that three light-cruisers would be completed in the next financial year and a fourth in July, 1925.

The visits of the Special Service Squadron had hitherto been very successful.

Arrangements had been made to maintain an adequate oil reserve for the needs of the Fleet. The Admiralty felt more secure in this connexion owing to the Government's decision to retain control of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. and to maintain their contracts.

The number of cruisers for the protection of trade was below the requirements. Replacement construction of five new cruisers could no longer be delayed in view of the large number of light-cruisers which during the next few years would reach an age at which they could no longer be efficient. Out of 48 light cruisers in the British Empire, ten would be over the efficient age this year. Practically all the remainder had been built in war-time for the North Sea and 18 of them were unsuitable to operate on long ocean trade routes. By the time the proposed five cruisers had been completed, 11 of the 16 now in commission would have been scrapped or placed on the reserve.

The Singapore Naval Base.

The Government had closely and earnestly considered the question of Singapore as involving questions of much wider implication than naval strategy. After fully considering all relevant facts and consulting the Dominions, the Government had decided not to proceed with the Singapore scheme. (Loud Ministerial cheers.)

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald repudiated the suggestion that the Government's action was in any way cutting ourselves off from co-operation with the Dominions or making it impossible to carry on co-operation under different circumstances and perhaps different plans. He stated incidentally that the Singapore scheme would in no way violate the Washington Agreement and, moreover, the position of Singapore was second to none if we were driven to create a new Fleet in the Pacific, but after careful consideration the Government had decided that the scheme would detrimentally affect the Government's foreign policy, aiming at the creation of international confidence and facilitating a comprehensive agreement for the limitation of armaments.

The Prime Minister stated that the Australian Commonwealth cordially sympathised with the Government's international policy and desired better international understanding and an advance towards reduction of armaments, but considered the action of his Majesty's Government would jeopardize instead of assisting that policy. (Opposition cheers.) The Singapore scheme, the Commonwealth declared, was for defensive not offensive purposes. Gen. Smuts described the policy of the Imperial Government as a bold move towards enduring peace and wholeheartedly agreed with it. (Liberal and Labour cheers.) He felt that the great cause of peace and conciliation would be seriously undermined by the construction of the base.

In conclusion, Mr. Macdonald said that Australia had expressed willingness to contribute a substantial sum for the development of the base and New Zealand had already offered a first contribution of £100,000.

A Conservative Threat.

Mr. L. C. M. S. Amery, the former First Lord of the Admiralty, said that when the Conservatives came into power, they would not lose an instant in resuming the Singapore scheme.

The debate on Singapore concluded after Mr. Stanley Baldwin had stated that the Conservatives reserved the right to speak fully and demand the decision of the House on the report stage.

Mr. Hugh Seely, Liberal Member for East Norfolk, thereupon moved the non-necessity of constructing five cruisers, which was defeated by 304 votes to 114 and the House adjourned.

Views of the Dominions.

In the House of Lords to-day Viscount Chelmsford, First Lord of the Admiralty, communicated a summary of the replies of the Governments of the Dominions regarding Singapore. Canada and Ireland preferred not to give their advice. The Prime Ministers of Australia, New Zealand and Newfoundland urged that the scheme should be proceeded with, while Gen. Smuts approved the Imperial Government's policy as tending towards enduring peace.

The First Lord, defending the Government's policy, quoted as an apposite example of foreign susceptibilities in naval matters the stir caused by the choice of the Mediterranean for the naval manœuvres of the combined Atlantic and Mediterranean Fleets, which evoked a storm of criticism in France. Viscount Chelmsford said that this "was a perfectly innocent act on our part," and pointed out that similar exercises had been carried out in the same neighbourhood in 1922 and would in the same way have taken place last year but for the situation in the Dardanelles.

The House carried by 56 votes to 19 a motion by Marquess Curzon, regretting the Government's action in abandoning the Singapore scheme, "believing that the development of the naval base at Singapore, as approved by the Imperial Conference, is urgently required for the protection of commerce, the security of the Dominions and the future maintenance of peace."—Reuter.

Expenses Up to Date and Cost of Closing Down

London, Mar. 19.

In the House of Commons today, replying to Sir Frederick Hall (Unionist), Mr. C. G. Ammon, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, said that the expenditure in connexion with the Singapore base up to the present was £70,000. A further sum would be incurred in connexion with the closing down of the scheme. The Government whips would be put on when the Government's decision was discussed on Tuesday. The reports of the naval experts who advised with regard to the matter would not be circulated. With regard to the question as to whether such steps would be taken as (? not) to necessitate starting the work afresh if the Government's successors reversed the decision, Mr. Ammon said that the details with regard to the closing down of the work were being considered.

Mr. Geoffrey Drage, the well known writer on naval affairs, in a letter to the "Times" in connexion with the Singapore base, dwells on the policy and needs of Japan, which, he declares, completely controls the West Pacific and now aims at mastery of the islands in that area and the continent adjacent to them. "Japan would be ready in 1930, if not before. Peace can be maintained if it is perfectly clear what our Far Eastern policy is and that we mean to stand by it; otherwise we shall drift into war because Pacifists would be again taken as speaking for Britain. The naval base at Singapore is the test of our revolution."—Reuter.

Australia's Anxiety.

Melbourne, Mar. 19.

Mr S. M. Bruce has made available his cable to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, laying stress on the necessity for the Singapore base and pointing out that without it the existence and prestige of the Empire would be endangered. The Commonwealth considered that imperilling the Empire would strike a fatal blow at the League of Nations. It was obvious that without the base Britain would be unable to maintain the quota of capital ships which the Washington Conference permitted. Finally, Mr. Bruce urged the Imperial Government to reconsider its decision, and promised to submit to Parliament proposals for a substantial contribution towards the cost of the base.—Reuter.

Satisfaction in Tokio.

Tokio, Mar. 20.

The announcement of the abondonment of the Singapore base is hailed with satisfaction by the morning papers, which pay tribute to the moral courage and loyalty to principles displayed by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald and the Labour Party of Great Britain. They consider Britain's example in regard to the international peace policy an important contribution to world settlement.

Other quarters are of opinion that in view of the strong attitude and demands of the Dominions the abandonment of the scheme is only temporary. For instance, Vice-Admiral Baron Sakamoto, who ridicules the idea that the Singapore base was aimed at Japan, declares in an article in the "Nichi Nichi" that such an outstanding feature of Britain's national policy cannot be so easily dropped. The Pacific will be very important in future world affairs, and to the Pacific, he says, Britain must preserve her entrance, which, naturally, is Singapore.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY BY-ELECTION

Four Candidates in the Field: Earl Balfour Supporting Mr. Winston Churchill

London, Mar. 16.

The by-election for the Abbey division, Westminster, the polling for which will take place on March 19, is attracting unusual interest not merely owing to Mr. Winston Churchill's candidature, but owing to the variegated condition of the electorate, which comprises interests so conflicting as Clubland and Soho, Covent Garden and Pimlico.

That political apathy has been characteristic of this electorate hitherto is indicated by the fact that 60 per cent. did not vote in the last contest. With four candidates in the field, however, two of whom, Brig-General J. Nicholson, the official Conservative candidate, and Mr. Winston Churchill (Independent Anti-Socialist) are splitting the Conservative vote and the other two, Mr. Scott Duckers (Liberal) and Mr. William Brockway (Labour), were conscientious objectors during the war, the present contest proves to be very lively. Mr. Churchill, who is working most energetically, has been especially subjected to interruptions at his meetings, not merely on the part of the Socialists, but on the part of Conservative extremists as well, who fear that his return to the House of Commons may disrupt the Conservative party.

A week-end sensation has been the publication of letters addressed by the Earl of Balfour and Mr. Stanley Baldwin to Mr. Winston Churchill and Brig. General J. Nicholson, respectively wishing them success. The Earl of Balfour says that Mr. Churchill's return would be warmly welcomed by men of moderate opinion Mr. Stanley Baldwin expresses the hope that Brig.-General Nicholson will triumph, and says that only a strong and united Conservative party can successfully combat Socialism and its attendant dangers.—Reuter.

A representative committee of 13 financial authorities has been appointed by the Government to inquire into the National Debt. Baron Colwyn will be the chairman of the committee. The members include Mr. W. L. Hichens, Sir Charles Addis and Sir Josiah Stamp, but the most noteworthy member is Mrs. Barbara Wootton, a member of the staff of the Joint Research Department of the Trades Union Congress and the Labour Party and a former director of economic studies at Girton College, Cambridge.

Mrs. Wootton took first class honours in economics with special distinction at Cambridge. She is only 26 and is the widow of an officer who was killed four days after landing in France.—Reuter.

THE COAL MINERS' CONFERENCE

Decision Postponed Pending Result of Minimum Wage Bill Discussion

London, March 13.

The miners' delegate conference has adjourned until to-morrow after a discussion which revealed considerable opposition to the owners' offer.

Mar. 14.

The miners' delegate conference met again to-day. It decided that the owners' terms were inadequate and inacceptable and urged the Government to pass the Miners' Minimum Wage Bill, but the delegates also decided to refer the owners' terms to the districts.

The conference will meet again on March 26 to arrive at a decision.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 14.

In connexion with the meeting of the miners' delegates conference to-day, it was officially stated that it would be open to the districts to consider the owners' terms during the interval before March 26 if they desired, but, as far as the conference was concerned, there was no official reference to the districts as it had decided that the terms were inadequate.

The adjournment of the conference till March 26 is for the purpose of seeing what can be done in the meanwhile to secure an improved wage for the miners by legislation and, if the Minimum Wage Bill, which will come up for discussion on March 21, is not proceeded with or defeated, there is little doubt that the delegates on March 26 will decide to take a ballot of the coalfields with regard to a national strike after the present agreement expires on April 17.

It is understood that the Government has decided to introduce its own Miners' Minimum Wage Bill at the end of the financial year.

The Government's Pledges.

Mar. 15.

The miners' decision yesterday to invoke the aid of Parliament in settling the wages question places the Government in an awkward position. The Minimum Wage Bill, to which the resolution referred, being a private bill, must be withdrawn under the Government's decision to take the private members' time till the end of the financial year, and if the Government, which is bound to the miners by pledges, introduces its own Bill on the subject, it would be more fiercely attacked than ever on the ground of interfering with the industry and would possibly even be forced to appeal to the country. This probably explains an announcement to-day that yesterday's resolution does not mean that the negotiations have ended. Mr. Shinwell, the Secretary for Mines, proposes to ask both sides to meet him next week.—Reuter.

PHOENICIAN ALPHABET

Parent of Greek, Roman, Hebrew and English Letters from B. C. 1200

Philadelphia, Feb. 8.

Dr. George A. Barton, Professor of Semitics at the University of Pennsylvania, has received a letter from Palestine stating that two French archæologists, have discovered the oldest form of the Phoenician alphabet yet found. It is declared to date not later than 1200 B.C., and from it Greek, Roman, Hebrew and English alphabets can be traced.

INTIMIDATION AND TRADE UNIONISM

Union Funds Useable for Political Aims Unless Workmen Expressly Dissent

London, Mar. 14.

The House of Commons to-day by 211 votes to 129 rejected the second reading of the Trade Union Act of 1913 Amendment Bill, which provides that, when a trade union has passed a resolution in favour of political action, the members desiring to contribute to the support of its political objects shall indicate their desire in writing and shall not as heretofore be automatically included as supporters unless they contract out.

Captain Charles Ainsworth (Conservative), moving the second reading, said that the object of the Bill was to prevent trade unions from insisting on members paying contributions for political purposes in which they did not believe. He asserted that members seeking to contract out were intimidated.

Mr. Tom Smith (Labour), moving rejection, declared that the reason for the Bill was that the Conservatives were anxious with regard to the progress of the Labour Party. He denied the allegation of intimidation and declared that, if the political activities of trade unionists were hampered, they would be compelled to rely more on strikes.—Reuter.

The Shipbuilding Federation threaten a national lock-out unless a speedy settlement is reached in the unofficial strike of engineers at Southampton, who are demanding an increase of 17s. 6d. a week to bring them into line with the London dock workers. The Federation has summoned a full joint meeting at Carlisle on March 20.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 20.

The engineers on strike at Southampton for an increase of 17/6d. a week to bring them into line with the London dock-workers having refused the leaders' advice to return to work, it is expected that the shipbuilding employers will declare a national lock-out on Saturday, involving 100,000 men.—Reuter.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

WESTMINSTER ABBER BY-ELECTION

An Exciting Culmination: Mr. Winston Churchill Defeated by Narrow Margin

London, Mar. 20.

The following is the result of the by-election of the Abbey Division of Westminster:—

	votes.
Mr. Otho Nicholson (Conservative)	8,186
Mr. Winston Churchill (Independent)	8,153
Mr. William Brockway (Labour)	6,155
Mr. Scott Duckers Liberal)	290

A re-count has been ordered.

Later.

The excitement of the by-election culminated in an erroneous announcement of the result. Early editions of the evening papers were rushed to the streets with the statement that Mr. Churchill had been elected, which was cabled to all parts of the world, but this was immediately cancelled. The figures later showed that the voting was very narrow. Mr. Churchill's demand for a recount was granted, but this resulted in increasing Mr. Nicholson's majority to 43. Mr. Scott Duckers forfeits his deposit owing to the fewness of his votes, but he had declared throughout that he would be satisfied if he kept Mr. Churchill out. Mr. Brockway failed to secure election, as anticipated, on the split Conservative vote. The official Conservative machine again proved its power in one of the strongest Tory strongholds.

An Unfortunate Blunder.

Later.

The excitement in the counting-room was intense. Just before the figures were announced it was intimated that Mr. Churchill had been elected. He was warmly congratulated by his supporters and, smiling happily, went to his wife on the platform and told her of the victory. A few minutes later there was a sudden silence when the returning officer pointed out that there had been an error and that Mr. Nicholson headed the poll. This was confirmed on closer examination of the papers. Congratulations were showered on Mr. Nicholson, while Mr. Churchill, looking very perturbed, walked up and down the hall biting his lips.—Reuter.

BRITISH SQUADRON IN AUSTRALIA

Plain Speaking at a Banquet: The Desire to Promote the Peace of the World

Melbourne, Mar. 20.

The Commonwealth Government gave a banquet to-night to Rear-Admiral Sir Frederick Field and the officers of the Special Service Squadron.

Mr. S. M. Bruce, the Prime Minister, in a speech said that Australia realized her obligation to assist in Imperial naval defence, but she was resolved that her aid should take the form of an Australian Navy, completely autonomous in time of peace and co-operating as a unit of the Imperial Navy in time of war. The abandonment of the Singapore base was very deeply regretted by the overwhelming bulk of Australians, but, while deploring the decision of the Imperial Government, Australia was prepared to continue to explore with the Imperial Government all the ways whereby the peace of the world might be ensured and armaments reduced.

Rear-Admiral Sir F. L. Field, responding, advised Australia to build cruisers to help in the defence of the trade routes and also to build several overseas patrol submarines, which would delay the enemy until the arrival of a superior British force. He recommended Australia to seek a base on her own shores, especially on the northwest. He considered that Port Darwin was meant by Providence for a base.—Reuter.

HUGE NEWSPAPER TRUST

Gomer Berry for the sale to them of the Manchester branch of the company's business, including the "Daily Dispatch," the "Manchester Evening Chronicle," the "Sporting Chronicle," the "Empire News," the "Athletic News" and a number of other periodicals. A new company will will be formed to take over the above-mentioned properties and also to acquire the "Sunday Times."

It is understood that on completion of the purchase of the above properties debentures valued at approximately £4,000,000 out of those issued by the "Daily Mail" Trust in October last year will be redeemed.—Reuter.

BOOSTING AMERICAN SHIPPING

Japanese Protest Against Preferential Rlwy. Rates for American-borne Cargo

Washington, Mar. 20.

It is understood that the protest of the Japanese Government against the decision to allow preferential railway rates on American goods shipped in American vessels will be followed by similar action on the part of the Dutch Government. Other countries are expected later to make representations to the Senate Department which has up to the present only intimated that the complaints will receive careful consideration.

The case of Japan may be complicated by the fact that certain Japanese steamship companies have contracts with certain railways, which, it is contended, entitle them to the same benefits as would accrue to American vessels under Section 28 of the Merchant Marine Act.—Reuter's American Service.

THE BRITISH NAVAL ESTIMATES

Scene in the House of Commons

London, Mar. 20.

Commander C. D. Burney caused a scene in the House of Commons to-day in the course of the debate on the Admiralty vote by referring to the Liberal opposition to building new cruisers as an attempt to murder British sailors. The Liberals shouted "Withdraw!" and a Labour member said that four Labour members had been expelled from the last Parliament for a similar accusation.

Commander Burney eventually withdrew his remark, explaining that what he meant was that in the event of war we might have to send against Japanese cruisers with 8-inch guns cruisers with 6-inch guns, which would result in the murder of British sailors.—Reuter.

IMPROVED RELATIONS WITH AFGHANISTAN

London, Mar. 20.

Improvement in the relations between Britain and Afghanistan is indicated by a telegram from Reuter's correspondent at Delhi reporting that it is understood that his Majesty's Government has consented to release the rifles, machine-guns and ammunition consigned to Kabul, which have been detained at Bombay for months in connexion with the delicate Anglo-Afghan situation arising with regard to the murderers of the British officers on the Northwest frontier of India.—Reuter.

Allegations Now of Bribery in Connexion with Standard Aircraft Prosecution

Washington, Mar. 14.

Mr. Gaston Means, a former secret agent of the Department of Justice, created a sensation when giving evidence before the Teapot Dome investigation committee to-day. He testified that in February, 1922, in Washington, he received from a man representing a large Japanese firm $100,000 to end the Government prosecution in the Standard Aircraft case. Witness handed over the money to the late Mr. Jess Smith, a friend of Attorney-General Daugherty.

Witness described himself as money-carrier in the transaction for Mr. Smith and others. He related that while making an "under-cover" investigation, which he believed was made at the instance of the late President Harding, he questioned Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, in connexion with permits for withdrawals of liquors "and got him." Mr. Means declared that he had questioned Senators Carraway and La Follette, after the latter had agitated for an investigation of the Teapot Dome affair. Witness, who admitted of having been employed as a German secret agent and having been tried for murder, declared that he had learned of the source of the $100,000 from Mr. Smith.

A member of the committee reminded his colleagues that the records of the Daugherty impeachment case contained the allegation that Mr. Daugherty had failed to prosecute in the aircraft case and also that overpayment of $6,500,000 had been made by the Government.

Further Officials Implicated

Washington, Mar. 18.

The Teapot Dome Inquiry Committee has subpœnaed Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Weeks, Secretary of War, in order to ascertain the manner in which confidential information had been exchanged between their departments and the Department of Justice.

According to accountants who testified to-day before the Senate Oil Committee, Attorney-General Daugherty, Senators Curtis and Elkins, and also Mr. Slemp, Secretary to President Coolidge, are among the officials who had transactions in Sinclair or Doheny oil stocks about the time when the naval oil reserve was leased. Mr. Slemp was then a Member of the House of Representatives. Other Members of the House dealing in the same stocks included Congressmen A. B. Rouse, W. Goodykoontz and Thomas J. Ryan.—Reuter's American Service.

THE ORDUNA CASE

Five of the Crew Plead Guilty to Smuggling: Allegations of Long Misuse of the Ship

New York, Mar. 14.

Five members of the crew of the Orduna were tried to-day on a charge of smuggling liquor and narcotics. They pleaded guilty and were remanded for sentence until Wednesday. Two other members of the crew, who had previously admitted their guilt, were also remanded.

Assistant District Attorney Clark asserts that the Orduna has been used ever since the passing of the Prohibition Act as a vehicle for smuggled liquor. He claims that she has carried $100,000 worth of contraband into New York. Officials of the liner, however, declare that any violation of the laws, if committed, was without the knowledge of responsible officers and deny all the charges.

Lenient Sentences a Sequel to Prisoners' Promises

New York, Mar. 19.

Seven members of the crew of the str. Orduna received sentences to-day varying from a fine of $10 and seven days' imprisonment to a fine of $100. The fine of $100 was imposed on the chief steward, whose seven days' remand in prison was considered sufficient imprisonment.

The lenient sentences are due to a promise which the Judge extracted from the prisoners "to become missionaries and preach the word throughout the British mercantile marine that it is a serious matter to smuggle contraband into American ports."—Reuter's American Service.

U. S. NAVY EXPANSION

Proposed Development of Mare Island and Alameda at Cost of $26,000,000

Washington, Feb. 5.

Approval of the proposed naval base at Alameda, on San Francisco Bay, was expressed today by Rear Admiral Eberle before the House naval committee.

Admiral Eberle said the plans of the Navy Department in developing Alameda base contemplated the expenditure of $20,000,000 and included a sixfold purpose, which would embody a naval base, an oil fuel base, a general supply base, facilities for submarines and destroyers, and vacant land to meet possible war expansion.

The Department, he added, intended to maintain the Mare Island navy yard and would expend an additional $6,000,000 there to keep the yard equipped to meet shipbuilding needs that might be required.

A naval base at Mare Island, Admiral Eberle continued, would mean the taking over of the San Francisco front in time of war, and a base at Alameda would fit in much better with the Navy's war plans.

An air station in the Mare Island channel, the witness said, would be forced to contend with approximately twice as much fog as at Alameda.

Greater water space at Alameda also would eliminate a congestion of aircraft, which, he said, would undoubtedly exist in the Mare Island channel during war.—Reuter's American Service.

THE MEXICAN REVOLT

President's Charges Against British-owned Petroleum Corporation

Mexico City, Mar. 16.

President Obregon, in an interview, declared that high officials of a certain petroleum corporation belonging to British interests had actively aided the Vera Cruz revolt by the provision of money and ships and at the same time obstructing the Federal Government's attempts to suppress the movement. AMERICAN IMPORTS OF RAW MATERIALS

Protective Measures Advocated Against Foreign Monopolies: Legislation Requested

Washington, March 17.

Mr. Herbert Hoover, the Secretary of Commerce, has sent a letter to Senator Capper giving a list of raw materials imported from abroad, which he says are controlled by monopolies at an aggregate cost of $500,000,000 to United States consumers.

Mr. Hoover advocates protective measures such as stimulation of production elsewhere and encouragement of synthetic manufacture in the United States, but particularly legislation designed to create common purchasing agencies abroad, similar to existing selling agencies.

The Secretary of Commerce contends that the following products are monopolized by British interests and are often aided by legislation in their country of origin; nitrates and iodine in Chile, and rubber in British and Dutch colonies. Tin is controlled by British producers.

Senator Capper will introduce a Bill on this matter.—Reuter's American Service.

HOLLAND AND SOVIET

Commerce Opened Up but Recognition Dependent on Russia Herself

The Hague, Mar. 18.

In the Second Chamber to-day, in the course of a debate on the foreign estimates, several Members urged the conclusion of a commercial treaty with Russia.

The Liberal, M. Dresselhuys, criticized the negative attitude of the Foreign Minister towards the suggested treaty of guarantee. M. Marchant (Democratic-Liberal), however, contended that adhesion to such a treaty would mean the end of Holland's independent existence.—Reuter.

The Hague, Mar. 20.

In the Second Chamber last night, replying to the debate on the Foreign Office estimates, the Foreign Minister, Jkhr. van Karnebeek, said that the Government did not see the necessity of any important alterations in the Rhine Navigation Act, as they were of the opinion that the Rhine should be subordinated to the economic interests of world traffic and not made a political instrument.

The Netherlands, he stated, was already taking an important part in commerce with Russia. The question of de jure recognition depended on the good-will of Russia and her respect for Dutch political institutions. He hoped that the day was not far distant when Russia would be again admitted into the family of European nations, but that depended primarily on Russia's good faith.

M. van Karnebeek declared that the Government considered the tenour of Viscount Cecil's Mutual Guarantee Pact opposed to the most fundamental feelings of the Dutch people. Small States would become the military reserves of powerful ones, which would stultify the League so far as small States were concerned.

The leaders of the Catholic, Socialist and Historical Christian parties expressed agreement with the Government's attitude on this matter.

M. Ravensteyn, Communist, introduced a motion demanding recognition of the Soviet Government.

The sitting was adjourned.—Reuter.

OBITUARY

Mr. R. S. Gundry, C. B.

London, Mar. 15.

The death is announced of Mr. Richard Simpson Gundry, C.B., at the age of 85 years.

Mr. Gundry was the Editor of the "North-China Daily News" and the correspondent of "The Times" in China from 1865 to 1878. He was Honorary Secretary to the China Association in London from its formation in 1889 to 1901 and was the President of the Association from 1905 to 1908.—Reuter.

Mr. Gundry was well known here, not only in his capacity as editor of the "North-China Daily News" but also in social and athletic circles. He was an active Volunteer in those early days when volunteering was a matter of extreme necessity to the foreign community and during his stay in Shanghai was a most active protagonist making whole-hearted endeavours towards the advancement of the corps.

The son of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Hickley Gundry, of Hillworth Cottage, Devizes, Mr. Gundry was 85 years of age. During his youth he was privately educated in Brussels. Early in his career he displayed ability as a journalist and went to India, where he became editor of one of the leading English journals. Upon the resignation of Dr. Jamieson, then Mr. Jamieson, he accepted the post of editor of the "North-China Daily News" in 1865 and continued in that position until 1878, when he went Home.

Author and Traveller.

Always a foremost champion of China, he became Hon. Secretary of the China Association upon the formation of that organization in 1889, serving as such until 1901. Between 1905 and 1908 he acted as President and on the retirement from that post was nominated a Companion of the Order of the Bath.

Mr. Gundry led a very active life in the Orient and travelled much of the neighbouring territory on exploring and shooting expeditions. He visited Japan, Pootoo, the Ming Tombs and other districts on which he has written descriptive commentaries. He was author of "China and her Neighbours" and "China, Past and Present," and contributed to widely circulated journals, principally on matters relating to China.

Mr. Gundry is survived by his son, Captain George Gundry, a retired member of the Shanghai Licensed Pilots' Association, and two daughters.

FATAL SEARCH FOR DIAMONDS

Canadian Explorers' Terrible Adventures in Swamps of British Guiana

Toronto, Jan. 30.

At the peril of death, a party of Canadian adventurers which entered the jungle two years ago has found a diamond bed along the Eping River, in British Guiana, from which they have taken many thousands of dollars worth of gems. Several members of the party died; others were shattered in health.

The fate of the party was revealed in a letter received to-day from Lester McGillvray, of London, Ont., by his friends, telling of numerous escapes from death and of ultimate discovery after mutinies of their native helpers and battles with jungle diseases, which cost the lives of three of the whites and scores of the natives.

Alfred Harvey, a young Englishman prospecting by himself, died of dysentery soon after the arrival. Isador Berenbaum, president of the Export Diamond Company, of Antwerp, was the next victim. Upon the first advance into the interior D. K. Stokes, a graduate of Toronto University, died.

Dysentery overtook most of the party. They lost their fresh foods when their boats were swamped in storms in the jungle rivers and the natives deserted. The Canadians returned to Georgetown, where some of them remained in the hospital for weeks and a few were sent home to convalesce.

The prospectors under McGillvray reorganized and headed to the Meamu River district. They failed to find any gems and then penetrated to the Red Hill district, near the junction of the Eping River, where they met an American named Oliver, of New York City.

Oliver had been ill, McGillvray wrote, and offered to sell out to the Canadians. He was unable to produce legal proof of the claim and they took it.—Reuter's American Service.

that Ramsay MacDonald's advent to the Premiership means another to the list of First Ministers who have made golf their pastime. "J. H." says that he has had the honour of playing with five British Premiers devoted to the Royal and Ancient. He adds a word of regret that Earl Balfour has recently "backslid" from golf to tennis.

The power of golf in politics must now surely be recognized when we find the French press catechizing Mr. Lloyd George for the proselytizing of M. Briand on the links. That was the occasion, I may add, when "L. G.," looking back over the devastation of French territory caused by M. Briand's agricultural display, remarked "This looks like another case for the Reparations Committee!"

MISCELLANEA.

By the orders of Lossiemouth Town Council, a bonfire was lit on the Coulard Hill, a commanding height overlooking the fishing quarter of the town, where Mr. MacDonald's house is situated. One result of the Labour leader's rise to power is the sudden conversion of almost the whole of the fishing community, which used to be Liberal, but has gone over in a body to the newly-formed local branch of the Labour Party.

Many people south of the Border seem to be not a little puzzled over the Christian name of Ishbel, which is owned by the new Prime Minister's eldest daughter and future hostess at No. 10 Downing Street. The name—a variant of Elizabeth—is by no means uncommon in Scotland, and in the North-East and Moray Firth neighbourhood bearers of it are to be found in almost any village. It is the Christian name of the present Marchioness of Aberdeen.

Scottish literature is moderately well represented among the legislators who have been making history at St. Stephen's. Mr. James Welsh, M.P. for Airdrie and Coatbridge, has won fame as the Scottish miner poet (not minor, be it noted), and Mr. Robert Murray, the Labour member for West Renfrewshire, has also published a volume of poetry, and is a frequent contributor of verse to the magazines. Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald himself, in early life, dabbled successfully in fiction-writing and Mr. Frank Rose, the particularly independent Labourist who represents North Aberdeen, is dramatist as well as journalist.

During the adjournment of the House of Commons 11 of the Parliamentary representatives of Scottish Socialism came North by sea to Leith and then motored to Glasgow. Their choice of travel was a deliberate boycott of the railways on account of the strike. "We did not want indirectly to blackleg the men who are refusing to work the railways," was how one of them put it. Ministers may come and Ministers may go, but it is still the same old sea, as most of the Red Clydeside men showed only too plainly; but David Kirkwood seemed to have escaped easily; he was an outstanding figure on the deck of the steamer as he ostentatiously cut up "strong black" for his pipe.

A MUSIC TYPEWRITER

M. Fortoni, who is musical director at Prince's, gave a private demonstration at the Æolian Hall of the new musical typewriter that he has invented. Under M. Fortoni's fingers, this machine produced the most astonishing results. A line of Tchaikowsky's "Chanson sans Paroles" was transcribed in a few minutes and was transposed in as many more. The instrument can be used for copying out any kind of music and for any score that does not consist of more than 12 staves. Its utility is so obvious, indeed, both for obviating the necessary of engraving for the more ephemeral kinds of music and for duplicating band parts that the wonder is it has not been invented before. M. Fortoni's machine, which is covered by several patents both here and in America, is the result of 10 years' experimenting. It is very little larger than the ordinary typewriter, though it is, of course, much more intricate, having 40 arms and each arm possessing six different symbols.

OUR PARIS LETTER

The Gradual Restoration of Peace Between France and the Vatican

From Our Own Correspondent.

Paris, Jan. 25.

An important step towards the complete restoration of peace between Church and State in France has been taken. The Pope, after long deliberation, has authorized the formation of diocesan associations to provide for the maintenance of the clergy and, in general, the material side of the Catholic religion in France. The right to set up organizations of this kind was inserted in the Act of 1905, which brought about the formal separation of the two powers, but hitherto it has been absolutely rejected by the Holy See. The Act was voted without any reference to the head of the Church. France at that time was not represented at the Vatican, her envoy having been withdrawn in consequence of the trouble that followed the action of President Loubet in ignoring the Pope during his official visit to Rome.

Pope Pius X objected to the abolition of the Concordat by one of the parties, and it did not seem to him that the clauses in the Act concerning the transfer of the churches and other property were in accordance with the rights of the Church. Although the Act provided that the diocesan associations could be formed only "in conformity with the rules of general organization of the religion of which they (the associations) propose to ensure the practice," the Pope was afraid that some elements of insufficient respect for the Catholic hierarchy might find their way into the new organization. Moreover, the Church being eternal, there was no need for precipitation.

Pius X accordingly forbade the faithful to form such associations "until it was absolutely certain that they did not affect the divine constitution of the Church and the immutable rights of the Roman Pontiff and the bishops over the necessary property of the Church, and especially the sacred buildings," Pius X thus abstained from closing the door to any future reconciliation.

THE POSITION LEGAL.

After diplomatic relations between France and the Vatican were restored, the question was reopened, and it was pointed out on the French side that the French courts of law had invariably held the view that no association could be legal which was not endorsed by the ecclesiastical authority. For a long time, the Pope was convinced that a new law was necessary. He viewed the question from the point of view of canon law, which gives the legislator power to interpret the law. It was proved to him that in France the interpretation of the legislator's intentions is a matter solely for the courts. The Pope then asked if the regulations suggested for the creation of diocesan associations were in conformity with French law and did not infringe the rights of the Church. A formal opinion to this effect was obtained from three eminent legal authorities, but while the question was still open, several French prelates only expressed themselves against conciliation. One of them, the Cardinal Archbishop of Bordeaux, Mgr. Andrieux, declared that the legal opinion was unsound and alluded to the "partisans of religious peace at any price." M. Barthelémy, Dean of the Paris Faculty of Law, one of the three experts, published a refutation of the Archbishop's arguments. The Conseil d'Etat, the highest authority in the country, also declared that the associations would be perfectly legal. This seems to have at last satisfied the Pope.

Some of the bishops have already expressed their intention of forming associations, but Cardinal Andrieux, when asked by an interviewer if he intended to do so, evaded the question, though at the same time professing complete filial obedience to the Pope's advice.

SIX FOOT OF MOTHER EARTH.

An Act just passed by the French Parliament gives us a grim reminder of the overcrowding of some portions of the little ant-heap which we call the earth. It would appear that, here and there, the living are being cramped by the dead, and that to leave ordinary people's bones undisturbed for ever is barred by "considerations of space" as the editorial formula has it. It should be explained that a burial plot in a French cemetery can be either rented for a period of years, usually ranging from five to 30, or bought outright, in which case it is called a "perpetual concession." Under the new Act, this perpetuity becomes limited in certain cases. When a grave or family vault has been left untended for 75 years, the mayor is now empowered to certify the fact, and if the plot is still neglected for another 25 years, the local authorities will be entitled to resume possession of the ground so that it can be used for other interments, the assumption being that the relatives of the original occupants will have all died out and that no one is left whose feelings could be injured.

So much space is now occupied in cemeteries by "perpetual concessions" which have been left untouched for many years that the authorities will have to enlarge the existing cemeteries or make new ones; hence the present legislation for the future. The new Act also institutes 100-year concessions, which will no doubt eventually supersede those of the perpetual type. These will be sold at such high prices that only the wealthy will be able to afford the luxury of a permanent resting place for themselves and their family, and even this permanence, as we have seen, will be only conditional. It is one of the few vanities which the state cannot afford to encourage.

THE LATE PRINCE D'ARENBERG.

Prince Auguste d'Arenberg, who has just died at his large, old-fashioned house in the Rue de la Ville l'Evêque, in his 87th year, was one of the leading figures in Paris society. The d'Arenbergs, a very old family who took their name from a Rhineland estate between Cologne and Juliers, formed two branches, one French and the other Belgian. A d'Arenberg was a protector of Jean Jacques Rousseau and corresponded with Voltaire. Another fought against the British on the side of the Americans in the War of Independence and was the friend and executor of Mirabeau. A third d'Arenberg was among the senators appointed by Napoleon. Prince Auguste was the son of one of another batch of senators, Prince Pierre, who died in 1877. He fought against the Germans in 1870 and sat in the Chamber from 1877 to 1881 as a monarchist. He retured to Parliament in 1889, by which time he was considered as a "rallié," that is to say, a monarchist who accepted the Republic. He was the possessor of a considerable fortune, as fortunes go in France. For many years he was president of the Suez Canal Co. and he was a director of several other large companies. He was interested in art and in sport, was vice-president of the Jockey Club and was made a member of the Academy of Fine Arts in recognition of his position as a collector and patron of the arts.

"RAY OF SUNSHINE"

Lord Kinnaird's Daughter as Salvation Captain

The Hon. Anne Barbara Kinnaird, eldest daughter of Lord Kinnaird, has just taken up her residence in Barking as a captain in the Salvation Army.

The enthusiasm and energy that other girls of her class devote to dancing and golf she is using to bring happiness and help to the poor in the district where she now lives. "A ray of sunshine" the women whose home she visits call her.

A "Daily News" representative met her yesterday during her rounds in the company of two sister officers. Fairhaired and fair complexioned, she is modesty itself. "I am just one of thousands of Salvation Army girl officers," she said. "Why should I be different?"

Captain Kinnaird has spent two years as a cadet and officer. Her appointment to Barking coincided with her promotion to the rank of captain.

MUTINY MEMORIES OF LORD ROBERTS

Between the judgments of the subaltern engaged in operations and the judgments of the old campaigner looking back over a long vista of years a great gulf is fixed. How great one may realize by perusing "Letters Written During the Indian Mutiny" (Macmillan & Co., Ld., 10s. 6d.), by Fred Roberts, and contrasting their contents with the record of "Forty-one Years in India," penned by Field-Marshal Lord Roberts.

The Commander-in-Chief in whom Lord Roberts could see "no hesitation or delay" was to the view of Lieut. Roberts in May 1857 "most dilatory and undecided." Some harsh criticisms, subsequently modified, are to be found in this packet of 30 letters which, labelled by "Bobs'" own hand, were found after his death.

In them we are told, more than in the later volume, which reviewed his Indian career as a whole, of personal experiences in the years 1857-8. Written to a father whom he revered, a mother whom he worshipped, and a sister, Harriet, there are many unconscious revelations of character.

SPUR OF AMBITION.

Ambition spurred him on. "I'll work hard and I have no doubt get on," was the pledge he gave his mother, and, when inactivity before Delhi was beginning to fret his nerves, he confided to her: "What I want most is the Victoria Cross. If I can only manage that, how jolly I should be."

He was ready to be ruthless. Writing of the execution of mutineers he says: "The death that seems to have most effect is being blown from a gun. It is rather a horrible sight, but. . . . had they begun this régime a little earlier one half of the destruction and mutiny would have been saved." And when news of the Cawnpore horror reached the camp—"nothing has ever happened in the world like this"—he records that in his mind it > excited such a feeling of horror that I would undergo cheerfully any privation, any amount of work, living in the hopes of a revenge on these cruel murderers.

Even when, after nine months in the field, he admitted to his sister that he "wished most sincerely this horrid war was at an end," he hastened to add:—

> You must not think that I pity the blackguards who are rebelling against us. On the contrary, few are more unrelenting than I am. When a prisoner is brought in I am the first to call out to have him hanged, knowing that unless the severest measures are adopted we shall have no end to our war.

Roberts was not lucky in the matter of horses. In a "small scrimmage" in September he had his horse shot under him. "However, my horse I did not value much, and by-and-by will get compensation for it," he remarked philosophically. On his 25th birthday, when in pursuit of the Delhi mutineers:—

> I had the misfortune to have a very fine charger shot right between his eyes—lucky his head was in the way or I should have caught it. Early in the day the old charger had a very narrow escape. A round shot came lobbing along and passed between his legs. Rather close.

On the road from Delhi to Cawnpore a round of grape "knocked over my orderly's horse and wounded me slightly in the face, very nearly carrying off my whisker!!" The same day another horse of his was wounded by a sabre cut.

Some time later the Empire came within an ace of losing "Bobs" when, as he mounted his horse after attending to some gun limbers, he was shot in the back "just where my waistbelt goes. Most fortunately, through God's mercy, I had a small leather pouch on my belt. There is little doubt what the result would have been had I not had the pouch on. Fortunately, the ball just missed my spine." The wound kept him on the sick list for six weeks.

A DREADFUL PICTURE.

Through the letters runs an under-current of deep-seated horror at the atrocities committed, and here and there war is revealed in all its naked ghastliness.

When the Highlanders and Sikhs stormed the Sekundarbagh at Lucknow—> before half an hour was over nearly 2000 Pandies (rebels) were on the ground, dead or dying. They were literally in heaps, and when I went in were a heaving mass, some dead, but most wounded, and unable to get up from the crush. You had to walk over them to cross the court.

Little wonder that a day or two later he writes: "I have seen battles now in every shape, and shall not be sorry to have a rest."

In February 1858 Roberts was able to tell his mother that his dream of the V.C. had come true. "Is not this glorious?" he asks. A month later he was detailing his plans for 15 months' sick leave, and there the letters end.—"Evening Standard."

"HELIGOLAND OF THE PACIFIC"

Faralone Is. and Defence of America's Pacific Coast

Washington, Feb. 9.

Fortification of the Faralone Islands would make the defence of San Francisco Bay more secure but would not eliminate the necessity of the proposed Alameda base, said Admiral Eberle, Chief of Naval Operations, giving evidence before the House Naval Committee.

The Faralone Islands, Representative Miller (Republican, Washington) said, seemed to be the Heligoland of the Pacific and he was "astounded" they had not been fortified.

Admiral Eberle replied that he was in favour of fortifying the islands.

Representative Curry (Republican, California) questioning the witness, asserted that there apparently was some confusion regarding the current in the Carquiens Strait and off the Alameda base. He read a coast and geddetic report which gave the currents to be of equal velocity.

Representative MacLafferty (Republican, California) asked if it would not be possible for an enemy to sink a merchant ship in the Pinole Channel and block access to the Mare Island yard. The Admiral said this would be possible.

Admiral Eberle, replying to a question by Representative Britten (Republican, Illinois), said he understood there was no competition between Mare Island and Alameda for the base, as it would be located either at Alameda or not at all. He added that, regardless of where the base might be, anchorage would be in San Francisco Bay.—Reuter's American Service.

THE AMERICAN DRAMA

An Organization to Develop Native-born Talent

New York, Jan. 28.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is included among the 45 members already belonging to an organization to be known as "The Founders of the American Theatre," which is intended to back the Equity Players in their efforts to stimulate native American drama by the production of plays written and acted by Americans.

The organization, it was announced yesterday by Mr. Frank P. Gillmore, executive secretary of the Players' Association, will consist of 100 members, each to contribute $1,000.

Plays will be produced not only in theatres here but also in Chicago, San Francisco and other theatrical centers. The aim of the founders is to pattern it after the Moscow Art Theatre.

Announcement of a prize of $2,500 from an anonymous donor for the best American play submitted or produced before October 21 was made by Mr. Gillmore.—Reuter's American Service.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTERS

Ireland Invades Clyde Belt: Ultra-Scots Alarmed: Huge Socialist Vote Explained: Demand for Deer Forests Fallen Off

From Our Own Correspondent.

The large emigration of Scots from the Highlands and Lowlands and the still larger influx of unskilled Irish labourers, is greatly regretted in many quarters. Ultra Scots say that there are now over 600,000 Irish people in the Scottish industrial belt, and they multiply so much more rapidly than the Scots that in 50 years they will form the majority. We are not sure whether this is calculation or prophecy. But one fact is beyond question,—namely, that the Irish population in the Clyde belt is largely responsible for the return of Socialist representatives for that area. Indeed, we should be inclined to go further and say that not a single Socialist representative in Scotland would have been returned if the Irish vote were subtracted. This is a serious matter for the Scots, whose political mind is being misrepresented by the growth of a non-Scot element.

A London writer replies to the grievance of some of the extremely patriotic Scots by pointing out that "the Scot emigrates to benefit himself, and he can scarcely be allowed to argue that while he leaves his native country another race, regarding Scotland as more desirable than he does, shall not be allowed to take his place. Somebody must run the country if it is not to waste away." The conclusion of the Southern writer is—"Should Scotland decide on a campaign to convince everybody of the advantage of living in his native country, there will be no opposition, but rather enthusiastic endorsement from England, even though we be thereby deprived of a Prime Minister."

The vague uneasiness excited by the alarmist statement as to the extent of the Irish invasion of Scotland is reduced to its proper proportions by some details of the last census figures. These show that in 1921 there were fewer Irish-born people in the country than in 1911. The decrease was 15,695, and over a period of 20 years there was a decrease of 46,044. All the people of Irish birth in Glasgow (65,689) could very comfortably attend a football match at Hampden Park without the rest of the city being aware that the streets were any less crowded than usual. In point of fact, there are more English-born people in Scotland than Irish-born. The ratio is 3.88 of the total population, as against 3.26 for the Irish-born. Now that Scotsmen are firmly assured by these official figures that they still rule their own roost, they can complacently go on with the business of controlling Great Britain as well.

SLUMP IN DEER FORESTS.

The case of the Duke of Westminster's application for reduction of the annual valuation of a Highland deer forest of which he is the proprietor is of considerable interest both in a social sense and from the point of view of rating authorities in the Highlands. There are many signs that the demand for deer forests has fallen off. Grouse moors apparently, retain their popularity, owing in some measure to the easy motor run to the butts, the lunch cart, the bevy of ladies at lunch, and other features which may alternatively be described as abominations or amenities. But apparently chasing the deer and following the roe is rather too strenuous an occupation for the majority of the new rich. At all events, the pleasure to be derived from it does not appear to be held commensurate with the huge outlay involved. One contributory cause is, of course, the large increase in the cost of the upkeep of shootings. But the chief drawback of deer-stalking would seem to be the difficulty of conveniently combining it with motoring. Nowadays, also, the possession of a deer forest no longer confers the same social cachet as it did in the days when the majority of sportsmen were aristocrats. Taken on its own merits, as a form purely of amusement, it is found wanting when compared with pursuits that involve rapid movement and a quick succession of social distractions. The new rich will never be at a loss for ways of getting rid of their money, and it does not seem likely that they will have to fall back upon deer-stalking to an extent sufficient to maintain in the future the present values of deer forests.

THE NOBEL PEACE PRIZE.

A memorial has been sent to the Norwegian Nobel Committee, recommending that the Nobel Peace Prize this year be given to Mr. E. D. Morel, M.P., who represents Dundee in the House of Commons. The memorial thus describes his works:—"From 1900 to 1912 E. D. Morel conducted his great campaign against the Congo atrocities. Until the publication of his book, 'Red Rubber,' in 1906, his struggle against one of the subtlest of European monarchs was almost single-handed, and his final success, when the reforms of 1912 were secured, was recognized by national and international tributes. From that time he devoted himself to the study of international questions, and in his published works from 1922 onward he described the dangers he saw threatening the peace of the world, and especially the perils growing out of the exploitation of Africa by the great European Powers. From the outbreak of war in 1914 he worked determinedly, and in the face of bitter opposition and persecution for a means of securing a lasting and an early peace, doing his utmost to make known the truth about the war as he saw it, and the principles upon which peace would be founded. From the black days of the war he has now emerged to occupy a foremost place amongst those members of the House of Commons whose work for world peace is acknowledged and honoured." The signatories to the memorial include Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, Lord Parmoor, Mr. C. P. Trevelyan, Mr. Arthur Henderson, Mr. Philip Snowden, Professor Raymond Beazley, of Birmingham University; and Mr. Arthur Ponsonby.

DEMOCRATIC RUGGER.

The composition of the Welsh Rugby team which met Scotland at Edinburgh presents an interesting contrast to that of the Scottish team, and provides evidence, if any were needed, of the democratic nature of Rugby football in Wales. It is noteworthy that, while the members of the Scottish team are mostly ex-public school and University men, the representatives of Wales include two miners, a labourer, a dock worker, a steelworker, and four policemen.

There is likely to be a "steer" over the resolution passed at the Scottish Students' Conference in Edinburgh, which strikes at the F. P. Rugby teams in the Capital and elsewhere. Students are expected to offer their services first to their Universities. This means that the lads from Watson's, Heriot's, Daniel Stewart's, etc., will be compelled to play against their own schools which gave them their training so that the Universities may get their pick of players. It is doubtful if the University authorities will interfere, as suggested, with the liberty of the students. When an outstanding game is on the card,—say with Oxford or Cambridge—the University makes a call on its students who play for other clubs, and they always willingly respond.

MISCELLANEA.

In pleading at the Presbytery of Edinburgh for aid for the distress in the Highlands and Islands, the Rev. Dr. Norman Maclean referred to the bad weather conditions last autumn. A friend of his had told him that he spent a month in his native island in August last year. He had one shower of rain, and that one shower lasted 28 days.

In Lady Norah Bentinck's "Wanderings and Memories" there is a passing glimpse of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. In the course of a conversation she told him that she was trying the Coué system on her little boy—she goes beyond this, and is a believer in the "supernormal"—by repeating to him slowly and distinctly when he is sound asleep. "You must be Lord Chancellor"; the only result, however, so far, being that he murmured when half-awake, "No; I'll be a chauffeur." "He (Mr. MacDonald) wondered why I had chosen Lord Chancellor rather than Prime Minister. Did I think it a more important post? and I said that I did."

During Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's recent visit to Edinburgh his host was Mr. Alexander Grant, the biscuit manufacturer, who has recently offered to provide funds for the erection of a Scottish National Library. Like Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Grant was a humble Moray "loon," and started at the bottom of the ladder. When he came to Edinburgh his first call was at the bakery door of Messrs. M'Vitie and Price. He was informed that no new hands were required, but the persistence of the young man from the North at last brought the query—"Well, what can you do?" "I can make a better biscuit than you," was the prompt reply. He was invited to show his skill, and that the loon was as good as his word is borne out by his position to-day and the reputation of the firm as biscuit makers.

Not many people have read Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's beautifully written life of his wife, Margaret Ethel MacDonald, and this short extract may be given as a sample of his style—"Where has love walked more tenderly with death than in the Tweed dales, or where have brave hearts fought against fate more grimly and chivalrously? The songs of the valleys are the defiant lilts of the soldier and the heart-broken croonings of the maiden. A brief romantic life and an untimely pathetic death, that was the fate which made the hills and dales of the Tweed country sonorous with ballad and song."

Mr. William Adamson, M.P., the new Secretary for Scotland, has a hobby that would not appeal to all Ministers of the Crown. He takes a very deep interest in the religious welfare of children, and when he is in Dunfermline he conducts a Bible class every Sunday afternoon.

A new Socialist M.P., "probably a Scot," was the guest of a provincial Chamber of Commerce and sought to show that members of the new Government were not lacking in business ability. One of them, he said, came into the smoke room of the House of Commons, and announced that he had drawn his 4s. 6d. "Where did you get it?" asked several other members who were sitting round. He explained that it was interest on his election deposit, and his comrades made a note of it.

A "Dry" Burns Nicht: This Year's Celebrations of the Immortal Memory

Edinburgh, Jan. 30.

It is safe to say that more people celebrated the anniversary of Burn's birthday throughout the English-speaking world than had ever been the case before, for every year adds to the number of Burns Nichts. Not indeed that all the celebrants are Scots, either by birth or descent. A Burns Nicht, especially of Scotland, is becoming, like other Scots festivals, a rallying point for English-speaking people generally, whether in our own farflung Commonwealth or in America.

A similar change has taken place in regard to the keeping of Hogmanay, which, but a few years ago the monopoly, in London, of some hundreds of rather noisy Scots youths in front of St. Paul's Cathedral, now affords a lucrative form of merrymaking for most of the big West-End hotels, where thousands of Englishmen try to sing "Auld Lang Syne" (sic), if they have not always a clear knowledge of what has become a hymn of widespread significance in the art of saying good-night. At many of the Burns celebrations the immortal memory was proposed by distinguished men who were not Scots—an innovation which does not always please "thrawn commentators sweir to gree." Last year Mr. Chesterton, who, despite the Scots "Keith" in his name, is one of the most typical Englishmen living, held forth at the monster dinner of the Burns Club of London, and was broadcasted far and wide. This appreciation, however, is inevitable, for Burns is not only national but international, his metre, helped enormously by its musical setting, making an appeal to a wholly non-literary public far greater than that of any other writer, for people who never even open a book can quote Burns.

THE "GLORIOUS HAGGIS."

In modern times the haggis has become the typical Scottish dish, particularly identified with the festivals of St. Andrew and Robert Burns, but it is a surprising fact that for many centuries, while popular in Scotland, it was also an English favourite. Recipes for its making were given in more than one cookery book of the 15th century, and we find this description in one of the 17th., "The English Housewife":—"That pudding which is called the haggas or haggus, of whose goodness it is vain to boast, because there is hardly to be found a man that doth not affect them." Yet this popularity dwindled, and seems to have faded away about the beginning or middle of the 18th century. In the middle of the 19th a writer promulgated the now prevalent notion:—"There is something transcendentally Scotch about a haggis." To have known haggis, and its fragrant lusciousness and to have forgotten it!

Another interesting point about the haggis is its cheapness, combined with its food qualities. For a small sum it may be purchased—drab, bulging, hideous—but with what worth, what cheer within. The fruit of the oat—that grain, with its large content of albuminoids, which has sustained hundreds of thousands of hardy Northerners; the onion, ancient of history, with its nutritive and stimulant properties; the fat, even as used by King Arthur's Queen in that famous bag pudding; the rich and savoury meat, the very heart and core of noble mutton.

The derivation of the name, which has been variously spelled, baffles the dictionaries. There is an old verb, "to hag," meaning to hew or chop. But the same word signified "to trouble, as the nightmare!" Well, we have known it happen when haggis was indulged in not wisely, but too well. But Grose gives, though without etymology, a word nag, haggus—for the lower part of the body. And here, doubtless, we have the immediate derivation. They were wont to call a spade a spade in old days and a haggis and its container, being what it was, was simply a haggis.

BURNSIANA.

An American paper contains an effort by a local bard to produce humorous Braid Scots verse. One bloomer is the rhyming of "picked" with "nicht." The poem is entitled "Hunting the Haggis," and the first verse is:—

My heart's in the Highlands; it's there by its lane,
A-hunting the haggis o'er bracken and stane—
The wild whustling haggis, wi' lang bristling beard,
That bids in the gorse bushes, dreeing its weird.

A number of the Burns Clubs have special rituals of their own. I know of one where it is demanded of the orator of the evening that he drink a glass of whisky neat before signing the Visitors' Book. In another case each diner on the "Twenty-Fifth" must furnish for the chairman's menu-card an appropriate quotation from the works of the bard and sign it. Then out Dunfermline way there is a club that expects the proposer of "The Immortal Memory" to don a Tam o' Shanter and Shepherd tartan plaid provided for his adornment. The request makes even the strongest of men quail.

A ladies' Burns supper, held in Ayr under the auspices of the "Eastern Star" struck a new note. Mere man was allowed to attend, but the "Immortal Memory" was proposed by a lady. And the evening was a "dry" one!

MR. MACDONALD AS A NEIGHBOUR.

"The Prime Minister is of goodly stature, tall and well-proportioned, with a well-turned leg which his knickerbocker suit shows to advantage. He has a straight, boyish figure, and his eyes are boy's eyes too, brown and merry. I particularly like his smile, which includes his eyes as well as his mouth. His brindled hair and bronzed face remind one a little of Andrew Lang." So writes Isabel Cameron, the authoress describing a visit which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald paid to her home. "He asked me how the 'Doctor' was getting on, and whether I had made my fortune yet. 'Not so as to buy a motor car,' I replied sadly, and hoped he would not notice the hole in the seat of the chair whereon I sat."

A Celt he is, possessing to the full all the glamour of his race. To such a man Scott's novels make an irresistible appeal. He is continually reading them. "Ivanhoe" was the favourite last Christmas. Addison's essays and old history interest him, particularly the story of Oliver Cromwell; for that old Ironside the new Prime Minister has an especial fondness. To the "Old Dominie," as Mr. MacDonald calls the late Mr. George MacDonald, schoolmaster of Drainie, he owes his love for good literature. When this old teacher died Mr. MacDonald wrote a letter of such deep sympathy and fond appreciation that the mere reading of it brings tears to one's eyes. He speaks of his debt to the old dominie, which he can never discharge. One cannot help thinking that this same old dominie must have found his young pupil teacher a scholar after his own heart. In Morayshire, with all its historical associations and history, the future Prime Minister had many schools and schoolmasters. To hear him speak of the Caves of Covesea is to hear him speak of something he loved well!

A wonderfully strong bond of affection exists between Mr. MacDonald and his five good-looking young offspring. His eldest daughter, Ishbel, spent a year in Lossiemouth School, and all the young MacDonald's are fond of their Morayshire home, "The Hillocks." When their grandmother was alive she found all her delight in looking after her stirring grandchildren. The youngest girl's birthday fell about the days of the General Election. "What would you like for your birthday?" one of the others asked her. "That Daddy would be returned at the head of the poll," was the reply of this staunch young politician.

Of their mother, a beautiful and gracious lady, Lossiemouth still speaks with loving respect. Her care for children, her interest in all that was for the betterment of humanity, have left a wonderful memory, and her influence surely can be traced in Mr. MacDonald's own love for children and concern for their future.

SCOTS-AMERICAN WAR MEMORIAL.

A communication has been made to Lord Provost Sleigh, by Mr. John Buchan, LL. D., the well-known author, as to a Scottish-American memorial in Edinburgh. Mr. Buchan has been approached by a Scotsman resident in America, on behalf of a number of Scottish organizations in that country, with the suggestion that a memorial of Scotsmen's part in the war should be erected in Edinburgh as a tribute from Scotsmen in America. The suggestion—subject to variation in all details—was that a piece of statuary, probably the figure of a Highlandman, should be erected in Princes Street. If the proposal were approved, the writer of the communication on the subject was prepared to get in touch with the various Scottish societies throughout America. A difficulty is that suitable sites for statues in Princes Street are already occupied. It is understood, however, that local views on the form such a memorial might take would be open to consideration on the part of the originators of the proposal.

PLAYED WITH FIVE PREMIERS.

J. H. Taylor, the five times champion, notes with satisfaction

none but British films are to be exhibited. Its promoters are likely to do more harm than good if they are not careful. There are not enough good British films to go round in one large town, leaving out the rest of the country. Such a demonstration might be possible in five years time. If held this year there will be many cinema patrons in the future who will give any picture house showing "Wholly British Production This Week" a very wide berth until the Americans are back again.

THE CHARM OF MEI LAN FANG

Personal Impressions of China's Great Actor-Actress

By Achilles.

Successful men are said to be ruined by success. With Mei Lan Fang the adage "Nothing succeeds like success" is much more apt. He is gloriously free from those ailments so frequently created by prosperity: Yet he is undoubtedly the most famous Chinese actor; his name is known across the world, in China it is always mentioned when superficial reference is made to the stage, or when Chinese make explanatory remarks to uninitiated foreigners about the Chinese theatre. Stray books by tourists and others on matters general appertaining to China, contain reference, however slight and inaccurate to Mei Lan Fang. When he visited Japan he received such an unsurpassed ovation. Japanese girls went "Mei-mad" over him, as Mr. M. T. Z. Tyau remarks in passing commentary on the Stage in the East in one of the chapters of his book "China Awakened." He has played before, met, and been fêted by presidents and generals. He has received 150 medals from leading lights as tokens of their esteem. All this praise, expressed implied, has left him untainted by pride.

"HOU T'AI": BEHIND THE SCREENS.

The other morning at 1 o'clock, after the performance of "Lo Shun" one of his best pieces, was over, Mei Lan Fang gave the writer a delightful reception behind the screens. The greeting, nay welcome, which he extended to this foreigner could not have been more friendly or charming.

Although Mei had been acting before some 3,000 people for nearly two hours, winning the usual quantity of hushed attention and enthusiastic applause, he was as fresh as if he had newly completed a gentle game at tennis. The green room of the Kung Wu T'ai, the theatre in which he was appearing (situated on a side road just off the Rue du Consulat) was cold, but roomy. It was reached by a longish walk, known only to the initiated: a climb down a sort of fire-escape ladder, a fifty-yards progression along a kind of private lane, and an entry up a sloping passage way. The show had just ended, and Mei had to remove his gaudy garments, but in four minutes he turned up, jauntily throwing on his jacket-waistcoat as he did so, and advancing in a mild hail-fellow-well-met manner. He shook hands first à la Chinoise, then in foreign style. He has two or three good interpreters and secretaries, and it was the full intention of the writer to engage him, suitably and humbly, in conversation through them. But as Mei was so exceedingly willing to be friends, and spoke in such easily distinguishable, tones, there was no question as to whether he was to be answered in English or Chinese. So the conversation was a very cheerful one. Mei was naive enough to inquire whether he acted well or not. He was sufficiently unoriginal to remark that the foreigner spoke good Pekinese. Mei had seen the Italian opera, but this proved a tall topic and one was glad to be off it. It is rather hard for an Englishman who cannot fathom more than a word or two of the Italian opera nor much more of the Chinese to conduct a conversation with the foremost Chinese actor on the former subject. In parenthesis, it is to be noted that three-fourths even of Chinese who go to the Chinese theatre cannot understand or even hear a great deal of what is being said. This is due to one of four causes or to all:

1. The discrepancy between dialects.
2. The din of the orchestra.
3. The high falsetto employed, and
4. The poor accoustics.

This may seem a remarkable fact, but the maxim that when you go to the theatre you must leave your mind behind is fairly reasonable. It is not necessarily the mind that must be appealed to at all times. There is something soothing about the Italian opera, and similarly so with the Chinese theatre, provided of course in regard to the latter that the 'lo,' or gong, remains silent, which is certainly a difficult condition to get unless some bright member of the audience contrives to steal it or have it mislaid! In this connexion it should be said that, much as foreigners hate the noisy clanging

MEI LAN FANG.

In the Engrossing Sword Dance with the Clam in his 'Lien Chin Feng' of the theatre gong, sometimes the Chinese in the audience hate it more. He will close his ears with his hands, and mutter words regarding the superior attractions of a cinema.

VISITING EUROPE.

Mei Lan Fang intends to visit America next year. The writer told him he ought to go to England. He grew enthusiastic over the idea, and seemed to think the writer might help to boost the project by suggesting it in the press. It is worth boosting.

If audiences in Europe were given the chance to see Mei Lan Fang in his graceful stage-parts, their interest in China would be stimulated. He would act the rôle of an Ambassador. Good feeling between the East and West would be assisted. Surely this is inevitable: anybody who saw Mei during his recent visit here would probably endorse this view.

He possesses so many of the attributes of the best Chinese. His decorum on the stage and off is perfect; his cleverness is obvious; his good will is evident in his various attempts to give the utmost possible satisfaction at all times when he is acting.

"The humble enjoy continual peace, but in the heart of the proud is envy and frequent indignation." There is not much of the latter with Mei but a great deal of the former. He appeared on that occasion in the Green Room a model of self-respecting humility far removed of course from emphatic self-depreciation, which would have been completely out of place. Characteristic of him was his action in personally dashing for a cigarette and lighting the match for his guest. None of the numerous attendants who were at beck and call were summoned to procure them. His manners, as has been said, are without fault, and his natural shyness, even if it is not now very pronounced, is sufficiently apparent to increase ones interest in him.

HIS FEMALE IMPERSONATION.

His part, as all who know his name are aware, is that of impersonator of feminine roles. For this he is well qualified by his build. The Apollo type of man is often regarded as what he frequently is, rather flabby. This Mei is not. His smooth countenance and appearance of being on the stage unrecognizable from a fascinating Chinese damsel are considerably assisted by paint and powder, as is inevitable. Behind the screens he is a most pleasant Chinese gentleman with a masculine air pronounced enough to absolve him from being considered effeminate. His attitude is one of keenness, wide-awakedness, and especially sympathy. Of the latter he has much: many sums have been devoted by him to the relief work in Japan and to other charitable funds: his determination not to appear in any way conceited is another evidence of his sympathy, which is in no small measure conveyed by his which are large, mobile and animated.

An opinion exists that the profession of acting is a degraded one in China. Sir Henry Irving being knighted is quoted as an example of what would not happen in China. Actors the world over are usually of a poor and lowly origin. This much one may admit, but not that they are lower than in the West when it comes to a discussion of "stars." There is just as great a tendency to write panegyrics about actors in China as in England. Mei Lan Fang, for example, had a father, grandfather, and uncle all of whom made themselves well-known by their theatrical skill.

OTHER NEAR THE THRONE.

The second greatest actor in China, also a female impersonator, who is obviously cut out to be Mei's successor, is Ch'êng Yen Ch'iu (程艷秋). He is only 21, and is of the fifth generation of the family of a high high Councillor of Chien Lung, one of China's greatest Emperors.

After Ch'êng Yen Ch'iu has had his period of supreme rule among popular actors, it will probably be Lu Mu Tan who, in turn, will step into his shoes. This Lu Mu Tan (綠牡丹) is still only about 17 or 18, and is the son of a retired official. Mei Lan Fang has expressed much approval of the manner in which this young actor performs. He is smaller than Mei, but there is time for him to grow. His humility is not yet so wonderful as that of Mei. But all these three most celebrated actors have a much greater humility than the actual Chinese actresses seen as a rule. The chief Chinese actresses in Shanghai perform at the Kung Wu Tai. It is the only one of the seven big Shanghai theatres (there are of course numerous smaller ones) in which actresses appear. Fen Chu Hua, Chang Wen Yen and Lu Lan Chun (Chinese characters 粉菊花,張文艷,露蘭春, respectively) seem to have a too high appreciation of their importance, if one can judge from their pouting expressions exhibited on the stage, and their less spontaneous smiles.

Suficient, however, has been said to show that it is absurd to claim that Chinese actors all enjoy a mean status.

STUDYINN THE CHINESE STAGE.

Foreigners in Shanghai who care to study the Chinese stage are lucky: it is the second best place for doing so, Peking of course being first. Take the three actors named above, for example. None is at present in this city, but all have been within the past six months. Mei returned to Peking on January 22, Ch'êng about three or four months ago, and Lu went from here to Tientsin some time in the autumn. All will probably return ere very long, although Mei certainly will not come back for a while, except perhaps to act here on his way to England or America. Lu Mu Tan is the one most likely to return first. He is to be watched. He acted for several months last year in the Ch'un Hua (Spring Flowers Theatre) Wu T'ai in Chapei, and may do so again. It is not very easy to find it, but it is not far, and a nice, roomy, new place.

The seven largest theatres in Shanghai are the following:—

T'ien C'han Wu T'ai (天蟾舞台) Near Wing On Tan Kuei Ti I T'ai (丹桂第一台) Foochow Road
Ta Wu T'ai (大舞台) Hankow Road
I Wu T'ai (亦舞台) Hoopeh Road
Hsin Wu T'ai (新舞台) Native City
Ch'un Hua Wu T'ai (春華舞台) Chapei
Kung Wu Tai (共舞台) French Concession

The first of these seven is the enormous building just behind Wing On's, which everybody at that busy crossing can hardly help noticing, distinguishable by the large cigarette advertisement looking down towards Nanking Road.

Mei Lan Fang acted in the Kung Wu T'ai, Ch'êng Yen Ch'iu in the Ta Wu Tai and Lu Mu Tan in the Ch'un Hua Wu T'ai. The largest theatre of all, that behind Wing On's, does not, for one reason or another, get the most notable performers, although it has an enormous seating capacity.

MEI LAN FANG'S COMPANY.

The chief members of the great actor's caste, recently here, were the following:—

Yen Chu P'eng 言菊朋
Hsiao Kuei Hua 小桂花
Wang Feng Ch'ing 王鳳卿
Chiang Miao Hsiang 姜妙香
Chou Rui An 周瑞安
Chu Kuei Fang 朱桂芳
Yao Yu Fu 姚玉芙

Of these the three first are bearded-rôle performers, i.e. lao sheng; Chiang Miao Hsiang, my friend of the green room always plays the part of a young man, i.e. hsiao sheng; and of the three others, the two first are militarists whose office is always to be warriors, i.e. wu sheng; while the last is a Hua Tan (female Impersonator) like Mei.

Special mention must be made of Ch'en Yen Heng (陳彥衡) who is the most celebrated living

LU MU TAN.

A future Mei Lan Fang Here disguised as a Girl

huchin (fiddle) player and who can earn two or three thousand monthly. His playing was much applauded in Shanghai.

Mei was here altogether 40 odd days. No one play was presented more than six times, and this occurred only in the case of Lo Shun, his best, already mentioned. His most noteworthy plays, in their conventional order of merit as seen by dramatic critics, were the following:—

1. Lo Shun 洛神
2. Pa Wang Pieh Chi 霸王別姬
3. Lien Chin Feng 廉錦楓
4. Hsi Shih 西施
5. Hung Hsien T'ao Ho 紅線盜盒
6. T'ien Nu San Hua 天女散花

And, of course, standing in rather a class of its own, the unusual T'ien Ho P'ei (天河配) which is supposed to be played only on one special day in the year but was given by special request.

Mei's plays are mostly of an historical or fairy-tale nature. He seems to prefer the latter. It suits best his capacity for imitating a winsome maiden who performs wonderful deeds: his sword dance or fight with a clam in Lien Ching Feng is engrossing. He pirouettes about the stage engaged in imaginary combat with this mysterious habitant of the underwaters. Another beautifully dressed "girl" hidden behind the great shells which she holds before her in her part as clam, endeavours to snap up Mei by catching him between her large forceps. The sword is imprisoned several times but always escapes again. Mei retreats to the back of the stage in a zig-zag direction, gradually vanishing and ever growing dimmer through a maze of thin gauze hung from the roof in layers, followed by the clam. Fishes bob about across the stage and the under-sea aspect is well represented. Both return slowly and the clam is mortally wounded at the last while Mei plucks from behind the now open shell encasements an elixir (which is symbolized by a pink silk handkerchief) which is to save her mother's life. It is a very pretty dance.

LAST WORDS.

Mei is now nearly 30. He has a little daughter who has inherited good looks from her father, when in Shanghai he stayed with several others of his troupe in a large foreign house in Rue Lafayette. His profits were very great as his houses were so good. It is said he made $5,000 on his best nights, and seldom less than $3,000, but these figures cannot be guaranteed. His expenses, of course, are enormous.

A large crowd was assembled at Shanghai North Station to see him off to Peking piped by a military band. He was in highest spirits, enjoying the bustle and excitement. Two thousand dollars was the cost of railway tickets alone for the large company to Peking.

In Peking Mei usually acts in the Chen Kuang Tien Ying Yuen (眞光電影園).

The Englishman or Scotsman who will come to terms to invite Mei Lan Fang to London to perform there will be a wise and sound person, and will earn vast reward and gratitude from artistic Britons.

CUI BONO?

"Each sufferer says his say, his scheme of the weal and woe:
But God has a few of us whom he whispers in the ear;
The rest may reason and welcome: 'tis we musicians know."

On the wall of the Musicians room the violin hung with broken strings.

That same night in the great concert hall the violinist had played to a thousand listeners.

A thousand souls had followed its echo through the realms of ethereal sound to mingle with the silence.

It seemed as though the spirits of the Old Masters had conspired to touch with magic that artist's bow. That together they conversed in soft caressing notes, unutterably sweet, or in deep and solemn organ tones of unknown melodies and divine things. . . .

Yet he seemed unconscious of the almost unearthly harmony he had invoked, of the spiritual atmosphere he had created.

It warmed the hearts of the aged, it soothed and comforted those who sorrowed, and their sorrows crept away, and the young dreamt of the future and "saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be."

It was his first concert, and as the people streamed from the hall, one heard whispers of 'the greatest artist' . . . . 'what a future' . . . . 'the world at his feet.'

The young violinest went home. He knew he would never play again. Music was an essential part of him; he lived for his art alone. Having attained the summit, he realized that he had lost that all-important factor—Desire.

He had wandered beyond the ken of man, and from those illusionary heights he knew not the way back.

That night the musician lay dead in his room, and the violin, his beloved toy, hung mutely on the wall.

LESSONS IN GOLF

I.—Some Advice on Driving

(By Harry Vardon Six Times Open Champion)

Below will be found the first two of a series of articles by Harry Vardon, the famous golfer. We have obtained the exclusive local rights for these articles, the others of which will appear in due course.

A very large proportion of the unsuccessful golf that one sees everywhere is due to the fact that the perpetraters of it have never taken the trouble to master certain essential — and quite simple — principles. Many of these enthusiasts may have had lessons early in their careers but forgotten them long ago, and joined the great army whose habit it is to declare that they have "no opportunity for quiet practice; only enough time to play the game for diversion and exercise."

I have known very few people who played golf without being keen to do well at it, whatever they may have said, in periods of frustration, about being content to get recreation out of it. That is its way at any rate, in 99 cases out of every hundred. It is either a passion or nothing. Consequently, I would ask the reader who thinks that he sees any light in the hints that I offer, to make an opportunity for occasional practice. If he can devote only 20 minutes to it whenever he visits the course—the 20 minutes before he sets out on his round—he will find it well worth while.

THE UNSUCCESSFUL PLAYER.

Let us assume that our subject is one who, for a fairly considerable period, has been pursuing the game more or less unsuccessfully—either because he has never achieved a tolerable degree of proficiency at it, or, having once attained a condition which he was well satisfied to call his "form," has since lost it.

In these circumstances we may deem him ready to consider afresh the question of his swing. For the present, we will leave his grip alone, convinced as his grip is the real cause of the trouble, and it is the detail that I always study first in a pupil. Where, however, it has possibilities of producing the desired results and it is more or less ingrained in his golfing constitution, I do not believe in altering it.

To become accustomed to a new way of holding the club is, for many people, a long-drawn out trial. If the player finds after a period of experimentation that, however faithfully he seems to be observing the correct principles of the swing, his shots are still unsatisfactory, it will be of the first importance for him to pay heed to his grip.

STARTING THE SWING.

We will begin with the driving swing. Assuming that the player is not obtaining much joy from his tee-shots, I would ask him at the outset to put away his driver and substitute, for it his brassie—the only provision being that the length and lie of the two clubs must be exactly the same.

By the "lie" I mean the angle which the shaft makes with the ground when the club-head is placed behind the ball in the natural position for striking. Similarity between the driver and the brassie in this detail—and also in regard to its length—is important, so that when the one club is exchanged for the other, the player feels to be playing exactly the same kind of shot.

The advantage of the brassie to a man who is not driving well is that its slightly stiffer shaft and its element of loft on the club-face combine to breed confidence. When that has been acquired, the driver can be reinstated.

THE PROPER DRIVE.

For the proper hitting of a golf drive—which should make the ball rise into the air and accomplish most of the distance by "carry" instead of flying low and finishing with a long run, possibly into a hazard—I believe in standing a trifle open. That is the left leg should be a little behind the right. Let the ball be within comfortable reach of the club-head and rather nearer to the left heel than to the right heel.

Be sure, too, that there is a sense of ease and relaxation in all the joints—not sheer looseness, but, above all things, not tightness. There is a happy medium in this matter. Many players brace themselves up as firmly as a trussed chicken from the instant they start to address the ball. I suppose they think they will be able to hit the harder for it, whereas; in point of fact, they so constrict the body that it is deprived of the chance to swing the club in the way that produces power.

There is no doubt that the golf swing begins with a straightening of the left arm. Slow motion film pictures of my own swing show that this action causes the left wrist to push the right wrist straight back for about three inches, without, however, any resultant movement of the club-head.

It is simply that the wrists recede three inches behind the club-head, which then starts to move until it catches up the hands and, turning away from the ball, leads the hands from that stage till the finish.

CONSCIOUS ACTION.

Naturally, the hands are merely guides at the outset (they should exercise only a light, though non-slipping, grip) and this retreat of the wrists in what is virtually a straight line for three inches behind the ball no doubt causes the club-face to follow also in a straight line for three inches and thus helps to produce a straight shot.

Personally, however, I feel sure that it would be useless to try and teach a golfer to perform such an action. In most cases it would only result in his wrists becoming locked at the end of the three inches. I still believe it is the soundest plan to teach him that the first conscious movement must be that of turning the club-face away from the ball by turning the left wrist gently inward towards the body at the beginning of the swing.

In this manner, the left arm will tend naturally to straighten and cause both wrists to recede. The action seen in the slow motion film, but not visible in life, is the involuntary result of the first principle turning the club-face away from the ball.

As the club rises remember above all things to keep the head still. Doing this, the body will have to turn at the hips to allow the arms to take the club up, and the player will rise on to the ball of the left foot, or, at any rate, on the inside of that foot, from the big joint to the end of the big toe. He must not let the left heel shift outwards lest he allow the effect of the screwing round of the body at the hips to escape at the heel.

Having thus wound up the body at the hips—and still keeping the head still—he has now to unwind it. The first thing he should do is merely to recover the club from behind his head, which should be its position at the top of the swing. Instead of starting it down with a snatch, let him urge it gently out towards his right. Now it is in the proper position to begin the real hit.

Let it gather speed for all it is worth from that stage. Just before the impact the left heel returns to the ground and the left leg straightens, this braces up the body for the blow—and the result, let us hope, is a worthy drive. At any rate, it ought to be.

II.—Mid-Iron Shots

The average golfer, struggling for proficiency, is well advised at the start to study and master a few certain shots in the game, played with a few certain clubs.

I have already dealt with driving, and it seems to me that the next department calling for attention is that of shots accomplished with the mid-iron. On the whole, the mid-iron is probably the most useful all-round club in the bag.

Its lie, and the depth of its face in each case a happy medium make it the easiest of the irons with which to hit the ball accurately. It is, indeed, just the sort of club which a novice might pick out instinctively as being adapted to its purpose.

When a golfer is in doubt as to whether to take a mashie or a mid-iron for a shot up to the pin, I would advise him every time to select the mid-iron—the longer range club—and play the shot within himself, which is another way of saying without forcing for distance, as he might feel compelled to do with the mashie. In a competition in which everybody had to use one club—and one only—my choice would most certainly be the mid-iron.

THE SIMPLE STROKE.

The simple shot with it is sufficient to consider by way of a beginning: that is, the shot which does not attempt to apply back-spin to the ball. This latter is the supreme joy of the game, since once it is conquered, it fills the player with the great expectancy of being able to control the altitude, the length of flight, and the run.

He may not always be able to achieve these things, but when the shot has come to him, nothing gives him such pleasurable anticipation as the effort to execute it.

Still, he has first to be fairly sure that he can strike the ball truly, and so he may be recommended to concentrate his attention for a time on the plain mid-iron shot which sends the ball up into the air to fall just about where he wishes, and run—as he hopes—the right distance.

CONCERNING THE STANCE.

The first thing to remember is that he must stand appreciably nearer to the ball than when he is using the driver. This closing in on the ball is courted by the fact that the mid-iron is, as a rule, some four inches shorter than the driver, but there are thousands of players who do not stand near enough.

The golfer needs to be just so comfortably over his work that the head of the club reaches the ball without imposing on him the necessity of stretching his arms in order to get at it. In short, every muscle and every joint should be easy and relaxed during the address.

I do not believe in establishing exact measurements, because every golfer is different, and my own stances for the same type of shot are not always the same to an eighth of an inch. At a rough estimate, however, I should say that, taking the stance for the driver as a standard, the player needs to have his feet about 14 inches nearer to the ball for the mid-iron. This will give a fair idea of the difference.

FEET CLOSER TOGETHER.

Thus closing in on the ball, his feet will—or ought—to be closer together than for the driver shot. They will be some six inches closer together. Also, his stance will be slightly more open; that is to say, the left foot—with the toes turned slightly outwards—will be a little more behind the right than it was for the full bang with the wooden club.

Being thus disposed in such relation to the ball that the arms just have room to swing through comfortably without being cramped or stretched, he may be advised to grip the club a little more firmly than for a tee-shot.

I want particularly to warn him against a really tight hold—a clutching hand—even with the iron clubs. It only retards the swing. But as the sole of the club is now coming into contact with the ground, which one prays to goodness it will not do in the case of a tee-shot, there is a chance that it may turn in the grasp when this contact takes place. The best way to guard against such a contingency is to increase the firmness of the hold with the thumb and fore-finger—not with the other fingers. This slight increase of pressure will serve the purpose.

OVER-SWINGING.

The swing with a mid-iron should naturally be shorter, more upright, and more compact than that with a driver.

In the ordinary way there is no need for the golfer to worry himself to produce these effects. They are a corollary of the fact that he is using a shorter club and standing nearer to the ball than for a full drive.

Still, there are a good many players who, in the back-swing with the mid-iron, take the club back too far, with the result that they lose control over it and their shots go to perdition. In fact, the commonest mistake of all with the mid-iron is overswinging. It promotes flatness of swing—which is one of the worst possible things where this club is concerned—and although now and again it produces a long shot, nobody can tell where the next one is going.

I recommend the average golfer to practise a half swing, which will do well for shots of about 150 yards. It is the safe swing. As confidence grows, it may be extended on occasion to a three-quarter swing.

The turn of the body at the hips and the importance of keeping the head still are the same as for the drive. Aim about half an inch behind the ball; at just that space which you see when you ground the club in the final address.

That is the simple mid-iron shot. At some future time, we may engage in the low-flying, back-spin shot which goes by the name of "the push," and which is the most scientific shot in the game.

BRITISH FILMS

Why They are Where They Are: The Passion for Stereotyped American Models

By Our Labour Correspondent.

Sir Oswald Stoll addressing a meeting of his shareholders a few weeks ago said that the British picture house proprietors were obsessed with the American film but the British public were not. As a result of this he alleged that many of the exhibitors were in danger of going bankrupt. Sir Oswald was at the time boosting British films. While we share the British public's growing weariness of the American product we think there is something to be said for the British film exhibitor. The average American film is a machine-made sort of production, but it has qualities far superior to the bad British film. The latter has a quite unredeemed badness. The photography is bad, the story is worse, and the acting is poor. The bad American film has an equally thin scenario, but the photography is usually good and the acting just passable. It has also such qualities as a free expenditure of money can give, a factor that counts for little in the production of master-pieces, but which is capable of saving the American film from falling to the drear depths of its bad British rival.

THE BIG BUSINESS BLIGHT.

It is curious that a country so generously dowered with imaginative writers as Great Britain should be so behindhand in the film producing business. The most common explanation heard of this fact is that our atmosphere is not suited to film photography. This is not good enough. There have been British films quite as good in photography as the best American productions. The cause has to be sought elsewhere. It probably lies in the habit of Big Business always to play for what it imagines to be safety, by under-estimating the intelligence of the general public. This tendency in journalism has given us our present day popular press. In cheatreland it has ruined the stage with insipid musical comedies and inane revues. And in filmland it has placed us among the "also ran." From such successes as we have had in the past it would seem that our genius does not lie with the great spectacular film. It is sometimes said that there is not enough capital to be found in England to produce them but Germany's example should prove how groundless that objection is. The sets in the new German productions entrival the greatest efforts of Griffiths.

Our publishers are usually men of some culture and when MSS. are sent them they give them to capable readers to judge whether to take for publication before deciding to accept or reject. To a lesser extent the same course is followed with plays. But what would happen to a budding genius with a scenario for a film in Great Britain? With one exception our producers are of the schools. One of these is slavishly imitative of American methods and would only accept a scenario of the conventional American pattern. As might be imagined its productions are always a little worse that those on which they are modelled. The other produces such works of art as appeal to its financial backers, either dramatized versions of old-fashioned books that are household names, or stories that appear to be rifled from back numbers of the "Family Herald," or "Horner's Penny Stories."

It was our good fortune to meet one of these wealthy patrons of the arts a few months ago. Twenty years ago he was the proprietor of a twopenny bioscope booth, before which he had been a commission agent. In the early days of the cinema he converted a disused chapel into a picture house. It prospered and he was enabled to erect several of the old-fashioned stucco fronted cinemas. When we were introduced to him he was the proprietor of seven super-cinemas, six smaller houses, and a film producing business.

A ROUND AND READY PRODUCER.

Three not unsuccessful, or rather, not unprofitable dramatizations of popular old stories were already to his credit and he was engaged on a third. After hearing the story we had been previously warned he told to everyone on first meeting them—it was to the effect that the first book he dramatized was the first book he had ever read—we were invited to sit down and wait while he finished the chapter. He sat at a table with a pad of paper before him flanked by a bottle of whisky and a syphon of soda water. His secretary, an ex-bookmaker's clerk, was sitting opposite him slowly reading aloud the work of fiction in process of transmutation. At every paragraph he stopped. Sometimes his employer said, "Go on George, there 'aint any bally punch in that," sometimes he said "Alf a tick, we must shove that in." And that was how British films were being made in Anno Domini 1923.

It is surprising to note that the film when completed was not unsuccessful. Most of the scenes were "shot" in busy city streets, although the date of the story was 1870 or thereabouts. The actors were extraordinarily competent compared with the shortcomings of the adapter.

OUR CLASSIC FILMS.

There are, of course, exceptions to this rough and ready kind of producing. Hepworths occasionally turn out films that only just fall short of classics like "Tolloor David." George Cooper, the best of our producers easily surpasses the better known American George Pearson nearly equalled him at one time, but his recent Betty Balfour productions are too imitative of the Americans. There are no American films so popular in Great Britain as these Betty Balfour pictures; "Love, Life and Laughter" and the "Squibs" series. Adaptations of Jacobs stories are also more appreciated than wearisome American pictures featuring mining camps, and New York's bright lights.

A typical example of the virtues and shortcomings of the better British film is to be seen in "Lily of the Alley," a Hepworth production without any subtitles. It is a story of the slum dwellers in the courts and byways of a great English city, with scenes in the hopfields of Kent. The acting by Henry Edwards, Chrissie White, and Mary Brough, easily surpasses that of much better known American film stars. The photography is masterly. The story is natural and interesting although the action is marred by an unnecessary fire scene. The whole production seems extraordinarily fresh and convincing when contrasted with the soulless work the Americans are turning out.

DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT.

There is talk of a great British Film Week during

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

SHANGHAI BIRDS

Ornithology at the Carlton

By Elizabeth Pepys.

The dissipations of the canaries who warble their canzonettas, arias, or recitatives whatever it may happen to be from their cages which sway from the pink paper cherry tress in the Carlton have aroused much comment. Time was when all good little birds tucked their heads under their wings as the shadows lengthened and sang no more till dawn, more or less rosy, streaked the sky. At one time the poet Hurdis advised all: "Rise with the lark, and with the lark to bed" but now, under the insidious influences of Shanghai's hectic whirl, these wild little birds are feeling their liveliest around midnight.

One cannot but wonder what Mama and Papa Bird would think if they could see their fledglings so altered. We know what a few human parents have felt on the subject. It is hard to revise all our habits of thought in the light of this new development. "Early-to-bed birds" have been the rule and not the exception and "night owls" have not been received into the best society, albeit there are those who say that these are the real "wise birds."

THE EFFECT OF ENVIRONMENT.

Are these companions of the Midnight Follies the rare birds, or will all the birds of China finally so change their feathers, or at least their habits, so as to flock together with them? Will they serve as awful examples or will all the others want to emulate them, until a bird in a cage will be more to be envied than two on a bush? At all events we think we have at last discovered the little birds who tell all the secrets to our aggravatingly omniscient friends.

The Carlton is a great place to overhear the gossip of the town and the old birds who can't be caught with chaff doubtless have a wonderful time learning the worst about everybody. How they must enjoy looking down on the human birds beneath them, the rare birds, the birds of passage, the birds on the wing, and as they take their turns in the choruses how glad they must be that they are in the Carlton and not in last year's nests! In the logic of events these human birds who keep such late hours are transformed into early birds again, and as they wander out at three or four a.m. how curious the birds they leave behind in the cages must be as to the worms they find.

One might apostrophize these songsters as Gilbert did the tomtit:

"Is it weakness of intellect, birdie?"
I cried,
"Or a rather tough worm in your little inside?"

though it might be more appropos to inquire:

Is it right you should alter the night into day?
For working late shifts, do you get extra pay?

As soon as we settle all the moral problems of the Settlement, or possibly even sooner; we may have the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals taking up the case of these birds, and making sure that their interests are properly safeguarded. We understand, however, that at present their cages are duly darkened during the day and that they take long naps while the dancing world is at work or play elsewhere, just as good children who are promised an evening treat.

SPRING HERALDS

Signs of the Vernal Season

In Boston when March winds show any sign of relaxing their blustery sway all the inhabitants begin to think about crocuses and daffodils. Up and down Beacon Hill in the shadow of the old State House walk spring-hungry citizens closely examining the tiny patches of grass which are all the aristocratic lavendar-windowed houses have for gardens, eager to discover the first brave crocus. Its advent, is celebrated in the "Transcript" and fittingly heralded in the other papers.

In Shanghai we do not stroll along Nanking Road hunting for crocuses and all the daffodils burgeon in the flower shops. Nevertheless, in passing a certain window our heart gave a mad hop, skip and a jump of delight and we knew instantaneously that spring was only round the corner. We will not keep the discovery to ourselves. Doubtless we could not if we would, because you too have seen the happy harbingers of spring in Miss Nelda Ring's window. Didn't the green dance frock and the jaunty little summer printed crepe, with its organdie collars and cuffs make you feel festive at once?

Inside it's even better. There are summer frocks all ready for your trip through Suez and travelling togs for that same voyage or spring suits that you must be paying attention to immediately—or if you cannot believe that it is ever going to get warmer there are fascinating dance frocks for this very time of year. We should like to describe in detail the pleated white crepe with bands of almond green, the stunning black and white, also pleated, the hemstitched brown with all the latest cachet of Paris, selected by the smartest of New York buyers, but why waste time on words when you can look-see for yourselves?

A CHINESE GIRL'S VIEW OF INDIA

Shanghai Y. W. C. A. Secretary Only Chinese Representative

Miss Grace Yang, national student secretary of the Y. W. C. A., returned recently from a trip to India where she went to attend the first All-India Christian Women Students Conference, held in December at Bishop College, Calcutta. Miss Yang enjoyed the distinction of being the only Chinese woman at that conference, and of having travelled the longest distance to get there.

Speaking before a group of Y.W.C.A., secretaries in Shanghai, Miss Yang gave her impressions of the people, their customs and dress as foreigners write home from China after they arrive. Miss Yang saw with the added comprehension that comes with experience of a western education. She is a graduate of Mt. Holyoke College, and her comments are a blend of both reactions.

"My first impression as we left Colombo and travelled through southern India, was the bright colours. The country seemed full of colour not in the landscape for that was just sand and trees without much foliage but in the vivid dress of the people. The material of their dresses was very coarse, however—cotton instead of silk. As I saw more of the people, I noticed how very sad they all were. Even the children do not laugh and play in a natural way. The men work very hard; in southern India the women as well as the men work hard. Then I noticed how very straight the working people were, and I realized it is because they carry everything on their heads of swinging from a bamboo pole or on a wheelbarrow, as coolies do in China.

"My first Indian meal was very simple, with few dishes. You are taken out into the courtyard and a servant pours cold water over your right hand and you are ready to eat. There is little furniture in their houses, and they sit and sleep on the floor. When you eat, you sit on the floor in front of a plantain leaf, which is your plate. A pot of rice is brought in and two spoonfuls are served to everyone, then another dish with curry is passed and no matter what it is, it all tastes the same because of the curry. Last of all, you put a vegetable of some kind on your rice, and start to eat.

"The rice is cooked differently from the Chinese way—the water is poured off, and it is not sticky. Everything is very greasy. I had always thought it was easy to eat with your fingers, but now I think the Indians are very clever. The next course is some fine kind of macaroni which is also very hard to eat with your fingers. That is usually about all you have. They don't seem to have feasts, as the Chinese do—only three or four dishes at the most. At the end, you have cold water poured over your hand, and that is all.

RELIGION AS DIVIDING FACTOR.

"The three big divisions are by language, religion and caste. They have as many, or more, dialects than we have in China but no common written language and that is why so many of them speak English. Religion is the greatest factor that divides the people. Each person who worships a certain God has a distinct mark on his forehead or a certain distinction in dress. People of different religions cannot eat together; they have different cooks, different dining rooms, or if the people are willing, the cooks are unwilling to cook for a mixed company. This is very different from the tolerant way that Buddhists, Taoists, and Confucianists mingle and join in ceremonies in China.

In China each religion has its different burial custom. The Hindus burn the bodies and throw them into the Ganges. They also bathe in the Ganges so their sins may be forgiven. Of all the dirty creeks I have seen in China, no nothing is equal to the filthy water of the Ganges. The caste system is almost inconceivable. No one seems to have any idea how many castes there are, and there is absolutely no way of getting out of a caste. It is a unit of society, and the family has no control as in China. If one of the family is decreed by the laws of the caste to become an outcast for some thing done, the family is powerless to help him. People who have lived there and know conditions well told me there is no hope of India abolishing the caste system for centuries to come.

TWO SPORTS OUTFITS

ANTI-FOREIGN SPIRIT.

"The people are not exactly sure what they want or why they are anti-foreign, but they are. They received me with great friendliness, and not as a foreigner. They think Chinese and Indians are more alike, and indeed, I was much closer to them than to the Americans when I was in America where people regarded me as a sort of curio. All the students speak English, they have to learn it, and in some of the government schools it is compulsory. The average person has the attitude that everything foreign is bad and therefore everything Indian, even the caste system, is good. They are earnest, but not logical or consistent as a whole.

"If a woman is not educated she has nothing in life except the jewelry which she wears,—great numbers of bracelets, necklaces, anklets, and ear and nose rings. Her husband owns everything else, but no one has a right to take her jewelry from her even if she is an outcast. She has no place in the home until she is the mother of a son.

"For the educated woman, the question of marriage is a serious one, for the average educated man is not the equal of these educated women who have extraordinary advantages in the Christian school. The students did not seem better educated than Chinese girls, and I felt that some of our best high school girls might have attended that conference. China may be slow, but I think they are slower in India."

The Conference to which Miss Yang refers drew students from as remote districts as Burmah. It was held at Bishops College, which is this year celebrating its centenary. The principal, Bishop Paton-Walsh, was in attendance with Mrs. Paton-Walsh and the assistant principal, Rev. R. L. Pelley. Others among the leaders at the conference were Miss Zachariah, who will be remembered as a delegate to the World's Student Christian Federation meeting in Peking, in May, 1922. Miss Zachariah has since been married and her work as national student secretary of the Y.M.C.A. for India has been taken by Mrs. Data, formerly Rena Carswell, of the British Student Movement and now the wife of Dr. S. K. Data of the Y.M.C.A. Miss Elizabeth Wilson, a pioneer in the Y.W.C.A. movement in United States and now head of an Industrial Normal School at Serampose was also at the conference.

While in India, Miss Yang visited Dr. Rabindranath Tagore at his home near Bolpor. Dr. Tagore talked of his coming trip to China to deliver lectures under the auspices of the National Education Association of China and spoke of his pleasant acquaintance with Chinese students whom he met in America.

CHINESE WOMEN AND WORLD PEACE

Representative of International Federation of University Women Now in China

How best to forward the cause of peace has long been the concern of university women. With this object in mind they have formed an International Federation of the University women of the nations of the world, and by this means hope to further their common interests and develop between their countries sympathy and mutual helpfulness. They meet with no political object but on the common ground of university life and work which gives them a starting point for understanding each other's minds. It is hoped that the Federation will grow into a permanent institution which will keep the nations in touch with one another and universities are suitable agencies through which to work, being permanent institutions.

CHINESE FEDERATION IN PROSPECT.

Particular interest in the Federation has been awakened in Shanghai at the moment by the invitation extended to Chinese university women to form a Chinese Federation of University Women to be affiliated with the International body. Miss M. Lumsden, for some years a member of the Council of Girton College, Cambridge, was asked by the International Federation to bring to Chinese college women a cordial invitation to affiliate themselves with the main organization, and was also asked to report back upon the present number of graduates, and educational opportunities.

The invitation has now been presented to different groups all over China and while a decision has not yet been reached it is hoped that a representative will be present at the conference to be held in Christiania in July. She will not have a vote in the meeting but will be able to report upon it. There are already enough Chinese women graduates both from foreign and native institutions to form a considerable membership and this number will be increasing rapidly as the Chinese colleges grow larger. Roughly estimated there are something like 20 in Peking, 10 in Tientsin, 15 in Nanking, 4 or 5 in Soochow, 10 or more in Canton, a few in Amoy and perhaps 40 in Shanghai.

China is in quite a different position from other countries inasmuch as college education for women is quite a new thing and her own universities have only just begun to graduate classes. All over the country colleges are springing up and the problem of securing adequately trained professors will soon become acute since years of special research or post-graduate study are requisite for university teaching.

ADVANTAGES OF AFFILIATION.

This is where affiliation with the International Federation would be of great advantage to China as her graduates would then be eligible to apply for the many fellowships offered all over the world and the residential club found in many of the large cities would be open to members. Besides this of course there is the fundamental desire of closer cooperation among trained women everywhere, for, as Lord Haldane says: "The Universities are the guardians of knowledge and all over the world they speak a common language because they think high thoughts. The higher learning leaps over frontiers and boundaries."

Eight nations sent voting delegates to the Federation Conference held in London in 1920; in 1922 in Paris there were 17 voting delegates and the Christiana gathering will doubtless see more. To promote good will and understanding between university women and so between their nations three methods have been adopted. First comes the interchange of teachers and students, mainly through cooperation with the large number of existing organizations.

RESIDENTIAL CLUBS.

Next comes the international residential club. America already has four, one in Philadelphia and Washington and two in New York and also has a woman's club house in Paris. In Belgium members may stay at the Women's institute. The University Club of London is open to these international guests on special introduction and now the English Federation is arranging to purchase the famous Crosby Hall, built in London in the 15th century, a magnificent example of Tudor architecture, with a marvellous roof.

In the expansion of London it was found necessary to move this historic hall to Chelsea where it has been carefully reconstructed. It is proposed to add a modern wing in the style of the main building and use this as a hostel. No more appropriate building could be found than this mansion about which so many traditions linger and which has entertained so many eminent men from Richard of Gloucester to Sir Thomas Moore and his daughter Margaret, a blue stocking of her time.

The third path to better acquaintance lies through the international fellowships for post-graduate work. When the British Federation came into being in 1910 it immediately provided for fellowships for foreign research work and America and the other nations have cooperated. Besides the women of many nationalities who come to England from other lands to study, British women go all over the world and the list of the numerous fellowships and the women who hold them makes a significant story in itself. The exchange, of course, is not limited to England and America as a Swedish Fellow went to France, and there are many similar examples.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

The [illegible] "Atlantic Monthly," a Canadian professor asserts that between the year 1200 and the year 1882, only two women were really distinguished in art, none in music, and only 38 in literature, most of whom are writers on contemporary life. From these facts the professor concludes that "art is a manly virtue." In science, philosophy, and religion only two women [illegible] Mme Curie and Mrs. Eddy, an amazing combination, by the way. Women have been more successful as organizers and managers, the professor mentioning with approval Queen Elizabeth, Catharine de' Medici, Florence Nightingale, and Joan of Arc, another quaintly assorted lot. As a matter of fact, Catherine de' Medici was anything but a successful manager. She was an unscrupulous lady who consistently failed in achieving her purpose, while Queen Elizabeth can be fairly described as an unscrupulous lady who always succeeded in achieving her purpose.

The "Newspaper World" has printed some interesting extracts from a lecture on book reviewing delivered by Mr. Robert Lynd at the London University. Mr. Lynd says that no man should be a reviewer who does not possess "a rich background of literary knowledge," for without it [illegible] material for forming a sound judgment." All good critics are steeped in great literature. You can criticize Mr. Arnold Bennett's "Riceyman Steps" better if you are already acquainted with the miser in Balzac's "Eugénie [illegible] Mr. [illegible] says "You will be a better critic of Mr. D. H. Lawrence if you have read Strindberg and of Miss Katherine Mansfield if you have read Tchekov. A distinguished writer said recently that he was appalled by the fact that hardly any of the critics of Mr. David Garnett's 'Lady Into Fox' realized that Mr. Garnett had taken his method and style from Defoe." From book reviewing a writer can learn many of the essential characteristics of his craft—preciseness, compression, surprise, and apt allusion.

A BOOK OF VERSE

"Queen Bess in Borrowed Plumes," and Other Poems. By Alice Masters Balean. John & Edward Bumpus, Ld.

This book has been "privately printed." There is a portrait of the authoress as frontispiece. Underneath the portrait is her name and the date of her death—quite recent. These things give the reviewer pause. Not out of respect for the precept "de mortuis nil nisi bonum;" but, more especially, out of respect for the surviving relatives who had the book printed. It is not possible, humanely, to criticize the work. For one can but feel that the invitation of criticism is a desire to add that also to the memorial. It is with regret one says that praise cannot be given. These are not real poetry. They are written by one who probably had a great appreciation of poetry but who evidently had not the creative gift.

LUCKY AND UNLUCKY

The Miscor Book—By Elizabeth Villiers. T. Werner Laurie. London.

This is a most fascinating book, scarcely to be read straight through, but to be browsed in from page to page with the utmost delight. We are all in theory agreed that superstition is illogical and absurd, but there are few of us who do not succumb to it in one way or another and the past, as these pages show, is not much worse than the present in this respect. A good many of the entries are of purely antiquarian interest. For example, gemmel rings, the forerunner of our modern engagement ring:—

> Each gemmel consisted of three rings, so made that they were held together by a clasp, the upper and lower rings being richly ornamented or jewelled, the middle one quite plain. At the betrothal the clasp was removed and the three rings taken apart over an open Bible. The first was placed on the hand of the bride elect, the other jewelled one on that of her future husband, while the third, the plainest of the three, was given to the witness who was present at the ceremony. On the wedding day the three rings were joined by their clasp again and placed on the hand of the bride—her wedding ring.

In quite recent years, one recollects, engagement rings were often made in triple form, doubtless a survival of the gemmel. But among modern ideas of mascots we find mention of one so up-to-date as Billiken—the origin of which the author has wholly failed to trace—and many of the old superstitions flourish as vigorously as ever. In Italy, for example, belief in the evil eye is almost universal and the charm for protection against it—a hand with first and fourth fingers stretched out and the two others and thumb doubled up—is sold everywhere. There are, as our author tells us, almost innumerable charms against the evil eye. Some of the most interesting pages deal with the signs of the Zodiac and their supposed influence on the characters of people born under them. This is, of course, astrology. Miss Villiers reprints here all the characteristics supposed to be derived from the Ram, the Bull the Heavenly Twins et al. And, as she says, in reading them over and thinking of one's acquaintance whose birthdays we know, it is certainly curious to see how often their temperaments fit in with the old astrological beliefs. The predominant thought in reading this book is, Why are these things So? For what cause did the human race invent them all?" Hamlet's observation to Horatio, about more things in heaven and earth, etc., is the only answer.

WHERE THE MUEZZIN CALLS

A Traveller in the Land of Islam

A Vision of Morocco. By V. C. Scott O'Connor. Thornton Butterworth. 25s. net.

Mr. Scott O'Connor has a style, a charm. It were ungrateful, perhaps, to complain that it is somewhat conscious. For that must be true of all writers. Ruskin, and, in our generation, Gilbert Chesterton, became so conscious of their gift of happy phrase that they deplored it as an impediment, or at any rate affected so to deplore it. Certainly a facile expression does give rise in the mind of the average simple English reader to a suspicion of, not quite insincerity but superficiality. He is apt to feel that thoughts rising easily to neat expression cannot come from any great depth. It is vastly unfair, of course, to push the English worship of the "strong silent man" to the length of demanding inarticulateness in a writer. But it almost comes to that. The special gift of such men as Ruskin and Chesterton and, in a lesser degree, V. C. Scott O'Connor, is not appreciated to the extent that it deserves.

Mr. Scott O'Connor is not only a born traveller but also a born narrator of travel. The reader feels not to be reading but to be listening to the traveller telling his tale. That is the great art in this kind of writing,—the art that rose to perfection in the work of W. H. Hudson. But whereas Hudson was utterly simple, apparently oblivious of the beauty of his words, Mr. Scott O'Connor seems to be very sensible of the felicity of his phrasing.

He starts his book in England on a summer evening, feeling the peace of it.

> '.....No need to wander..... None.
>
> Yet wander one does.....I close my eyes upon the benediction that lies about me, and in its place I see:—Camels swaying over trackless sands; the earth a circle, the sun its only arbiter; immensity enshrouds me; Africa blazing in black and gold; Pillars of Hercules that rise up into the sky, whispering the myths and visions of a bygone age.
>
> I see the Phoenician creeping with his bales along the blue-lined coast; the Greek, his brain full of luminous fancies, his eyes opened wide upon the wonder of the world. I hear the cry of the Meuzzin calling the Faithful to prayer; the hoof beats of Islam riding out from her deserts to the conquest of the world. The voice of Mutamid King of Seville, poet and exile, whispers lamenting in my ear, and Granada, long unvisited, beckons to me in the twilight from her bowers.
> Yes! I must go; and Insh'allah it shall be the last voyage—until, until, that other breeze comes blowing to fill the hanging sail."

That extract from the opening of his book is a fair sample of the way he tells his tale. It is a fine tale he has to tell, some of it of country never before visited by an Englishman. The Far West of Islam lives for us in his words. And if the words seem at times not simple enough for our English ears, neither are the places and peoples he tells of simple. It is a good story very well told.

FACTS AND FIGURES

China's Great Field for Social Study

Peking. A Social Survey. By Sidney D. Gamble. George H. Doran Co., New York.

This useful book was first published in 1921 and was reviewed in these columns at the time. The survey, conducted under the auspices of the Princeton University Centre in China and the Peking Y.M.C.A., resulted in the compilation of hitherto unpublished statistics and information, the author being assisted in his work by Mr. John Stewart Burgess and by several Chinese. A very wide field, indeed, is covered by the survey, most important chapters being devoted to Population, Health, Education, Commercial Life, the Social Evil, and Poverty and Philanthrophy. With praiseworthy foresight, there has also been included a list of the questionnaires issued by the compilers — information which should prove of great value to societies working on similar lines in other parts of the country. But one must not overlook the fact that, especially in a country such as China, statistics cannot be altogether depended on—no matter how careful their preparation. Apart from this, those who have made themselves responsible for the enormous amount of work in the volume deserve the very sincere thanks of all who have the vast problems of China at heart, for this survey forms an admirable groundwork for the study of these problems. And undoubtedly it is only after exhaustive study of the sets of facts presented that any attempt can be made at improvement.

The question naturally arises as to the advisability or otherwise of preparing surveys of other cities in China. The task is no light one but, fortunately, volunteers would doubtless come forward to render assistance in the routine work of preparation of tables of figures. In the past, however as mentioned above—statistics on things Chinese have not been looked at with any great favour, and not without reason. In the belief that any figures are better than none and that discretion can always be used as to their dependability the wish may be expressed that some Shanghai organization may undertake the work of covering the immense local field. Over a year was spent in the preliminary work for the Peking survey. Shanghai investigators, it is quite safe to compute, would require to allow at least double that time after they do set their hands to the plough. It will be no easy work to accomplish: on the other hand many agencies have been established in recent years which should be very glad to help on the good cause. "Fac's are chiel's that winna ding" as the Scottish poet wrote: and only from facts such as are presented in "Peking. A Social Survey" can the work of reform be commenced.

TIMOTHY RICHARD

A Life Story of Absorbing Interest

"Timothy Richard of China." Seer, statesman, missionary and the most disinterested adviser the Chinese ever had. By Wm. E. Soothill, M. A. Oxon., Hon. M. A. Cambridge, Professor of Chinese in the University of Oxford. Formerly President of Imperial University. Author of the Student's Chinese Dictionary, etc., with Foreword by the Right Hon. Sir John Jordan, Bart., K.C.B., K.C.M.G., C.C.I.E.

The title of this book is arresting. Of what other missionary could it be said that he was Soand-so "of China." But if the reader starts prejudiced by the greatness of the claim made for the subject of these memoirs it is certain that he will end by conceding its justice. Beyond doubt, Timothy Richard was a great as well as a good man. He was endowed with a keen and fertile brain and he spent his life in thinking out schemes for the welfare of his adopted country, with the result that he has written his name deeper in the hearts of the Chinese than any other missionary who has laboured amongst them.

This biography traces with great perspicacity, the development of Dr. Richard's mind in regard to missionary methods. He came to China as a teacher. He believed that he had a treasure in an earthen vessel and he longed, with a passionate desire, to show the Chinese the beauties of the gospel he was entrusted with. But he began by being a learner. He studied the religious and ethical systems of the people he was sent to, and admired in them everything that was admirable. He modified his own opinions and adapted his methods in the light of the new knowledge thus acquired. Of course he was an idealist. Many of his plans failed, and some could only have been carried out by a legion of angels; but some succeeded, and it is better to have a plan that fails than never to plan anything original at all.

He got some of his most practical ideas from a re-study of the New Testament in the light of his missionary experience. Thus, confronted with a crowd of starving people to whom he was about to distribute famine relief, and foreseeing that as soon as the maddened people saw food they would rush upon it and a tragedy would surely result, he adopted the method used by his Master when he fed the hungry. 'Make them sit down in companies" said Jesus. Richard followed this example; he made them sit down to receive the welcome grain and the people "were as quiet as at a communion."

From the New Testament, too, he got the fruitful idea of seeking out "those who were worthy" and telling them his message. He found, as hundreds of others have found, that preaching to a crowd at a Chinese fair is like pouring water from a tub into a narrow necked bottle. But by the new method he found many whose minds were already attuned to the search for truth. He learned from these "worthy" men as much as he taught and this was, perhaps, the secret of his success.

Dr. Richard has been fortunate in his biographer. The story of this man's life is so set forth that it is fascinating, not only to the missionary, but to the ordinary reader. These pages show in detail what life was like in China 50 years ago, the China that is rapidly passing away. Glimpses of great Chinese Officials are seen in its pages, Tso Chung-tang, Li Hung-chang and many others are sketched with a master's touch. We are introduced here to the real China and to real Chinese. Dr. Richard really loved the Chinese but he knew their faults as well as their virtues and, realizing that we all have faults he loved them still.

No one can read this book without being benefitted by its perusal. It is full of absorbing interest and at the same time gives a vivid and uplifting picture of a great soul.

HIGH LIFE FROM BEHIND THE MASTER'S CHAIR

What the Butler Winked at—by Eric Horne, for 57 years in service with the nobility and gentry. T. Werner Laurie. London.

Those who read this book with the idea that they are going to find a sort of divorce court revelation without the trouble of going to Temple Bar will be disappointed. The title strikes one as having been invented in the publisher's office, and it is the only unnatural thing in the book. Mr. Eric Horne's reminiscences are always interesting, told in a very breezy and readable way and, for the picture they give of a style of English society now rapidly disappearing, really valuable.

> One used (he writes) to see about eight o'clock in the evening gaily comparisoned (sic) pairs of horses and carriages, with footmen powdered and breeched, silk stockings and a lot of pomp and show. Two matched footmen would get down, march up to the door, and if a double knocker, both would knock (which they had practised beforehand) then march back to the carriage in a stately fashion, let down the steps and hand out the ladies. Now, everything is all hurry and scurry. They order out the car, tell the chauffeur to drive to some place; when they get there they want to be somewhere else; all is unrest; they keep the chauffeur at it sometimes for 15 hours at a stretch, go to some restaurant and get a snack and then on again. It does not matter if the chauffeur gets time to get his meals or not; the engine does not get tired, neither must the chauffeur.

It must, however, be added that even in the good old days of "butling" a servant's job in a big house must have been no sinecure. Entertaining of all kinds would go on to the small hours, and then the staff were expected to have the house in order for breakfast at whatever time any of the guests desired. It is hardly surprising that the scale of tipping in such houses is generally reputed to have been enormous.

One sincerely hopes that noble families are not universally as exacting, tyrannical and inconsiderate as Mr. Horne depicts them. But through all these pages, one only comes upon two reasonably lovable characters, the one a real "gentleman of the old school," who kept a large establishment not far from Crewe, was strict and particular, but treated his people in a human and open-handed way; the other a baronet nicknamed Sir Henry Cayenne, on account of his superheated language. He was one who would "crack on all sail in the day of judgment," a perfect bully to all appearances, but his servants liked him. "It was just simply bluster (says Horne) and his bark was worse than his bite. He was a good sport and played the game." One of the most amazing passages details the time sheet to which Horne was required to work in a single-handed butler's place which he took after the war. It covers every minute of the day from 6.30 a.m. to 10.30 p.m. and calls on him to understand all about electric bells, lights and fuses, lavatory balls, lights and the essentials of carpentry and painting.

Horne was quite a sportsman, a good boxer and cricketer, a keen fisherman and an expert photographer. Late in life, when places for butlers were few, he took to driving a taxi, but could not stand the exposure. The last pages find him out of work, but undismayed.

A RIFT IN THE RUSSO- CHINESE LUTE

THE COMPLETE BREAKDOWN IN SINO-RUSSIAN NEGOTIATIONS

Karakhan's Inexperience: The Fatal Ultimatum; Neither Side Now Able to Reopen Discussions Without Loss of Face: The Onlooker's Point of View

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 20.

What appears to be the complete breakdown of Sino-Russian negotiations leading to China's recognition of the Soviet Government has been received by practically every journal in Peking with unfeigned surprise, disappointment and, in some cases, with what appears to be consternation. Until the Soviet Mission last night published through the Rosta news agency Mr. Karakhan's personal letter of the 16th to Dr. C. T. Wang and his formal note of the 19th to the Chinese Government, there were very few persons in Peking who surmised that negotiations would be so abruptly and so finally broken, and certainly few official Chinese who desired such a climax. The Chinese press laments it in chorus and, in the expression of a great variety of opinions, is trying to show how it happened and who is responsible. Dr. C. T. Wang of course comes in for his share of the blame and the Cabinet is vigorously scolded in most organs, but all papers, with the exception of those known to be closely allied with the Russian Mission's interests, hold Mr. Karakhan responsible for what they believe to have been a needless breach of nearly successful relations.

KARAKHAN'S ULTIMATUM.

It is difficult to comment upon what has happened until the actual text of the repudiated agreement is available from some source and until other facts are definitely established which are still subject to much dispute. It is not yet clear, for instance, whether Dr. C. T. Wang signed the document which he and Mr. Karakhan completed on March 14. Dr. Wang is quoted on good authority as denying it flatly, while Mr. Karakhan has insisted publicly that it was signed. Dr. Wang, in denying that he signed the document, may be withholding the fact that he initialled the completed document, putting his personal approval on it, and that Mr. Karakhan misinterpreted this act either innocently or purposely and regarded it as the final signature of a plenipotentiary signing for China. In diplomatic circles here it is said that Dr. Wang would have been perfectly within his rights had he initialled the document with Mr. Karakhan as a token of their mutual agreement upon the terms but that neither could expect such a procedure to be binding upon the other's Government until the authorities, with the constitutional right to pass upon it, had authorized their plenipotentiary to sign in his country's name. Whatever the circumstances were, Mr. Karakhan's action is regarded in local diplomatic circles as evidence of his inexperience; and his subsequent attitude, being unduly impatient and irascible, would indicate that he certainly is not qualified for diplomacy in China.

Mr. Karakhan's letter of March 16, setting a three-day limit to the Cabinet's discussion of the preliminary agreement, was first described in both camps as a sort of informal chit, a written request specifying no penalties if unfulfilled and inquirers at the Russian mission were certainly given the impression that it was in no sense an ultimatum. Yet, in his note of March 19, in which he says that the draft agreement is no longer binding and that there will be no more negotiations pending full and unconditional recognition, he certainly gives his previous note all the force of a formal ultimatum delivered formally to the Chinese Government. This looks like bad faith. It would appear that Mr. Karakhan wrote the ultimatum in a personal form and in a restrained tone before he knew whether or not his Government would endorse a formal ultimatum and, having got such endorsement, chose to regard his letter to "Dear Dr. Wang" as an official document.

RUSSIA'S TAIL UP.

It is easy to understand why Mr. Karakhan was annoyed by the Cabinet's quibbling. The Russian goose now hangs high and a Russian diplomat to an Oriental country does not feel called upon to make concessions or trifle with quibblers. Early in his relations with Dr. Wang he made the flat statement that there would be no formal bargaining before full recognition of his Government. In condescending to discuss a preliminary agreement which should define the "general priciples" that would govern a subsequent conference, he naturally felt that he was good-naturedly weakening his position to coax China along.

It was of course Dr. Wang's job to win from Mr. Karakhan and embody in this preliminary document as many pointed and detailed concessions as he possibly could and the Russian's task was to adhere to general principles, keep the language of his assurances as vague as possible and hold all vital questions open for discussion after recognition when his Government would be the legal heir to all Imperial Russia's rights and properties in China. The text of the agreement has not yet been given out, but it would seem that while Karakhan contrived to keep details out of it, Dr. Wang did pin him down to so many definite assurances that at the end he was glad to find a good excuse for cancelling the agreement altogether. The attitude which Moscow has taken towards China's refusal to give the agreement immediate force also indicates that the Soviet Government, like Mr. Karakhan, was getting more and more annoyed by the assurances upon which China insisted and was not loth at the end to scrap the negotiations and the document and reiterate the former position of "no recognition, no bargaining."

This the Peking Cabinet should have foreseen and the negotiations should not have been allowed to come to a head. China's wisest policy, pending the British-Russian negotiation which begin shortly, would have been to drag out negotiations, watching developments in England and America and not to have allowed things to come to the point where Russia could say, "Sign or quit."

TWO VERY HIGH HORSES.

It is impossible to believe that a diplomat of Dr. Wang's experience affixed a final and formal signature to his preliminary agreement with Mr. Karakhan without making sure that the whole Cabinet approved of its contents and it is still less likely that Mr. Karakhan would have been permitted by his Government to sign such an agreement the moment it was completed without reference to Moscow. The only reasonable explanation of what has occurred therefore is that, while the Cabinet was acting within its rights in discussing the document and suggesting modifications, either Mr. Karakhan himself or Moscow disapproved of the terms and used the ultimatum to put the onus of rejecting the agreement upon China.

The Chinese press is to-day very timid about speculating upon what will come next. There seems to be no ground for the rumour that Mr. Karakhan will now leave for Canton. He says that he has no orders and that, so far as he knows, he will stay here. Both China and Russia are now on such very high horses that neither can climb down without making a tremendous descent. The Chinese nationalistic spirit certainly would not endorse unconditional recognition of Russia now and Russia could not, after yesterday's note, expect Mr. Karakhan to reopen negotiations before recognition. This would entail a loss of face which in China would be fatal to his cause. Recognition by China now would mean unconditional surrender to a very haughty domineering Power. Further negotiation on Russia's part would put her in the position of a defeated enemy seeking a renewal of relations.

IT'S AN ILL WIND.

It is obvious to-day that yesterday's developments are by no mean regretted in the foreign community. Faith in the revival of a strong, responsible Russian Government dealing with other Occidental Powers in good faith is certainly deeper now than any existing faith in the Chinese Government. It is felt that the existence of a strong Power on China's frontier, able and inclined to take a strong hand with the undisciplined Chinese official classes, would be of great advantage not only to all foreigners in China but eventually to China's advantage as well. Every other diplomat in Peking knows that easy-going and lenient diplomacy with the Chinese Government as it is constituted nets neither the Powers nor China herself anything but more anarchy; so there is some satisfaction in seeing Russia learn the same lesson and act with decision upon it. Those who have no sympathy whatever with the Bolshevist theories or with the present administration of Russia share this satisfaction no less but rather more because China has been so rudely dealt with by the new Power which she hoped to cultivate as an ally against her other "aggressors."

 A further very interesting article on what China demanded of Russia, and the Cabinet's secret share in the negotiations will be found on page 478.

CHINA'S SUPREME COURT

Mar. 24.

A nation has reached a high stage of political development when it has a wise and comprehensive system of laws, when the judges and magistrates are competent, fearless and incorruptible, and when all do homage to the law, "the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power." Judged by this standard China at the present time is in a lamentable plight, for lawlessness is rampant everywhere and among all classes. Of course with the overthrow of the monarchy and the accompanying political and social changes there was bound to be a weakening of ancient law and customs, but it is now time that the law, revised to meet modern requirements, should be firmly re-established and there are hopeful signs that this is being accomplished; at least, a promising start has been made.

Towards the close of the Manchu dynasty, when it was found that the Chinese legal system was unable to cope with the complex and novel questions which were being raised by increasing contact with Western civilization, a code of laws based on Western systems was drawn up and a Chinese Supreme Court created. As in those days a knowledge of the Chinese classics was deemed adequate for any office, whether it was the government of a province, the command of an army or a battleship, or the construction of bridges and highways, it followed that judges were appointed whose knowledge of law was very limited. Under the Manchus the court had little influence. When the Republic was formed the court was made independent, and judges were appointed who had received a proper legal training. The court, as now constituted, consists of a Civil Division, with three chiefs of divisions and fourteen judges: and of a Criminal Division with two chiefs of divisions and seven judges. Its jurisdiction extends not only to ordinary civil and criminal cases but also to contested election returns and to impeachment proceedings against high officials initiated by the Chinese Parliament. Very wisely the functions of the court do not conform slavishly to those of similar institutions in other countries, but are more in harmony with the customs and traditions of the Chinese people. China has as yet no complete code of modern laws so the work of the Court is creative as well as interpretative. As stated by a Chinese contemporary, "civil cases are decided first according to the provisions of law; in the absence of express provisions then according to customs; and in the absence of customs then according to legal principles." Through the medium, therefore, of this Court the fundamental principles of law accepted in most countries are being introduced into China. The method is said to be somewhat roundabout, but it has the advantage that it familiarizes the people with the idea of modern law step by step, since every principle introduced has been tested by actual experience. All this is most commendable. It is also gratifying to know that, on two occasions at least, the Supeme Court vigorously asserted its independence and inherent power, once against Yuan Shih-kai, and later against the Chinese Parliament. The practical creation of this court is one of the very few things of which the Chinese Republic may be justly proud.

From the foregoing it may be argued that the time has now surely come for the abolition of extraterritoriality, a word so disliked by some of our American friends that they have shortened it to the elegant and expressive form of "extrality." But foreigners generally will still confess to grave misgivings at the prospect of such a change. One swallow does not make a summer. At the present time how can there be confidence in the rectitude of those who make the laws and of those whose office it is to uphold or administer them? The President of the Republic, it is well known, was elected to his high office by means of open bribery. Yet according to the Constitution of the Chinese Republic it is his duty to "promulgate laws and supervise as well as secure their enforcement." Members of Parliament openly received the bribes. Yet according to the Constitution, "the legislative power of the Republic shall be exercised by Parliament." Speaking generally, the officials throughout the country acting as judges and magistrates are corrupt and oppressive; the yamên has not in the least lost the evil name which has been attached to it for generations. Grant that here and there a judge is upright, is he able to control his assistants, underlings, and the hangers on who aid and abet litigation? To quote the "Sacred Edict,"

"It is just because of the existence of this class of pettifogging villains and because yamên underlings from the highest to the lowest make common cause and act in connexion with them, becoming their accomplices as prosecutors and witnesses, stopping short at nothing, that the judge not infrequently becomes their dupe and gives a wrong decision against innocent persons, or flogs or tortures them."

Moreover, to judge by the experience of foreigners in other Oriental countries, particularly those who have tried to obtain redress for infringement of copyrights or trademarks, it seems almost too much to expect that the scales of justice shall be held evenly in a law suit between a native and a foreigner. The recent protest by British firms in China against the trade-mark law promulgated by the Chinese Government openly expresses the conviction felt by nearly all residents here that in matters of this kind Chinese officials are not just and impartial.

It will be doing a greater service to the Chinese to encourage them to persevere and build their new system of law upon firm and equitable foundations than to throw suddenly upon their courts tasks and responsibilities for which they are not ready. Further developments of the Chinese legal system will be watched with great interest, for commercial prosperity will depend in no small degree upon the protection granted to the rights of foreign merchants.

THE SINO-RUSSIAN DEADLOCK

Mar. 25.

IT is quite impossible and would be just as profitless to try to follow in detail all the events leading to the breakdown of negotiation between China and Russia. The broad outlines are, however, easily grasped and are instructive. On the one hand, Dr. C. T. Wang, the officially appointed Chinese delegate, found himself continually hampered and his position made difficult by opposition within the Cabinet; on the other hand, M. Karakhan, increasingly restive under the condescending Chinese attitude, which clearly assumed that recognition by China would be worth any material advantage that she might ask, and probably feeling that Dr. Wang had got much more out of him than Moscow would care to grant, fired in his ultimatum of the 16th instant, as the easiest way of getting out of an awkward corner. Dr. Wang resigned, but the Waichiaopu, we are told, does not consider the discussions at an end, will now take them over from Dr. Wang and has informed M. Karakhan that it is quite ready to recommence negotiations with him whenever he likes. It does not strike one as a particularly dignified course to take, after the bullying tone of M. Karakhan's ultimatum. But public opinion in Peking was much upset by the breach, and it would hardly pay China to let the Soviet envoy leave in a huff.

If the preliminary agreement was indeed as published on the 14th, one may very well understand that M. Karakham wished to get out of it. A more one-sided arrangement it would be difficult to imagine. All the Tsarist treaties were to be cancelled and new ones concluded "in the spirit of the Russian declarations of 1919 and 1920" (which, generally speaking, repudiated all the imperialism of old Russia and breathed an atmosphere of general benevolence, not, by the way, realized); Outer Mongolia was to be handed back to China and all Russian troops withdrawn; the Boxer indemnity was to be remitted and used for education; the Chinese Eastern Railway was practically to be under Chinese control; there were to be no Russian concessions in China nor extraterritorial rights. All this in return for an empty recognition, which would not even have had the advantage that it might have held two years ago of embarrassing other Powers by being the first recognition of Moscow accorded. But that this statement of the preliminary agreement is near the truth we can see from the interview "with a high official of the Waichiaopu" reported by Mr. Rodney Gilbert yesterday. This high official (otherwise presumably Dr. Wellington Koo) emphasizes with great firmness and variety that "all the old wrongs arising from infringements of China's sovereign rights" must be remedied, "tho inequitable treaties (of Tsarist days) must be abrogated," the treaties concluded between Russia and Outer Mongolia must be cancelled and all Russian troops withdrawn instanter, or there can be no hope of genuine friendship between China and the Soviet.

The outcome of this tussle between two of the most grasping Powers in existence will be awaited with interest. Chinese officials, always endowed with a full share of the Oriental faculty for driving a hard bargain, have had their heads completely turned by the sending of yet a second Soviet envoy to sue for their favours, after the ignominious failure of the egregious Joffe, and in their infatuation appear to imagine they can get anything: while the Soviet has already shown itself at least as imperialistic and land-grabbing as the Tsar's Government was and, having been recognized by Great Britain and Italy, will hardly give away everything for nothing to a bankrupt, unprofitable Government like China's. There are points in the controversy on which the outsider may sympathize with both parties. Russian extraterritorial rights were only suspended on the breaking off of relationships with Prince Koudacheff; they were never cancelled and there is no reason why they should be. It would indeed be most derogatory to the dignity of the Russian people, if Moscow were to consent to such a sacrifice and, with the last three years' practical experience before her of submitting Russian affairs to the tender mercies of Chinese officials, we cannot think that she will. On the other hand, China has an excellent case in respect of Mongolia. Twice Moscow has voluntarily promised to hand back the dependency to China, but never a sign has there been of any fulfilment of the promise. Unhappily, Chinese diplomacy has a fatal proclivity for spoiling a good case and overreaching itself. It has certainly done so in the present instance.

THE EDUCATION OF CHINESE

Mar. 26.

THE question Mr. Lockwood raised in our correspondence column yesterday has never yet, we think, been put so directly. But it was bound to demand an answer some day and the sooner ratepayers make up their mind about it the better. To the extent that we all desire the Chinese to be educated, everybody will sympathize with Mr. Lockwood's ideals. But the usual discrepancy between ideals and realities applies at least as much in this as in other questions. In his enthusiasm Mr. Lockwood has overlooked several facts and has not been fair to the Educational Commission. Among other facts which he ignores is that Shanghai is not a colony nor a domain, but an international settlement, a reservation for foreigners, whose Municipal Council has no sovereign powers but only a strictly limited authority. New York and Chicago are no analogy for Shanghai. They can compel people to pay an education rate, can force parents to send their children to school (neither of which could the Shanghai Council do) and are, moreover, concerned to educate the children of their own country. In respect of the Educational Commission, anyone would think from reading Mr. Lockwood's letter that they had "turned down" flat the whole proposal to have municipal schools for Chinese. This is emphatically not the case and Mr. Lockwood might well have spared some space in his long letter to save it from giving so misleading an impression.

At the outset of its report the Commission emphatically dissents from the stated assumption that "it is the duty of the Council to see that primary education is within the reach of the children of all ratepayers." Nothing can be found in the Land Regulations to support this view, nor would they enable the Council (as said above) to force parents to send children to school. All this, be it observed, applies equally to foreign and Chinese children. What the Council has done in providing education to a limited extent has been purely an act of grace, though with the ready acquiescence of all ratepayers. Then, turning to the question of Chinese alone, the Commission say:—

The Council would be justified in making some experiments with regard to assisting in the education of the very poor, provided that they receive assistance and co-operation from the Chinese ratepayers.

It is suggested to the Council that their aim should be to make good citizens of the Chinese, that by so doing they would not only be helping towards the general good government and order and prosperity of Shanghai but would also be conferring a benefit on the Chinese nation by showing a good example and assisting the Chinese educational authorities who have the education of their nationals at heart in their difficult task.

Later on, after the report has noted that at present only Chinese boys are educated by the Council, we find this also:—

The Commission are strongly in favour of the institution of a school for Chinese Girls, a school of Higher Primary and Middle Grade. The object being that as schools for Chinese Boys have been instituted and stand as models for future schools that may be instituted by the Chinese themselves, it is desirable that a Chinese Girls' School should also be established as a model, provided that the Chinese themselves cooperate with the Municipality as they have already done in the various schools for Chinese boys and that they assist in establishing and maintaining such school for girls.

The apparent assumption of Mr. Lockwood's letter that the Commission have not taken thought for the Chinese is in no way justified by the report.

Furthermore, the Commission think it safe to say that the number of Chinese children not receiving education in Shanghai is 150,000; it may well be double that. We admit that that is no very welcome thought. But we would also emphasize that it puts the question of their education by Municipal means wholly out of court, unless there is to be a very considerable increase in the rates; and we shrewdly suspect that Chinese would be the first to kick against that. The important fact which must be kept in view is that the Municipal Council is not as its confrères in other lands. Its powers are in many ways less than theirs, while its responsibilities are much greater—in the matter of defence for example, and the protection which has attracted so many thousands of Chinese to live within its sphere of action. Spontaneously it has instituted a number of "model" schools—we do not know why Mr. Lockwood sneers at this qualification of their functions, for as models

BRITISH PRESS COMMENT.

London, Mar. 21.

Commenting on the strained relations between China and Russia, the Diplomatic Correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" says that, if Moscow should attempt to carry out its threat to invade Manchuria and other Chinese provinces on a substantial scale, a serious international situation might be created, having regard to the principle of Chinese territorial integrity laid down by the Powers and endorsed at the Washington Conference.

The "Daily Mail," in an editorial article, charges the Bolshevik envoy, M. Karakhan, with systematically plotting against the peace of China and attempting to stir up trouble of every kind. It declares that Bolshevik control of the all-important Chinese Eastern Railway, as demanded by the Soviet Government, would mean the destruction of its business and efficiency with the result that the Japanese lines to Port Arthur and Korea would lose their Manchurian traffic and cease to pay. Japan would, therefore, be certain to give quiet support to China in case of a threat of war. It does not seem probable, the "Daily Mail" says, that China is in any serious danger.

The Diplomatic Correspondent of the "Daily News" is of opinion that it is not likely that the Russians will resort to military measures in Manchuria, but, if they do, the Western Powers will undoubtedly take action.—Reuter.

Negotiations to be Carried On by the Waichiaopu

Peking, Mar. 21.

A mandate issued at midnight says that the Sino-Russian negotiations are a matter of vital importance. The negotiations have hitherto been carried out by Dr. C. T. Wang and, although no great divergence in views has been revealed, no material conclusion has been reached. These negotiations henceforth will be carried out by the Waichiaopu, which has been instructed to go on with them, so that negotiations in future will be conducted by a Department which is fully empowered to act on behalf of the Government.

It is still uncertain whether Mr. Karkhan will resume negotiations, but the above mandate is considered interesting, as it emphasizes that Dr. C. T. Wang's initialling is not considered binding by the Government and the Soviet in future must deal with Dr. Wellington Koo.

Russia Not Ready to Resume Discussions: The Draft Agreement

Peking, Mar. 21.

Many telegrams of inquiry have recently been received by the Government regarding the nature and progress of the Sino-Russian negotiations. It is reported that the Government has now sent a circular telegram to the provincial authorities stating that it fully realizes the importance of these negotiations. The Government, therefore, is handling the matter with due care. No direct result can yet be reported, but the provinces will be informed as soon as a final settlement is reached.

Nothing has transpired to indicate that the Russians are ready to pick up the threads of negotiations cast down by Mr. Karakhan, but there seems to be a possibility of resumption at some future date. Mr Karakhan's action is still being widely discussed in Peking. The general trend of comment is that, as Mr Wilson failed to have his signature of the Versailles Treaty ratified by Congress, and as the initialling of a document is never accepted as final in international diplomacy, Mr. Karakhan either gave way to anger or had other reasons for choosing to consider the signing of a draft agreement, which had to be referred to the Cabinet, as binding upon the Chinese Government.—Reuters Pacific Service.

Waichiaopu's New Memorandum Alleging Misunderstanding

Peking, Mar. 22.

The Waichiaopu late this afternoon sent a memorandum to M. Karakhan replying to his note of March 19, pointing out the misunderstanding on M. Karakhan's part regarding the signing of the agreement, stating that no other Powers had interfered in this matter and asserting that if such interference had been attempted, which it was not, China would have been uninfluenced thereby. The memorandum then refers to the mandate issued on March 20, announcing that the negotiations would henceforth be carried on by the Waichiaopu, and in conclusion states that the Chinese Government is ready to resume negotiations with M. Karakhan so that an early and satisfactory conclusion may be reached.

Reuter's correspondent is authoritatively informed that the draft agreement was not dated, so that the correct date could be inserted when the Chinese Government approved it, and, moreover, no seals were attached, while the signatures of M. Karakhan and Dr. C. T. Wang were not followed by their titles as negotiators.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Cabinet's Circular Telegram: Matters Still in Dispute

Peking, Mar. 23.

The following is a translation of the circular telegram sent out by the Cabinet concerning the Sino-Russian negotiations:—

To the Military Governors, Civil Governors, Inspectors-General, Director-General of the National Army, Tutungs, etc.

Sino-Russian affairs have been repeatedly discussed by the Director-General, Dr. C. T. Wang, with the Russian representative, Mr. Karakhan. The main principles of unsettled questions between the two countries, as well as a preliminary agreement concerning the administration of the Chinese Eastern Railway, have been brought to a conclusion and presented to the Government, which has given them its serious consideration at various Cabinet meetings. Such matters as the abrogation of old treaties and their replacement by new ones, cancellation of extraterritorial rights, the restoration of concessions, remission of the Boxer Indemnity, and Customs revenues, have already reached mutual agreement. Those articles deemed by the Government to be acceptable have been carefully revised.

There still remain in dispute, however, the following important questions:—

1.—In the opinion of the Government the treaties made between Russia and Outer Mongolia should immediately be cancelled. The Russian representative, however, only admitted that such treaties as were made with old Russia and those with a third country should be cancelled if harmful to China's sovereignty. He did not recognize cancellation of treaties between Soviet Russia and Outer Mongolia. In view of the fact that these treaties consider Outer Mongolia as an independent country, and that a Minister has been sent there by the Russian Government, this is quite contrary to the sentence "respecting the sovereignty of China," and this, of course, is of great importance.

SUPPRESSION OF THE WHITES.

2.—The Chinese Government is of opinion that the Russian troops in Mongolia should be withdrawn immediately. The Russian representative, however, insisted that this would not be done until certain conditions (immediate suppression of the Whites) had been settled in the formal conference. Further, the Government intended to change the wording to "the Russian troops shall be fully withdrawn, the time limit for withdrawal and the question of peace between the two countries' borders to be settled at the forthcoming formal conference." The reason for this is that the invasion of Russian troops is an act against China's sovereignty, and the troops should be withdrawn immediately, with no conditions to follow, so that no hindrances might be created.

3.—The Russian representative demanded that Russian properties such as churches and immovable property should be handed over to his Government. The Chinese Government, fearing that this might be followed by other countries and thus interfere with the buying and selling of properties owned by foreigners in China, considered it an improper request.

These three points have been repeatedly revised at Cabinet meetings and handed back to Dr. Wang for negotiation with Mr. Karakhan.

ONLY A PRELIMINARY MEASURE.

We are now surprised that the representatives of the two countries have signed the preliminary agreement without instructions from the Government being given to Dr. Wang as Director-General. This was done on the 14th instant and not until two days later was the Government advised by Dr. Wang that the signature was affixed only as a preliminary measure, which differed from a formal signature. The Russian representative, however, thought it a formal signing and thereupon gave a three-days limit for a decision. Furthermore, the Russian representative declared that "if the Chinese Government will not recognize the signed agreement within three days the Russian Government will not be bound by the terms agreed to. And if there is any difficulty as the result of the breaking-off of the negotiations the Chinese Government must bear the responsibility for the trouble thus created."

Having had a full report of the circumstances from Dr. Wang, we were much surprised at the attitude of the Russian representative. After a Cabinet meeting the Government deemed it improper to have a three days limit set by the Russian representative, while the former hoped to have these main points revised. It was then decided by the Cabinet that the Chinese Government would not acknowledge such a limitation of time in giving its answer.

The negotiations were thus broken off, and the Russian authorities must be held fully responsible. This office has sent a reply to Dr. Wang, who was instructed to forward the same to Mr. Karakhan. This general summary of the case is specially telegraphed to you for your information. Further details will follow.

(Signed) THE CABINET.

The Russian Ultimatum

March 20, 1924.

A second telegram was sent by the Cabinet as follows:—

We hope that our telegram of even date has reached you. The Cabinet has received a letter from the Russian representative, Mr. Karakhan, to the Waichiaopu. It reads as follows: Last year Dr. C. T. Wang was appointed by the Chinese Government as Director-General for negotiations with Soviet Russia. The negotiations between the Chinese Director-General and this representative were concluded and the agreement signed. But as the Chinese Government did not acknowledge the signature of their Director-General, thus making the agreement invalid, I, acting on instructions from the Soviet Government beg to bring to Your Excellency's cognizance: 1.—That the Soviet Government considers the negotiations with the official delegate of the Chinese Government as concluded. 2.—That it rejects resolutely any attempt at reverting to the discussion of the agreement already reached and signed. 3.—That it warns the Chinese Government against committing an irretrievable mistake, which will not be without a bearing on future relations between the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Republic of China. 4.—That upon expiration of the time limit set in the letter of March 19 to the official delegate it will not consider itself bound by the conditions of the agreement signed on March 14, and will reserve the full right of freely establishing the conditions of future treaties with China. 5.—That after expiration of the said time limit the Chinese Government will not be able to resume negotiations until it has without any agreement and unconditionally established formal relations with the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

As to this matter the Government has always desired to have it settled as quickly as possible. But since it is of such great importance, the Government feels impelled to bestow much thought and care upon it. On reading the letter from the Russian representative, the Chinese Director-General, Dr. Wang, as a matter of course was not able to continue his negotiations with the former. Hence the order was issued transferring the matter to the Waichiaopu, and that department has been instructed to take up the negotiations and continue the discussion.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KARAKHAN UNCOMPROMISING.

Peking, Mar. 26.

Replying to the Waichiaopu's Note of March 22, M. Karakhan in a Note yesterday evening refuses to discuss the powers of the Chinese delegate, which, he considers, is a matter of Chinese concern. He disputes the Chinese assertion that there has been no foreign interference, quoting the French Minister's Note regarding the Chinese Eastern Railway as an example. Finally, M. Karakhan maintains that China shall either approve the settlement as drafted or return to his original proposal for unconditional recognition and subsequent negotiations.

The Chinese authorities at Harbin have reported to the Government that the Soviet Agency there has promulgated an order for all Russians, both Red and which will register at the agency, which will then give them certificates for residence. The report expresses the opinion that such action on the part of the Bolsheviks should not be permitted until relations have been restored between Russia and China. Accordingly they had informed the Soviet Agency that the practice must not be carried out for the present.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

M. KARAKHAN'S NOTE.

Peking, Mar. 27.

Dr. Wellington Koo, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, attended the Cabinet meeting this morning and reported M. Karakhan's note, on which there was some discussion but no important development.

The Chinese press and Parliament and also Loyang are showing desire for the recognition of Russia, but the Government do not appear inclined to alter their attitude.

It was reported yesterday that M. Karakhan would probably have to leave Peking as a result of his Note, but this view is officially deprecated and it is emphasised that the Government will spare no efforts towards the resumption of negotiations and that, if these are unsuccessful, it will not be the fault of the Chinese Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Another Explanation

An interesting comment on the Russo-Chinese negotiations appeared this week in "New Shang hai Life." A message dated Moscow, the 20th instant, is quoted as follows:

"In connexion with the present situation, the Rosta News Agency correspondent has been informed by the Russian Mission that the three days' limit was wrongly stated to be an ultimatum. The Soviet Government only wished to give a warning that it considered itself under an obligation to sign the agreement of March 14 within three days. Actually, however, the Soviet Government waited six days as from March 14. It is only natural that it would be unjust to expect the Soviet Government upon signing the agreement with the official delegate of the Chinese Government to wait until all contradictions, demands, shameful intrigues and personal interests in the sphere between Washington and Paris, including Peking, had been smoothed over and satisfied. To wait until all this had been done would be similar to waiting for the institution of a united all-China government and the national freedom from foreign imperialism."

ACCORDING to the Chinese press the Soviet Government is sending a number of women spies to different parts of China. The activities of these agents are especially noticeable in Kirin province.

FRANCE AND SINO-RUSSIAN NEGOTIATIONS

Insistence on Due Regard for Washington Arrangements in Respect of C. E. R.

Paris, Mar. 21.

It is reported that the French Legation at Peking has played a preponderating part in the Sino-Russian negotiations exerting strong pressure on the Chinese Government to reject the Soviet terms in connexion with the Chinese Eastern Railway.

It is stated that the French attitude is based on international rather then national considerations. France desires a collective démarche to Peking on the lines of the resolution of the Washington Conference on February 4, 1922, insisting on China's responsibility for the performance of obligations towards the foreign stockholders, bondholders and creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway and that the possession and administration of the railway constituted a trust in China's hands.—Reuter.

THE CUSTOMS SURTAX

Prospect of Conference Dimmed by Anarchy and Unfriendliness of China

London, Mar. 24.

Replying to Mr. Chapple (Liberal), who is Vice-Chairman of the Parliamentary group looking after Chinese affairs, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald stated that the Chinese request to hold a preliminary conference to discuss matters relating to the increase of 2½ per cent. in the Customs duties in accordance with the Washington Treaty had just been received and was being inquired into.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 25.

The Diplomatic Correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" says that the Powers are at present exchanging views on the Peking Government's request for a conference on the subject of increased Customs duties, provision for which is contained in the Nine Power Treaty, but the reigning anarchy and chaos throughout China and the unfriendly attitude of Chinese officialdom towards foreigners militates against granting the request.—Reuter.

CHINESE NAVY DISPUTE

Probability of Settlement

Peking, Mar. 22.

It is semi-officially reported that the mission of Gen. Chow Yu-keh to Nanking to discuss naval matters with Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei has been successful. Gen. Chow returned to Peking yesterday and has informed the Government that Admiral Tu has agreed to the appointment of Vice-Admiral Wen Shu-teh as commander of the Peihai squadron under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Forces, Admiral Tu.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mar. 23.

As expected, a mandate was issued last night appointing Admiral Wen Shou-teh Commander of the Pehhai Squadron (Chihli Gulf).—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPANESE MINISTER AND PRESIDENT

Peking, Mar. 18.

A report in the vernacular papers stated that the Japanese Minister was about to present his credentials to President Tsao Kun. This most probably refers to the fact that the letter from the Emperor of Japan acknowledging receipt of the communication from President Tsao Kun, announcing his inauguration of the post of Chief Executive, has been received by the Japanese Minister, who has been in communication with the Waichiaopu relative to its presentation to the President.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

of the world, is allowed to go to wrack and ruin, her rivers and creeks silt up and flood the land, drowning hundreds, and her politicians are left to make hay with the remainder. Assuredly it would seem, China does not take care. But it may be that we judge superficially, not perfectly understanding what the Chinese care for most. Politics, they might say, is an unclean trade at the best of times, in which a man sells his soul to the party whips for the illusory advantage of a handle to his name: why worry because it is a little uncleaner in one place than in another? As for great walls, there is now no longer any danger of the Tartar invasions they were built to keep out: and floods and pestilence are Nature's safety valve in a country where there are far too many people. But of the things that a Chinese really values he takes very particular care. His ancient philosophy is still unscathed by the learning of the West; his sense of family duty in both directions is as acute as ever; and his manners, which are the most manifest part of his immemorial training, are still the best in the world.

Why do we haste to rise up early and so late take rest and eat the bread of carefulness? If the East have anything to teach the West, it is surely that we disquiet ourselves in vain and that the secret of existence lies along the lines of wearing one suit until it is worn out, then throwing it away and buying another. "Why, why do anything?" exclaims Postlethwaite in Du Maurier's skit. "Why not be content simply to be? To remain for ever existing beautifully?" But it is to be feared that Postlethwaite's notions of divine reposefulness presupposed an assured income. Which is the case with all of us, and hence the downfall of Stoic superiority to mundane matters and subservience to the Mammon of taking care of things.

Peking telegrams to the Chinese press refer to a regrouping of power within the Chihli leaders' ranks. It is rumoured that Marshals Chi Shieh-yuan (Governor-General of Kiangsi, Kiangsu and Anhui), Wang Cheng-ping (Governor of Chihli and Associate Governor-General of Chihli, Shantung and Honan) and Feng Yu-hsiang (the "Christian General" who is Inspector-General of the Chinese Army) have entered into a secret pact with a view to limiting the rise of Marshal Wu Pei-fu. Meanwhile, Marshal Wu has telegraphed to Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan (Governor-General of Hunan and Hupeh) announcing that he is sending two brigades to the south to "rescue Kuangtung."

Local Chinese labourers' organizations have sent a letter to Britain's Labour Premier, hoping to enlist the sympathy of the British working man. The letter is typical of such communications: "After working hard for a whole (it states) day the Chinese labourers earns barely enough to keep himself from starvation. The capitalists, who care only for profit-making and their own interests, are doing their utmost to oppress the labourers, whose numerous appeals for relief have been turned down by them. The labourers for relief have been turned down by them. The labourers are not only forbidden to hold meetings, but are oppressed should they attempt to go on strike. In short Chinese labourers are given no freedom and are ill-treated. We send you this in the hope that you will take us into consideration, and to devise ways and means of improving the terms of freindship between Chinese and British labourers. Hoping you will extend us a helping hand."

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Trademarks and Monopoly

The well-founded nature of merchants' resistance to the Chinese Trademark Law, if any proof were needed, was proved up to the hilt by the disclosures in Mr. Rodney Gilbert's telegram on Saturday. One of the clauses, No. 10, permitted the Registration Bureau to reject whatever applicant for registration of a trademark it sees fit. The Diplomatic Body objected to this clause, at first, we are told, merely because of its impertinence. But now a graver reason has come to light. Mr. Rodney Gilbert says:—

The fact has been established that several firms of local Chinese lawyers have applied to the Trademark Bureau for monopolistic franchise, but want guarantees that through themselves alone can application for registration be made.

It is reported that the reply of the Bureau to this demand was in one case that while diplomatic negotiations were pending, it was impossible to give an assurance of a monopoly in writing, but that upon payment of a large fee, franchise could be issued with a verbal promise for discrimination at a later date.

To-day it is said that one legal firm has paid the price asked and received the franchise. The inference in this case is that as soon as the Powers recognize the law, the required monopoly will be given the franchise-holders, while all independent applicants will be refused under Article X. Thus they will be forced to pay big fees to monopolists.

The italics are ours to emphasize the facts which reveal this iniquitous law in its true colours. We may add that news to this effect had reached us through very trustworthy channels on the day on which Mr. Gilbert telegraphed, and we had wired to him for confirmation. That the Trademark Law opened an easy way to illicit profits was obvious from the first. The exact modus operandi was not known. Now it is. The abuses to which the monopoly will give rise are endless. Unless the person registering a trademark pays a heavy fee to the monopolists, registration may be altogether refused, at best will be subjected to endless delays. And be it remembered, there will be no appeal except to Chinese courts. It is to be hoped that this revelation of the true purpose of the Trademark Law will at last arouse the Diplomatic Body to take the only proper course regarding it. It is a flagrant violation of the Treaty of 1858 and of the Mackay Treaty. There is only one way of dealing with it and that is uncompromising rejection.

Treaty Observance

The statement received from Paris to-day, evidently official, that "the French Legation in Peking has played a preponderating part in the Sino-Russian negotiations," is distinctly cheering. France, we are told, desires a collective démarche to Peking on the lines of the resolution of the Washington Conference on February 4, 1922, insisting on China's responsibility for the performance of obligations towards the foreign stock-holders, bond-holders and creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway and that the possession and administration of the railway constituted a trust in China's hands.

This is a fact which, as Mr. Rodney Gilbert recalled the other day, is beyond dispute, but which the Waichiaopu has blandly ignored, doubtless in harmony with Dr. Wellington Koo's normal assumption that treaties between China and foreign Powers are old-fashioned, out-of-date things, which nobody pays any attention to nowadays. We are not specially interested in the C.E.R. But all foreigners are vitally interested in remembering and in seeing that China remembers, that the Washington Treaties not only granted concessions; they did also contain stipulations. In this way one was heartily glad to see Sir John Jordan's letter to the "Times" last week protesting strongly against the proposed 2½ per cent. surtax being granted merely for the paying off of China's unsecured debts and urging that it should not be acquiesced in except in return for real and much-needed fiscal reform. What Sir John Jordan says deservedly carries great weight with the Foreign Office. In this connexion, it may be recalled that the Washington Treaty carefully stated that the surtax was only to be imposed "from such date, for such purposes and subject to such conditions as (the international commission) may decide." Every forcible reminder to Peking that treaties are not old-fashioned and negligible is indeed welcome.

Where Economy Flourishes

Since assuming office Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the Labour Prime Minister, has shown a very strict interest in the exercise of national economy—occasionally his opponents, especially in reference the Singapore base, think that his Government might lay a looser hand on the purse strings. A writer in the "Glasgow Herald" now points out that Mr. MacDonald comes from Lossiemouth, a place already famed for economy, and mentions one outstanding instance from history. He writes:—

If Mr. Ramsay MacoDnald knows the minor incidents of the history of his native place and follows the example of its public men, he may accomplish much in the way of debt reduction, even without a levy on capital. In February, 1834, there appeared in an Elgin paper, headed "Unexampled Economy. Worthy of Imitation," in which it was stated that the two Senior Bailies of the burgh went on behalf of the town to Lossiemouth to meet the gentleman appointed to stake off the ground for a proposed new harbour. The worthy Magistrates walked the whole distance five miles out and five miles home, and only spent one shilling. This expenditure consisted of sixpence for whisky and the other sixpence to the waiter.

This modesty in expenditure is wholly gratifying, only it will strike a great many people that the donation to the waiter savoured somewhat of extravagance. Still it was better than making a capital levy on the gentleman which a subsequent Lossiemouth generation had apparently in mind.

Aerial Ambitions

The year 1924 promises to be the most ambitious of all hitherto in aerial enterprise. One British and one American flight round the world is to be attempted, in fact within a day or two the airmen will have left their jumping-off stations on their perilous quest. While the American airship Shenandoah has been ordered to relinquish her Arctic flight, Amundsen is to make one more effort to guide aeroplanes over the ice-bound Polar regions, and the year is accordingly full of wonderful possibilities. While we hope for success, we must remember the disappointments of the past and, if achievement falls short of expectation, not be too unduly despondent. When the Italians set out from Rome on their aerial voyage to Tokio, the public, unfamiliar with the difficulties of the task, expected something in the nature of a rush over land and sea, and it was matter for surprise that months elapsed before the journey had been completed. But when Captain McMillan was overcome by disaster after leaving India on a similar venture, it was realized that they who would be successful pioneers, must venture warily. So far the air has only in part been conquered. Aeroplane construction and aerial science, however, are steadily advancing, and even the lapse of a year or two should improve the chances of bringing about a successful flight. It has already been shown possible to fly by short stages from Europe to Australia and the east of Asia, and interest in the forthcoming ventures will be largely centred in the difficult task of crossing the Pacific. If that can be successfully accomplished a definitely new stage in the mastery of the air will have been reached.

The Famine Centres

The reports so far received from the former famine centres of China are encouraging. Agricultural work is proceeding along normal lines, and granted reasonable weather in the summer there ought to be good harvests. It is, of course, too soon yet to attempt definite conclusions, but at any rate it is satisfactory to learn that there is every prospect of the districts that were so sorely stricken by famine two, three and four years ago, assuming their former prosperity. Not quite, however, for the incidence of opium cultivation is deteriorating the land for ordinary crops. The poppy appears to take an enormous amount out of the soil in the way of its fertility, and so succeeding crops are of poor quality until there has been a chance for the earth to recover from the drain to which it has been subjected. This very point was noted in a cotton report published by us this week, and it is further proof of how much China's material prosperity is being damaged by opium cultivation. The country is not yet so far removed from the menace of famine with which it is familiar that its soil can be so misused, and all protests against opium growing should be supported energetically. One or two recently appointed officials are understood to have pledged their future reputation on success attained in extinguishing the evil, and if reputation counts for anything in China they have a great field for enhancing theirs.

The Art of Duelling

The fact that a duel should have serious consequences, as in this week's case of the encounter between two officials of the Argentine when both were badly wounded, is something almost surprising in modern days. We leave out the German duel in which people, especially students, hacked at each other with swords—the thrust being barred—and gloried in the number of scars they could show. What the majority of people have read about is usually comprised in meetings with pistols, usually on French soil, and for years there has been apparently a monotonous regularity of both parties missing or managing to fire in the air and then a reconciliation on the ground. Very likely the public has, however, only been given a modified selection out of the present records of duelling, for ever and anon reports have been current in England of gentlemen settling their differences after a trip across the Channel with much more serious results than have usually been suggested. A challenge which occasioned quite a sensation in England rather over a quarter of a century ago was that issued by a member of the House of Lords well advanced in years to a political opponent, but which was declined. The most recent sensation in the way of duelling came from M. Poincaré who as late as a fortnight ago challenged a Royalist deputy to combat. It failed, however, to go beyond a challenge, the seconds deciding that the quarrel was not big enough to call for actual hostilities. Probably just as well, for courts of law ought to be competent to settle any dispute which arises out of political controversy.

Children from the East

Very few parents, of those who are fortunate enough to be able to send their children Home to school, are also so lucky as to be able to meet with confidence the question, "What is to become of them during the holidays?" And upon that follows the equally poignant problem, "Shall the mother go to England to make a home for them, or should she stay in the Far East and leave the children to strangers?" It is possible that both father and mother may have plenty of relations at Home. But it is by no means certain that that fact will dispose of the difficulty. We cannot help feeling that few indeed of our sisters-in-law and brothers-in-law, our cousins, uncles and aunts are so wisely endowed by nature as to bring up their own children in the way that we would have our own brought up: and even if they can pass the test, we have a misgiving that they might not jump at the charge of additional and exotic olive branches. For all these reasons there should certainly be an opening for the sort of school at Home which is forecast to-day in an advertisement on our front page. It would be managed by a headmaster who has long personal experience of the Far East and is thus fully qualified to win the confidence of parents and holiday time would be catered for as well as the school terms. There is, in this scheme, no apparent provision for girls, but we imagine that arrangements might be made in that direction, without trenching on the co-education system which some of us are still old-fashioned enough to dislike. Altogether the project seems to offer a welcome escape from the uncertainties of guardianship by relations on the one side and the terrors of another edition of "Baa Baa Blacksheep" on the other.

Harbin Rumours

In its present condition a city such as Harbin must naturally be a fruitful spot for rumours, but those now said to be current are surely too extravagant. A visitor from there who has just arrived in Peking is reported as saying that a rumour is about that Red troops, brought from European Russia, are being massed at Manchuli and Suifenho with the intention of marching into the Chinese Eastern Railway Zone from either end and taking forcible possession. It was impossible to obtain confirmation of the news, but Harbin was none the less unsettled thereby. While in its negotiations with the Chinese the Soviet has shown a singular capacity for trying to grasp everything within its reach, we are not yet prepared to believe that any such master stroke as this is yet contemplated. In the first place the railway facilities between Moscow and the Far East are so limited that the massing of an army sufficient for this enterprise would require a considerable time, and in the next it is tolerably certain that, were anything of the kind now in progress, more or less full details of it would be known by the authorities. Modern armies with all their impedimenta cannot concentrate in secret, even though frontiers be scrupulously watched and the ordinary avenues of information closed, and sufficient is bound to be known to put the other side on its guard. A concentration such as is reported would be to all intents and purposes a casus belli, and no government would allow it to be pursued without the usual diplomatic course of asking for explanations and assurances.

Swaraj in Shanghai

A curious document has reached us which deserves publication. It is as follows:—

The Hindustan Association of Shanghai met in a meeting and passed the following resolution unanimously:—

Whereas it has come to our notice through the columns of Navayuga that Mrs. Besant, in her paper "New India," has suggested to the Government of India to close the Schools, Hospitals, Dispensaries, imprison the Swarajist members of the C. P. (Central Provinces) Legislative Council, dismiss the Police and menial staff unless they accept the verdict of the Government Minority in the council, and whereas this suggestion of Mrs. Besant is malicious, spiteful and detrimental to all Indian aspiration, be it resolved that this association views it with feelings of horror and loses all confidence in the universal brotherhood movement started by her and appeals to the people of India to boycott her paper.

Mrs. Besant is the head of the Theosophical movement in England; she founded, some years ago, a college for natives at Benares; at the beginning of the Great War, the Governor of Madras thought it advisable to put her under restraint on account of the supposedly subversive nature of her teaching; and later Mr. Edwin Montagu, Secretary for India, gave the Governor of Madras a public slap in the face by letting her out again. Generally speaking, she has not been popular with the people who realize that a strong British Raj is indispensable for the saving of India from political chaos and corruption and probably civil war. The statements attributed to her by the Hindustan Association are thus as startling as they are welcome. If she really made them she deserves a statue as much as she once appeared to deserve incarceration.

they undoubtedly have served and have found imitators—and if it decides to act on the Educational Commission's recommendations we are sure the ratepayers will agree. But further than this we cannot see that it is called upon, or indeed has any business to go.

In conclusion might we urge that if proposals to spend large additional sums in education are being canvassed, the claims of foreign children be not forgotten? We would not have a penny less expended on Chinese schools; rather, we are in wholehearted agreement with all that the Education Commission recommends. But there is a danger that in the long run the interests of white children will play a very second fiddle to that of the Chinese. This has been the case in the Levant and in India and it may easily occur in China where, as in the two regions named, a large white population is growing up which has not known and never will know any other country. It is comparatively easy in India to get money and the best brains from abroad to teach in native schools, where the element of missionizing and pioneer work is an incentive. But it is not so easy to provide for the proper equipment of schools for white children. Already it is to be seen that money for the education of Chinese is easily raised abroad. In no sense whatever would we have it otherwise. The white man has introduced the yeast of his own restless ideas so deeply into the once passive nature of the Oriental that it can never now be eliminated, and he is morally bound to assist at the working thereof. But let him not forget his own children, in the enervating surroundings of a land which he himself and not nature has willed that they shall inhabit.

THE RATEPAYERS' MEETING

Mar. 27.

To-day's Municipal Gazette announces April 16 as the date fixed for the Ratepayers' meeting, and therewith an important innovation: the hour of meeting is to be 4.30 p.m. instead of 2 as usual. Nearly every meeting that we can remember for the past decade has been followed by letters of complaint from our readers that unless the hour of meeting can be changed, it is impossible for the generality of ratepayers to be present. Some have even suggested meeting after dinner: it would be truly interesting to see how many people would take the trouble to attend. But we shall also be curious as to how far the hour of 4.30 may make the meeting attractive. The change is an experiment not necessarily to be repeated if it does not succeed. Until the last two years it would hardly have been feasible, owing to the length of the "set" speeches on the annual report and the budget. But with the greater publicity now weekly given to affairs, in the Municipal Gazette, these heavy items in the parochial bill of fare have undergone a welcome cutting down: last year they were all disposed of in rather less time than one would have taken in previous years.

Excited by the possibility of actually obtaining a sufficient quantity of ratepayers, the Municipal Council is emboldened to undertake also a special meeting, at the same time as the annual, in order "to deal with matters which have accumulated in recent years and have not been previously passed owing to the absence of the necessary quorum." The principal of these are the increase of wharf duties, the licensing of exchange shops and—dare we say it?—the registration of the press. The wharfage dues question appeared at the special meeting, which failed for the usual want of a quorum in 1922, together with the licensing of exchange shops: neither of these is controversial. But the Press By-Law was first brought before the public as far back as in 1916. Flagrant and one is forced to think deliberate misrepresentation killed it in the earlier stages: and so skilfully did the opposition inflame the Chinese, that every subsequent appearance has caused heart-burning and clamour. In 1922, however, a very carefully worded explanation by the Council, published beforehand in the Gazette, did much to reassure Chinese publishing houses and to convince them that the By-Law was in no way different from the practice in western countries and in no manner whatever infringed the liberty of the Press. However, there was no quorum at the meeting. Nine being a lucky number, it is possible that there may be better fortune this year—though we must confess that we remember saying that of the seventh essay in 1922. But there is certainly no reason why ratepayers should not be able to get to this year's meeting and it is earnestly to be hoped that they will do so, if only to confound the pessimists who aver that the civic sense of Shanghai is dead.

OUR TELEPHONES

Mar. 27.

We have become more or less accustomed to the occasional yet delightful vagaries of our local telephone service (vagaries which, at times, lend a little spice to our otherwise uneventful and halcyon office life); to the complaints, reproachful and mild, vituperative and gentle, that so frequently are made by exasperated subscribers (or those making use of subscribers' telephones) to the ever-obliging, mystic and elusive voice that lives (as an actual fact, we typed "loves" but fortunately discovered the error immediately) at "499"; and to the anathema and contumely that some of us, tried and tested beyond endurance, are wont to cast on our telephone operators, their lineal ancestors mate and female, their friends and their relations, their heirs and their successors. However, this screed is not intended to deal with the faults and failings, the idiosyncrasies and inaccuracies, of our friend the operator, but rather to indulge in a gentle knock at some of ourselves and to give a little prominence to a telephonic fault of which all of us, more or less, at times can be held guilty. We refer to the prevailing custom—when one who is busy wishes to make a telephone call—of instructing the boy or coolie in the office to obtain connexion, and taking up the receiver when the call eventually is through. Admittedly the practice is a necessary one in Shanghai, where telephones of the cinema variety decidedly are not: it is the abuse of the custom that calls for comment. We will quote a concrete example to bring home our point. A few days ago the writer was in a local office and the gentleman to whom he was talking gave the boy a number and a name and told him to get through. The call was through within half a minute (possibly the particular operator concerned is a friend of the boy) and the "callee" was duly waiting at the other end. The boy informed his employer who, however, still carried on his conversation with the writer and after at least two minutes strolled over to the 'phone. The bird had flown. Our friend then turned the handle furiously and accused the operator of having cut him off. His actual remarks were better out of print. He then rang up "499", complained strongly (though this time in normal English) and again was put through. And yet only he was at fault. With a congested telephone service such as is ours, such incidents do not tend to greater efficiency; in fact they detract from it, and we suggest, for the benefit of telephone subscribers, individually and collectively, that those who make a practice of putting on the boy to get through a call for them shall not waste the time of others, and make our telephone service worse—or less efficient—than it is, by a thoughtlessness that amounts to little less than neglect and passive obstruction.

CONGESTION IN THE HARBOUR

Mar. 28.

Various events have conspired to bring about a considerable degree of congestion in the harbour, which to say the least is causing worry to shipping firms. A good instance of how difficult is the position is that a ship from the Pacific coast with a cargo of lumber has only been able to find a berth in the extreme upper reaches of the harbour, whereas for convenience and facility of unloading her cargo her natural berth would be almost at the other end, six or seven miles away, near where the lumber yards are situated. The fact that she is so far away must inevitably increase the cost of handling the lumber, but considering how congested the harbour can at times become, she may very nearly be said to be lucky, for cases have occasionally occurred in the past when the absence of any berth at all has caused steamers to discharge their cargoes at Woosung. The present congestion seems curious at a time when most firms are complaining of the dull state of trade, and rather suggests that the complaint is overdone. It is certain that a considerable amount of import is taking place, otherwise these ships would not be here. But this is not the same thing as a condition of brisk business. Exports are by no means commensurate with the volume of imports, and the result is that outward bound vessels are not carrying the cargoes which in a state of real prosperity they would expect.

Several reasons may be adduced for the present shortage of berths in relation to the amount of shipping in port. In the first place the Japanese destroyer flotilla has happened to pay its visit at the very time when merchant ships are arriving in considerable number. They are occupying berths which would ordinarily be available for the usual run of shipping. It also so happens that, through one of those accidents from which no port can ever be quite free, a further couple of berths are out of commission at the moment, the mooring chain of a buoy having been broken. These are contributory causes for the time being, but the fundamental cause for congestion is that more and larger steamers are using the port, and except in one or two cases, all berths are privately owned. We see steamers between five and six hundred feet in length now coming right up into the harbour, and of course they are occupying the space which accommodated two of the type of vessels which formerly traded here. Then, as practically all the buoys and wharves are private property, the owners are naturally mainly concerned with ensuring that steamers of their own lines have the preference, and where there is any possibility of overlapping between the departure of one ship and the arrival of another, they are not prepared to let out their berths to other companies. Thus while this congestion is a fact to-day, it is none the less true that a number of berths are also unoccupied. They will, however, be occupied within a very few days by new arrivals, and between now and then there would not be sufficient time for another steamer, should it be berthed there, to discharge and load again.

In Home ports where all berths are owned and under the control of the port authority, a great deal can be done to obviate such a state of affairs. The authority is able to allot any berth it chooses to a steamer, and if necessary to have it shifted at any time to another berth when room has to be made for a new arrival. This is, of course, the ideal way of having things done, and no prospect of seeing it in Shanghai exists. A colossal sum would be required by a harbour board, if one were constituted, to acquire from the private owners the possession of their berths, and anything of the kind seems out of the question. Much, however, could be done in the way of bringing about an improvement were the necessary money available. In parts of the river where lines of mooring buoys do not yet exist they could be established, and once in being would be sufficient to cope with the requirements of the case for a considerable time to come. So far, however, the necessary funds are lacking, and in the present state of China's finances, with every department in the country begging for doles from the Customs, it is not easy to envisage any immediate relief in this respect. It must be borne in mind that the laying out of a berth is a very expensive matter, so much so that until a generous allotment of money is made for the purpose little progress can be made towards the desired betterment.

The ghastly ending is reported of the family of Chao Wen-kuang, a former Manchu officer, who had lost his income and was in desperate circumstances. Last week he prepared a poisonous mixture of 10 boxes of sulphur matches in a bowl of water and compelled his family one after another to drink, finally following them himself.

ON TAKING CARE OF THINGS

Mar. 29.

The piano tuner gave it as his unbiassed opinion that the climate in Shanghai had really less to do with deterioration of pianos than the way in which people treated them. "Take this one now", he said, laying his hand on the particular instrument which was engaging his attentions. "As good as ever it was. I know one lady with a piano of the same make but half the age, and it's already going to pieces. She puts it right on top of the radiator. When I told her she ought to move it, she said it would spoil the look of the room. What does she think it is—a piece of furniture? If people would only take a little care of their pianos, we shouldn't have the complaints we get about piano-manufacturers not making instruments like they used to do."

Such is the invariable burden of age's advice to youth—if people would only take care of things. It is the foundation of half our proverbs. A stitch in time; take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves; si jeunesse savait. And the latter part of the sentence, si vieillesse pouvait—far truer really than the first, for youth knows a great deal more than it is usually credited with—shows for how little the wisdom of our seniors counts. Even when we do take care of things, it is usually in the wrong way. What real use to us are the Crown Derby and Dresden that we put in glass cabinets, where we hardly ever look at them? Our great-grandmothers, to whom they originally belonged, used them to drink out of daily; but when breakfast or tea was finished, the same ladies put on a bib and tucker and washed all the china themselves. Plenty of beautiful things are made nowadays, but how many of them, if they are in daily use, shall we hand on to our descendants?

Yet taking care of things is the least applauded of the virtues. Of course anyone who buys an expensive piano and, having any respect for music at all, puts it where the wood will warp and the tone grow "tinny", is a lunatic. But prudence is an inhuman and rather repellant quality. In the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, if it be not actually the foolish who command our sympathy, the coldblooded carefulness of the wise puts them completely out of court. Anybody who has earned a decent income since he went to work would probably be, at forty, within sight of a competence, if he had always preferred a bus to a hansom, the pit to the stalls, and had never listened to the voice of the siren nor "looked upon the bitter when it was brown." But how exceedingly unpopular he would have been as a youth and how deservedly disliked in middle age. And there is another thought. In La Fontaine's fable, it looks as if the grasshopper, "ayant chanté tout l'été," while the ant worked, were in for a bad time when the cold weather begins. But what if the ant's savings bank breaks or her trustee skips to Guatemala? She has not even a happy summer to look back on.

The most conspicuous example of not taking care of things, it might appear, is China. The Great Wall, one of the wonders

POWERS' OBJECTION TO TRADEMARK LAW

Amazing Revelations Concerning Art. X: Loophole for Trademark Lawyers' Squeeze

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 21.

The Chinese reply to the Diplomatic Body's protest against the application of the Trademark Law without the concurrence of the Powers was received by the Doyen of the Corps on Wednesday.

The text is not yet available for publication in full, but all the diplomats have pronounced the reply as unsatisfactory, and it is known that their demands have been rejected in part. Four conditions upon which they said they would recognize the Law and Bureau were laid down by the Body. Article X, giving the Bureau the right to accept or reject an applicant for registration as the representative for a trademark was to be deleted. A foreign technical expert, it was stipulated, should be employed by the Bureau in an administrative post.

Since the concurrence of the Powers to the new law has not been received, they require that past registrations shall be cancelled and that a six months' period for registering existing marks shall begin from the date of the Powers' recognition of the law.

According to the Chinese press, the Government's reply to the Diplomatic Body was as follows:—What is meant by Article X is that manufacturers would be safeguarded against misrepresentation. A foreign technical expert may be employed later on, or as soon as the Bureau is of opinion that one is essential. Preparations have already been made by the Bureau to issue bulletins covering foreign trademarks in English. Six months' extension has already been granted by the Bureau until June and not from the date of the possible concurrence of the Powers to the measure.

The "Shuntienshipao" says that the reply is regarded as satisfactory by the Japanese Legation, which is now prepared to recognize the Bureau.

Originally the Powers' objection to Article X was that it was impertinent, inasmuch as foreign firms had a right to choose and judges their own representatives, but in view of fresh revelations made on reliable authority a much more serious view of this clause is now taken.

The fact has been established that several firms of local Chinese lawyers have applied to the Trademark Bureau for monopolistic franchises as trademark lawyers. These are offering very large sums for franchises, but want guarantees that through themselves alone can application for registration be made.

It is reported that the reply of the Bureau to this demand was in one case that while diplomatic negotiations were pending, it was impossible to give an assurance of a monopoly in writing, but that upon payment of a large fee, franchise could be issued with a verbal promise for discrimination at a later date.

To-day it is said that one legal firm has paid the price asked and received the franchise. The inference in this case is that as soon as the Powers recognize the law, the required monopoly will be given the franchise-holders, while all independent applicants will be refused under Article X. Thus they will be forced to pay big fees to monopolists.

The Diplomats have not yet met to discuss what reply they will send to the Chinese Government, but a stronger and less friendly attitude will probably be the imminent outcome of the meeting.

Scheme for Sale of Franchises Exposed but Monopoly Not Cancelled

Peking, Mar. 24.

Since the Trade Mark Bureau is aware that the scheme for selling franchises to legal firms, giving a monopoly on the right to register, is now known to the Legations and has been discussed by foreigners, all applicants for such franchises have been notified privately that no more can now be issued, but the one already sold has not been cancelled.

The following important correction is issued by Reuter:—

In the report of the Chinese Government's reply of March 20 to the Diplomatic Corps' Trade Mark Note, it was erroneously stated that an extension of the period for registration until June next year had been agreed to.

The extension is only until June, 1924.—Reuter.

CHANG TSO-LIN AND HIS ARMY

No Thought of Restoring Monarchy: Self-defence Unless Compelled to Turn Out the Illegal Government in Peking

We have received the following letter from Mr. Chang Pei-feng, secretary to Marshal Chang Tso-lin (Governor-General of the Three Eastern Provinces), in, connexion with an article which appeared in these columns a short time ago. It gives a first hand statement of the views of the Mukden leader:—

To the Editor of the

"North-China Daily News."

"Sir:—Our attention has been drawn to a Shanghai Chinese press translation of an interesting article which appeared in the columns of your valuable paper and contained serious allegations to the effect that the Commander-in-Chief (Marshal Chang Tso-lin) was striving to restore a monarchy in China. These allegations are astonishing as well as astounding.

MARSHAL CHANG'S VIEWS.

"It is not difficult to outline the Commander-in-Chief's views in connexion with the present political situation in China. He does not attempt to hide the fact that he is opposed to the so-called Central Government in Peking. He is frank in his opposition to the centralization of power in a few men known as the Central Government and is open in his advocacy for the distribution of power amongst the different provinces and districts. He urges a people's government and demands that the power of government shall rest in the people and not in a few men in Peking, known as the Central Government.

"The Commander-in-Chief not only admits that a monarchy cannot by any means be restored, owing to the people's opposition, but also declares that the centralization of power must no longer exist.

WORKING FOR THE PEOPLE.

"He is doing his very utmost to work for the benefit of the people, because he realizes that their success is his success. We have decided that we shall work for the defence (protection) of our territory only and to maintain peace and order for the good of our people so that they will not have any cause for alarm. If, however, as a last resort, we are compelled to pass to the south of Shanhaikuan to kick out an illegal government we will do so, but we will return immediately afterwards to Mukden, in accordance with the wishes of the people.

"The policy of the government should, we hold, be vested in and decided by the people; and no central government can make decisions involving the whole country without the people's confirmation. Hence the Commander-in-Chief and his son (Gen. Chang Hsiao-liang) urge the distribution of power amongst the provinces and districts. This is their present aim and they will work until they attain their goal.

CHIHLI'S ILLEGAL POSITION.

"The Chihli party, in its illegal position, is carrying out a large propaganda programme against us with the hope that such attacks will cause our downfall. No one with a little common sense will believe these rumours and will not be deceived. You and your honourable paper are the leaders of public opinion in China and you are all men of common sense, but, we know, you are in a strange position and find it difficult to distinguish between right and wrong in Chinese politics, truth and untruth, and propaganda and fact.

"In view of the fact that your article gives an unfair and incorrect statement of the Commander-in-Chief's aims and aspirations we would request you to be so kind as to publish this letter in order that all may know the real aims and aspirations of the Fengtien party.

NEW LAMPS FOR OLD.

"In closing I might mention that the Commander-in-Chief has for the past two years been selecting men of the new class, with new brains and with new ideas, to work with him. These men are better educated and better fitted in all respects to those in the Chihli party, and do their work with greater efficiency.

"Where then is such an idea of the restoration of a monarchy conceivable?"

CHINESE PRESS VIEWS.

In connexion with the above letter, the Chinese press last Friday published the following report:

Marshal Chang Tso-lin, in an interview with the representatives of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, Marshal Tuan Chi-jui and Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang, stated that apart from foreign affairs, which he referred to Peking, he was not interesting himself in internal politics. He certainly would not agree to conclude peace with Chihli, but just the same he would devote all of his efforts and his entire energy for the betterment of the Three Eastern Provinces. If attacked, he would naturally resist and fight if necessary.

In an interview with President Tsao Kun's representative, Marshal Chang stated that although he (Chang) and Tsao were related to each other there must be an understanding as to what were personal and what were public affairs. Private affairs must be treated as such, and public affairs with due consideration to the public's wishes. They might congratulate each other on family happiness, but they must not talk politics.

DISMISSAL OF GEN. WANG

Peking, Mar. 18.

A mandate bearing yesterday's date was issued early this morning stating that, according to report from Gen. Sun Chuan-fang, Tuli of Fukien, Gen. Wang Yung-chuan, assistant director of military affairs of Fukien, military commissioner at Chuanchow, and chief of the 24th Mixed Brigade, had failed to prevent the soldiers under his command from disturbing the peace. Gen. Wang is consequently dismissed from his several appointments.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PIRACY ON CHINA SEAS

Question in House of Commons

London, Mar. 26.

Replying to Mrs. Hilton Philipson (Conservative) on the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Ammon, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, pointed out that vessels on the China Station were continually patrolling with the object of checking piracy, but stricter supervision of passengers at the port of departure was the only effective preventive. He understood that Mr. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, was awaiting the report of the Governor of Hongkong on the subject.—Reuter.

JAPAN'S NEW SUBMARINES

Tokio, Mar. 20.

Construction of the two submarine mine-layers, each of 1,500 tons, will be begun for the Navy before the end of next month at the Kawasaki Dockyard, according to an announcement by the dockyard officials.

Both vessels, which follow the lines of the German type of submarine, but with certain modifications, are to be completed by the middle of November.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA'S INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION

Another Up-to-Date Flour Mill in the Interior: Chihli Merchants' Venture

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsangchow, Chi., Mar. 13.

In new Tsangchow on the banks of the Grand Canal, one has to report a notable commercial venture in the erection of a flour mill, five stories high, provided with the latest American machinery, close to the grand Canal, and about 10 minutes walk from the city. The site of this towering building was formerly devoted to profitable market gardening, but since the land changed ownership, the price of adjoining property has increased 100 per cent., and the farmer is now bewailing his hasty transaction.

The capital asked for by the promoters of the concern is $200,000, of which some $150,000 is already subscribed by wealthy men of the district. I was told at a feast in the city last week that the chief shareholder is Gen. Wang Yuan-chuan (42th Division) now in Fukien, a Chihli man, whose home is in this region. There are some five similar mills in Tientsin, the first of which made huge profits, and it is thought that this local undertaking will bring fat dividends to all concerned. It is proposed to open the mill in June.

MORE BAPTISM.

Last week we had a distinguished visitor in the person of Brig. Gen. Chang Tzu-chiang, Commander of the 7th Mixed Brigade, now stationed in Tungchow. The General hails from a little village not far from the sea coast, some 50 li east of Tsangchow, but owing to his military duties it is four years since he was last in his home hsien. He is a keen Christian, as are 95 per cent. of his officers, and only a month ago 1,100 of his troops were baptized on the parade ground at Tungchow. A heavy programme of meetings had been arranged for him during his brief visit of three days, and he addressed a variety of audiences. He spoke twice to crowded gatherings of gentry, and merchants in the city, and on another occasion to the staff and pupils of the Government Middle School outside the North Gate.

The General mentioned in one of the meetings that the pay of his soldiers was 17 months in arrears, a remark which called forth the comment from a prominent citizen that the troops of any other commander would have revolted long ago and helped themselves freely to loot.

A SPRING REVIVAL.

After an unusually long winter and a cold snap in the latter half of February, the ice in the Grand Canal here broke up early last week, and by Saturday (8th), junks heavily laden with cargo for the South from Tientsin passed through. Even the unmusical shouting of the trackers toiling upstream was a welcome relief after the stagnation of 10 or 12 weeks. To us who live within 200 yards of this great and once famous water-way, linking Peking with Soochow, the resumption of traffic is always a cheerful sight, and the first indication of spring, though according to the Chinese calendar we bade farewell to winter a month or more ago.

BONES!

There appears to be a great demand for bones in Tientsin, judging by the boat loads of this unsavoury cargo which have been making their way these many days from the interior. One flotilla, with every available inch of space both above and below decks, scientifically packed with relics of slaughtered animals, was bound from Taokou in Honan, and had already been more than a week on the journey. That it is a lucrative business is proved by a sight I witnessed the other day when travelling through the ruined city of old Tsangchow, 40 li away. Several bands of lusty yokels were hard at work digging deep pits by the road side, and on a waste patch not far away. Never having met with any Chinese who are keen on archeological exploration, my curiosity was aroused, and I soon discovered that they were all after bones, this particular spot having been the site of a slaughter yard in some bygone age, when a flourishing city stood where now there is an "abomination of desolation."

The only feature in the landscape is the very striking "Lion of old Tsangchow," a massive cast iron beast which has weathered the storms of centuries. No one among the scholars of the district is able to give an explanation of the origin of this extraordinary animal. Rather it is a matter for surprise and suspicion that a foreigner should trouble himself to make inquiries about such a useless inheritance from the distant past. One or two worthies have referred me to the well known topographial work which is supposed to deal with antiquities, in every province and hsien but this musty tome only devotes two lines of tantalizing brevity to our local "lion."

The wide area enclosed by the crumbling walls of the original city of Tsangchow would doubtless yield many objects of surpassing interest to antiquarians, but the probability is that such an enterprise would encounter every kind of obstacle, raised by the ignorant and superstitious villagers.

UNDER A RETREATING GENERAL'S HEEL

Miseries of Fukien: Pillaged and Oppressed by Sun Chuan-fang's Troops

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kienning, Fu., Mar. 15.

Again the whole district is being terrorized by barbarian hordes. Sun Chuan-fang's soldiers after being hurried to the Kiangsi and Chêkiang borders, for reasons few have fathomed, are now being rushed back to Yenping because Gen. Wong seems to have turned traitor again. A battle has been fought and Gen. Sun's men have captured much ammunition, etc.

For 10 days the whole district has been in panic, everywhere men have been seized to carry loads, and pillage and extortion has been the order of the day!

At Kienyang three men were murdered by the soldiers in cold blood, because they did not obey immediately some tyrannical order. Here a man was beaten to death because he could not carry the load these monsters had put upon him. I passed a boat on the river from which the soldiers had just stolen five bags of flour, six tins of oil, and a bag of sugar. All travelling except for foreigners is held up, and trade at a standstill, while these military leaders gamble with their country!

Many of these coolies captured at a moment's notice never return to their homes, many die on the road, of cold and starvation. Cannot the Peking Government do anything to save their country's honour? No other people in the world would tolerate all this excruciating suffering, which is not doing a whit to help the country; a reckoning day must come.

The soldiers themselves are for the most part in an awful plight. A man dying of consumption was hurried out of the hospital to leave with his regiment.

CHINESE MARCONI LOAN

The Arrears of Interest

London, Mar. 26.

In the House of Commons today, Mr. E. C. Harmsworth (Conservative) drew attention to the fact that British holders of the Chinese Marconi Loan had not received interest since August, 1921, and suggested that pressure be brought to bear upon the Chincse Government in that connexion.

Mr. Ponsonby, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied that the default had been the subject of repeated representations to China.—Reuter.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

PEKING CABINET AND SOVIET OFFERS

C. T. Wang Obstructed in His Negotiations with Karakhan by Waichiaopu's Demands for Cancellation of All Treaties and Return of Mongolia

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, Mar. 18.

It has been assumed here for some days that Mr. C. T. Wang's efforts to bring his negotiations with Mr. Karakhan to a satisfactory conclusion were being strenuously opposed by other branches of the Peking Government and that the Foreign Office was largely responsible for the difficulties thrown in the way of an endorsement of the Wang-Karakhan preliminary agreement by the President and the Cabinet.

The following news agency statement, which is translated from one Chinese paper but which appears in identically the same language in all but the pro Soviet organs, throws much light upon Mr. C. T. Wang's difficulties and is generally believed to represent the Foreign Office attitude as opposed to the Sino-Russian Commission's attitude. The "high diplomatic official" in question is is of course supposed to be Dr. Wellington Koo.

AGENCY AND OFFICIAL.

According to information received by the "Hsin Wen Pien Yi She" News Agency, the Chinese Government has not been able to secure the acceptance by the Soviet Government of three conditions necessary for the recognition of the Soviet Government by the Chinese Government. On this account the negotiations have not, up to the present time, been concluded. Yesterday a representative of this Agency called upon a certain important diplomatic official and obtained from him an unofficial announcement. This announcement is of the greatest importance in connexion with Chinese-Russian relations and it is therefore set down as follows:—

The high diplomatic official in question said that since the Chinese-Russian negotiations had not been brought to a successful conclusion there had arisen a report that the President's Office and the Cabinet were seeking to evade their responsibility and that there was discord between two of the official organs of the Government. This report is concerned with subjects entirely apart from the main question and must emanate from persons not conversant with the real features of the case. The Government in no way seeks to evade its responsibility, but on the contrary is exerting itself to the utmost and assuming its full responsibility in order that these negotiations may be concluded at the earliest moment. The Government, however, does not desire to take any action which, by a too precipitated manifestation of its good will toward Russia through the recognition of the Soviet Government, may in the end react unfavourably on the friendly relations between the two nations. Nor does it desire to make use of the present question of recognition to extort any unwarranted advantages. Therefore the Government wishes to adopt a moderate policy which, after recognition has been effected, may in reality tend to a clearer mutual understanding between the two countries and closer friendship. Considering that the recognition of the Soviet Government by the Chinese Government constitutes the laying of a foundation for the future relationships between the two countries the Government considers that it is imperatively necessary that all the old wrongs arising from infringements of the sovereign rights of China should be rectified in order that the foundation having been made thus firm, and Russia having clasped hands further misunderstandings shall not arise.

THE THREE ESSENTIALS.

On this account the Government considers that there are three points involved in the understanding arrived at by the Chinese delegate, Dr. C. T. Wang, that from first to last require the most constant attention. These subjects are:

(1) that the inequitable treaties of former times between China and Russia should be totally abrogated.

(2) that the treaties between Russia and Outer Mongolia should all likewise be cancelled,

(3) that the Russian troops should be withdrawn from Outer Mongolia at a given time and without conditions.

Although Dr. C. T. Wang discussed these questions fully with the depresentative of the Soviet Government the latter has not, even yet, indicated his acceptance of the conditions.

For instance, in relation to the first demand (the one for the abrogation of former treaties) it is simply provided that these treaties may be abrogated in the course of future conferences. In respect to the second condition above noted it is merely provided that if the Imperial Government of Russia in times past concluded any treaties with third parties in violation of the sovereignty of China, such treaties shall be abrogated. It is obvious that the Soviet Government is unwilling to cancel any understandings it may itself have come to with Outer Mongolia. In regard to No. 3, the withdrawal of Russian troops from Outer Mongolia is still linked with conditions.

TERRITORIAL SOVEREIGNTY.

These three subjects are of the greatest importance to the territorial sovereignty of our country. Condition No. 1, in agreeing to an abrogation of old treaties during the course of future conferences, cannot be considered a dependable assurance. It must be noted in reference to condition No. 2 that the treaty between the Soviet Government and Outer Mongolia recognizes the latter as an independent country. That Outer Mongolia has a Minister resident in Russia is an actual fact known to the world. The Kiachta Convention concluded by the old Russian Government recognized Outer Mongolia as a portion of the territory of China. The recognition of Outer Mongolia by the Soviet Government as an independent country is something that from the standpoint of our national sovereignty we cannot tacitly recognize. The Russian representative protests against the open repudiation of the treaty between the Soviet Government and Outer Mongolia on the ground that it would be "selling one's friend" (thus acknowledging Outer Mongolia as Russia's friend). Outer Mongolia being an integral part of the territory of China, may be regarded in the light of a son or younger brother in a family, and if Russia is unwilling to "sell a friend" can it be said that China would be willing to sell a son or younger brother? Although it may be professed that there exists no intention to execute the terms of the treaty in question, China is unable to leave the question in a state of uncertainty as a source of future complications.

THE WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS.

The withdrawal of Russian troops from Outer Mongolia is a manifest duty on the part of Russia. The stationing of Russian troops in Outer Mongolia is illegal and China has a manifest right to demand their withdrawal. It should be recalled that at the Washington Conference when the subject of the withdrawal of foreign troops from China was raised, it was expressly recognized that the troops stationed along the Peking-Mukden Railway from Peking to the sea were there by virtue of a treaty arrangement and that their withdrawal should on this account be deferred, while troops in the localities ought to be withdrawn. When it was proposed at the Washington Conference that the countries concerned should first send representatives to report in regard to the withdrawal of troops, the Chinese Government opposed this measure. The reason behind China's protest was that where foreign troops have been stationed in China without the sanction of treaty their withdrawal by the Governments concerned is a simple duty devolving upon those Governments. The question of the Russian troops in Mongolia is an exactly similar question. Although it may be necessary in conducting the actual withdrawal of the Russian troops to arrive at a mutual understanding, a statement of principles cannot be allowed to include any conditions for the withdrawal.

The three conditions in question cannot possibly be regarded as additional demands presented by China. All Chinese, official and unofficial, heartily welcome the repeated announcements issued by the Russian Government. On this account China has shown a desire to compromise in regard to all other subjects in the earnest hope of an early conclusion of the negotiations. But with reference to the three conditions discussed above if the desire is to place the new relations between China and Russia on a firm basis it is essential to eliminate all the wrongs embodied in the former treaties. If this were not to be done it would be as though two friends had shaken hands and, sitting down to discuss matters of mutual concern, illimitable complications should arise between them. Can this be considered a course actuated by a desire to plan for future closer relations?

RESPONSIBILITY NOT CHINA'S.

The responsibility, therefore, for the deferred settlement of these questions cannot be laid at China's door. Therefore, the communication received from Representative Karakhan yesterday demanding a reply within three days cannot be considered consistent with a hearty desire for friendship with China.

Italy has but now recognized the Soviet Government, the treaty effecting this recognition having been laid aside for some months, but we have not heard that the Soviet Government on this account at any time presented a demand to the Italian Government that recognition should be effected within three days. What then is the justification for the sudden adoption of this attitude in regard to China?

In a word, therefore, the determined insistence by China upon the three conditions in question can in no sense be regarded as being without reasonable ground, nor can it be regarded as the utilization of the question of recognition as a means of exerting improper pressure by China upon Russia. The situation may be epitomized in a word—at this time when the two countries are laying their plans for future friendship the rectification of all those instances in which China's sovereignty has been impaired is self-evidently proper and necessary.

DR. WANG'S RESIGNATION.

At this point our representative inquired of the high diplomatic official in regard to the position taken by Delegate Dr C. T. Wang and particularly with reference to the report that the latter had handed in his resignation.

The diplomatic official replied that the results of Dr. Wang's repeated negotiations and the draft undertaking he had concluded were being reported for discussion and that difficulties were unavoidable. Dr. Wang, however, was especially deputed as the representative of the Chinese Government and, if the Government had any additional views on the subject of the negotiations, Dr. Wang was entirely in a position to present these to the Russian representative, thus continuing the negotiations. There was nothing in the report of Dr. Wang's resignation. Dr. Wang as delegate had been working arduously in his mission for a year and had reached the point where it was within a very little of fulfilment. His views and those of the Government were not dissimilar and the latter would be most unwilling to have him resign. The numerous misapprehensions on the part of the public bear no relation to the actual facts of the case. The Government naturally had its responsibilities in respect to foreign nations in relation to those matters affecting the sovereignty of the nation, and these responsibilities it could in no way ignore.

SENDING HOME THE REFUGEES

Dr. Greig's Difficulties in Harbin: Politics Hindering Work of Committee

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Mar. 13.

The outcome of the visit of Dr. Greig, the League of Nations delegate, concerning the Russian refugee question has been the forming of a local international committee which includes representatives of Great Britain, America, France, Japan and China, who will collect all necessary information required.

Though Dr. Greig is most impartial in his views, favouring neither Whites nor Reds, whether the committee will be equally impartial has still to be proved. It is stated that one or two of the members have been on very friendly relations with White organizations in Harbin and perhaps will not be impartial. If this is so the result would be that only refugees who wish to emigrate to foreign lands would be found, even if many of the latter were scarcely desirable aliens.

That there will be no co-operation on the part of the Soviet authorities unless Russia is admitted to the League of Nations or unless Dr. Nansen and the Geneva Advisory Committee come to some understanding with Moscow, is pretty certain, for the attitude taken by the local Soviet authorities is that the Russian refugee question is a "home matter," not one for outside interference.

As has already been stated the Soviet authorities mean to start an organization of their own to take up this question with the Chinese authorities; thus we shall find the Chinese authorities will have to deal with two distinct bodies, which will have nothing in common with each other. The consequences mean a good deal of friction which will handicap the solving of this important question.

AMERICAN GUNBOATS IN CHINA AND THEIR INEFFICIENCY

Consternation in Local Community on Budget Estimate Being Reduced from Six to Two: American Intersts Jeopardized

Peking, Mar. 19.

Unofficial information has been received in Peking to the effect that the naval estimates presented by the Navy Department of the United States for construction during the fiscal year beginning on July 1, which included the construction of six river gunboats for use in China waters, have been reduced by the Budget Committee, with the result that only three river gunboats are approved for operation on the rivers in China.

This intelligence has created something like consternation amongst Americans in China, as it has long been recognized that the American naval smallcraft have been unable to perform the duties for which they were assigned. The six river gunboats set down in the estimates were considered the minimum requirement and it is further pointed out that these were replacements, not additions, as most of the American small craft in China waters are of obsolete type and ineffective.

A TYPICAL CASE.

In support of American opinion in China as to American naval requirements here, may be mentioned the particular experience of the American Presbyterian Mission at Shecklung in Kuangtung. In December last this Mission was invaded by bandits who kidnapped a number of students. Protest was made by the American consular authorities to the Canton Government and a request was made that steps should be taken to effect the rescue of the students and accord protection to the Missionaries. Nothing tangible resulted, but on February 12 the bandits returned to the mission with one of their captives, whom they placed against a wall at the entrance and shot and killed him, afterwards leaving a notice threatening to burn the mission if arrangements were not made within five days to ransom the captured students. The American-Consul-General, on receipt of intelligence of this additional outrage, again took the matter vigorously up with Dr. C. C. Wu, Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Canton Administration, and the Canton Government undertook to detail troops to protect the mission.

BRITISH AID INVOKED.

This apparently was not regarded as satisfactory, for as the result of an understanding between the American and British Consuls H. M. S. Robin was sent up the East River on February 18 because no American vessel on the South China Station was able to proceed to Sheklung.

The foregoing incidents illustrate the need for river gunboats in China to protect American residents, and give point to the arguments in favour of a minimum of six river gunboats.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BANDIT SUPPRESSION IN SHANTUNG

Undoubtedly Good Work Done by Police Patrols in Railway Area

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 19.

I have just completed a round trip between here and Tsinan for the purpose of investigating the bandit situation in the former leased territory and can safely state that except for certain small, free-lance gangs operating in villages not patrolled by the police, bandits in the territory are conspicuous for their absence. Under the present system of railway police patrol along the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway, and of armed guards in the trains themselves, there can never be a duplication of the Lincheng outrage anywhere between Tsingtao and Tsinan. Farmers along the line are all smiles over this absence of bandits although from time to time they have cause for complaining against the officiousness of the soldiers, but inasmuch as everyone acknowledges the fact that the soldier is as much of a human being as the rest of mankind and, therefore, cannot be expected to carry on for no remuneration indefinitely, and must of necessity raise money somehow, their demands for food and fuel for nothing, made from time to time, have been accepted with good grace. Between the soldiers and the bandits the farmers undoubtedly prefer the former for the reason that they usually keep their demands within a limit whereas the latter used to swoop down as sudden as a whirlwind, kidnapping, pillaging and, not infrequently, committing wanton killing.

TRAVELLERS REASSURED.

This absence of bandits along the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway ought to set at rest the fear so far entertained by would-be travellers over the Kiao-Tsi Railway. During the return trip from Tsinan I had the good fortune of having for a fellow-traveller the representative of a great American tobacco corporation. He has traversed extensively along the line and has even penetrated out of the way hamlets but has never come across any gang of bandits.

All this is received with glee by local hotel men for last summer a large number of people were kept away from Tsingtao through the bandit scare. It is felt that if residents in the outports were assured that Tsingtao and the districts for miles around are immune from depredations, there would be an influx of vacationists this coming summer.

So long as the Railway Police maintain their efforts in keeping the bandits off the railway zone, so long will Tsingtao be immune from a bandit invasion.

Up till recently, the bandit menace has been greatly exaggerated. In Tsingtao it has been reported that bandits were prowling about the railway zone and in connivance with the soldiery. On the other hand, Tsinan residents have heard that the hills around Tsingtao were being used by bandits for their headquarters. Both reports have been conclusively proven to be untrue. Many Tsingtao residents have walked all over the hills but have never come across a single cut-throat or, for that matter, a bag-snatcher.

THE CHOUTSUN SCARE.

All this shows how events and news are apt to be exaggerated here. No wonder, therefore, that by the time the report of the Chaotsun fire reached Tsingtao, it had assumed a sensational proportion. The report which I submitted to you was retouched from a report submitted to me by an employee of the Railway. I accepted it in good faith, as did Reuter's correspondent accept a similar report handed to him by another source. I have since forwarded you the original report from which you will see I have invented nothing. In other words, I have been more sinned against than sinning.

CHENGTU UNDER NORTHERN RULE

A Change for the Better: Disappearance of Robbers, Paper Money and Disorder

From Our Own Correspondent.

Chêngtu Sze., Mar. 1.

After the taking of Chêngtu by Yang Sen's victorious troops, what next? The question at first was not easy to answer because it was known that Yang Sen, Liu Hsiang, and Yuan Tsu-ming with their allied forces had among them about 20,000 troops in which were included several reputed robber bands who had attached themselves in order to wreak vengeance on Hsiong Keh-wu. Yang Sen could not be blamed for using all the troops he could find that would fight and assist him in obtaining his great objective, but the real question was what to do with them after the Capital was taken, and all were clamouring for the rewards of victory. The situation was rendered serious by a portion of the attacking force belonging to the Kuiechow force scaling the walls immediately Liu Yu-chiu's troops were withdrawn. These men looted for part of one night previous to Yang Sen marching in. All questions were soon settled by the prompt action of Gen. Yang. He instructed the Chen Feng Si-ling to take vigorous action, with the result that martial law was at once proclaimed, the looters captured, and in many cases beheaded on the spot. In two days 120 men were executed.

The street in front of the Chen Feng looked like a shambles. The heads were hung by the ears on handy telephone poles with an account of the crime on red paper pasted over it. It had the desired effect. Law and order were restored immediately. Then there seemed to be some conflict between the leaders themsleves as evidenced by six men being appointed for a magistracy and four men being appointed Director of the Mint. This was soon taken in hand, and Generals were appointed as robber-clearing directors, and sent out in all directions after the enemy, who in many cases were keeping within striking distance of the Capital. Gen Yuan Tsu-ming took the road towards Kuiechow. Liu Hsiang went north. Chen Kue-tang and Den Chi-heo went east.

Very soon the city was cleared of superfluous troops, and Yang Sen remained to organize the city defences with his redoubtable Second Army. The military and civil offices were soon filled, and the new officers began to function with an alacrity and dispatch not seen for many moons in Chêngtu.

THE REFORMERS.

The new Chief of Police, Wu Kai-ruh soon found the police force was a negligible quantity, below strength and unreliable. They were protecting opium dealers and gambling everywhere, and fattening off the proceeds. Of course the extenuating circumstances were that they were never paid and had to make a living somehow.

Chief Wu quickly disbanded the lot and set about reorganization. He opened a police school and very soon had a bright lot of recruits who were keen to learn the real duties of the job, and already the city shows the difference. Yang Sen is noted for his reform measures and they were soon noticeable in Chêngtu. Streets are being cleaned, opium dens closed, gambling is on the decrease.

Last week a "Good Roads" meeting was held attended by Yang Sen, the Chief of Police and other reformers. Paul King, a representative of Dr. Wang Chen-ting and the National Good Roads Association, was present and a branch organization started for Szechuan. The organization is already well under way. The Kuanhsien road will be completed, then plans made to finance and construct the Big Road to Chungking.

This week three days have been given over to celebrating Yang Sen's birthday. Great crowds came out and the city presented a gala appearnce. The Y.M.C.A. also put on a four days entertainment that was well patronized. The people seem glad again to have the opportunity to enjoy life. The paper money of Hsiong Keh-wu has gone with him. Many have lost heavily but the future looks brighter and they do not complain. Yang Sen has promised a bigger spring fair than ever. This will soon be on and run for 40 days. Hsiong and his crowd have retreated to the Kuichow border.

OO-HOO WUHU!

Ceaseless Excitements of the Queen of the Yangtze

From a Correspondent.

Of recent years Wuhu has played but little part in the history of the world. The foundation of the "Weary Workmen's Home of Rest," the opening of a feather-cleaning factory, the battle between the Academy Wanderers and the Ya Hong Hotspurs, which ended in a tie through the referee disappearing in the middle of the second half and eventually being discovered with a pained expression on his face at the Club bar, the universal excitement when Mr. Spott, the popular Steward of the golf-course, did the long 5th (348 yards) in five by sinking a fortunate mashie-shot, all these events and many others have been allowed to pass unrecorded.

Perhaps a short description of some of the outstanding features of life in Wuhu will not be taken amiss and may serve to show that thought it dare not compete in social activities with such busy centres of commerce as Ningpo, yet Wuhu must not be forgotten altogether by those who are so unfortunate as to reside in other parts of China.

SPORTS.

As usual, Association football has roused most enthusiasm during the winter. The Wuhu team, under the talented leadership of Mr. Poynton-Schmidt, is to be congratulated on an unusually successful season and its record of not having sustained a single defeat throughout the interport matches can be regarded with the utmost satisfaction. It is rumoured that the Sports Club has paid half a case of Five Star Beer to the Recreation Club for the services of Abe Stilton next autumn.

Many pleasant week-ends have been spent on the golf-course and it is a tonic for shattered nerves to see the brave display of crimson jumpers and canary cardigans on any fine Sunday. The course is now looking its best, and, owing to ingenious hazards on almost every green, is not so easy as one might think; indeed, the niblick is the accepted club for any distance up to 10 feet from the pin. Among the many players of note mention must be made of Mr. Irving Dublin who is showing promising style; but he must get out of the common mistake of looking at his back trouser-buttons when on the point of hitting the ball.

GENERAL.

It may not be out of place to say a few words here in correction of a popular belief that finds expression in almost every guide-book; Wuhu is described as "the granary of Central China" and any casual reader might be led to imagine that the place is chiefly famous for its rice; whether or not there is any rice here, this article does not pretend to be able to say, but as any old resident will tell you, Wuhu's chief claims to fame are its pigs and dirt.

The aspect of the surrounding country is spoiled by a hill, or perhaps two, which prevent it from being a perfectly flat plain as far as the eye can see; it would otherwise afford a singularly pleasing view for sea-sick river-boat passengers on a misty day. This defect of nature is fortunately remedied by two or three architectural triumphs which have been erected in such a cunning way that they distract attention from the rising ground.

SOCIAL.

The entire community is saddened at the rapidly approaching departure of one of its most prominent residents, Mr. Joe Kumble, who is going on home leave in a few days' time. For his skill with the hockey-stick and spillikin-hook, for his prompt attention to business in office and club alike, for his pleasant manner and his genial smile, Mr. Kumble is well-known throughout the Yangtze ports; but to those who have known him more intimately, he has endeared himself as much for his untiring efforts on behalf of the various homes of rest as for his admirable qualities as host and companion. It is not so generally known that Mr. Kumble is an excellent lay-preacher. We all wish him a very pleasant holiday and hope that he will return before long to carry on the good work he has started.

WEATHER.

There is nothing printable to be recorded under this heading.

GOLD-MINING ON THE AMUR

American Prospector's Concession from the Bolsheviks: Stringent Conditions

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Mar. 15.

It is generally known that the Amur district is very rich in gold but that thanks to the Russian revolution this industry had suffered considerably and operations are made only on a very small scale and principally by illegitimate means. On the establishment of the Far Eastern Republic, several foreigners interested in gold-mining proceeded to Chita with the object of obtaining concessions from the government authorities. Among these were Mr. James Vint, an American mining man with 20 years experience on the Alaska goldfields, who was successful in getting a concession situated near the Semitack river, a tributary of the Amur. The agreement obtained by Mr. Vint from the Far Eastern Republic, which ceased to exist after Vladivostok was taken by the Red Army, has now been ratified by the Council of People's Commissars at Moscow. The concession is for 20 years and the concessionaire is bound to place on the concession as many dredgers as may be required for the normal working, the placer mines to be fully equipped by him not later than June, 1925.

The working programme provides that a quantity of not more than 7,500 sagines of auriferous sand shall be worked each season. The concessionaire will pay a certain rental for each decatine of land besides a share of the gold extracted, the Government reserving for itself the exclusive right to purchase the whole output of the mine. The methods of miners and employees by the concessionaire as well as their maintenance, supply of food and other commodities, medical attendance and in general all relations between employer and employed shall be regulated by existing law and government decrees which may be issued in the future and also by contracts to be closed between the concessionaire and the various professional Unions.

The concessionaire must submit to the government drawings of the dredgers to be set up, specifications of required additional equipment, lists and plans of the mines and all technical descriptions. The concessionaire as a guarantee of good faith and for fulfilment of contracted obligation shall deposit with the Government immovable property of the value of Gold roubles 35,000. Any dispute that may arise between the concessionaire and the Government shall be referred to the law courts for decision. The actual term of the concession is 25 years after which it is be turned over in toto to the Government without any compensation to the concessionaire.

Miss Mary Robina Stevens, who was called to the Bar at Gray's Inn on January 28, appeared in Mr. Justice Eve's court on February 1 on a motion for the appointment of a receiver and manager. This was the first instance of a woman barrister appearing in the Chancery Division. Gray's Inn has three ladies on its roll of counsel.

MANCHURIA'S TRADE WITH THE AMUR

The Absolute Necessity of Opening up the River Traffic and Removing Impossible Regulations

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Mar. 15.

What are the prospects of Harbin being able to trade with the Amur as soon as navigation reopens this year? This is a vital question for Harbin business circles as well as for steamship owners on the Sungari. What is going to become of the Sungari tonnage during the coming season if the routes to Blagovestchensk, Habarovsk and Nikolaievsk-on-Amur remain so firmly barred as they have been during the past few years.

The export of soya beans viâ Nikolaievsk attracts first of all one's attention. The first experiments in this direction were made by the Amur Steamship & Trading Co. as long ago as 1910 when some 750,000 pouds of beans from various river places on the Sungari were exported. After the first experiment the riverine export of beans showed, year by year, a constant increase, amounting in 1914 to 2,100,000 pouds notwithstanding the fact that special competing freight rates were introduced by the Chinese Eastern Railway, who by their own steamers brought beans from the lower Sungari, transhipping them by cars at Harbin and quoting inclusive water and rail freights to Dairen. From 1914, owing to the World War followed by the Russian revolution, there was a sudden decrease in exports of beans.

Last year a new exports movement was initiated by the Russian Government Amur Fleet, but unfortunately in the very height of the navigation season it had a sudden stab owing to the Russo-Chinese conflict at Aigun.

The Russian revolution has driven many riverine craft from the Amur to the Sungari, and the total amount of tonnage of the latter is stated to be 587,600 pouds for steamers and 2,795,000 for barges. The estimated amount of cargo available for the coming season is 15,000,000 pouds. Last year with the exception of the C. E. R. steamers and the fleet owned by Soskin & Co. all steamer owners suffered severe losses and many vessels remained idle the whole of the season. The Chinese company Su-tung which owns the largest fleet on the Sungari was hit harder than any other concern and was forced to rent out some 10 of its steamers at an absurdly low figure, finding only work for four of its fleet which were engaged in carrying firewood from the lower reaches of the Sungari to Harbin at cut freight rates. It is imperative that if commercial relations are to be restored with the Amur district and if the resumption of the natural export route for cereals viâ Nikolaievsk is to take place this year, the Chinese authorities should excercise the required initiative, without further delay, otherwise the coming navigation season may hurt Harbin commercial circles even more heavily that they were hurt last year.

THE SMUNGLING BOOM.

Though the Chinese merchants living on the Chinese bank of the Amur during the height of navigation were at variance with the Soviet Government owing to high taxation introduced by the latter, and the Russian Amur districts were actually boycotted by the Chinese, thanks to the activities of smugglers large quantities of goods both entered and left Russian territory. The high cost of commodities sold by the Soviet commercial departments and the cooperative societies drove the Russian population into the hands of the smugglers. This was soon realized by the Chinese merchants who, after starting the boycott and having strict supervision against selling goods to smugglers, saw that their policy was actually playing into the hands of the Soviet Government who were able to expand the activities of their own stores as the Russian people had no other source from which to obtain necessities.

The Chinese tactics underwent a sudden change and smugglers was actually encouraged and facilitated in every direction. Chinese merchants extended considerable credit to smugglers and goods were given on consignment, the illegal trade soon deluging the Amur districts. Tea, sugar, printed calico and all sorts of other dry goods were smuggled into Russian territory and sold at 50 per cent. less than was being charged by co-operative stores. The smugglers united themselves into several organizations, keeping careful watch over the movement of the Russian frontier guard, and carried on their operations at a minimum risk, not more than 5 per cent. of the smuggled goods falling into the grip of the Customs guard. Contraband trade moved from the right to the left bank of the Amur and vice-versa. From Russian territory were smuggled grain and live stock into China, especially horses. The number of horses on Russian farms is said to have been reduced to 50 per cent. of the stock held up to the time of the introducing of the new farm tax in Russia. As only 60 per cent. of the estimated tax was collected in order to cover the remainder of the tax live stock and grain had to be sold.

TRAFFIC WITH MONGOLIA.

The Soviet Government have decided to establish direct traffic with Mongolia and link up connexions between that country with points in the Russian Far East. For this special purpose the Amur River Government Transport together with the Chita Railway is about to open an Agency at Urga, and will accept cargo for direct river and railway transportation at exceptional freight rates. Cargo is to be accepted at Urga for Vladivistok as well as at different points along the Selenga River, which links up Mongolia with Verkhne-Oudinsk. It will be carried from here to Stretinsk by rail and then by the riverine route to Habarovsk and thence by rail again to Vladivostok, or even to Nikolaievsk should shippers require it. This government transport concern will likewise arrange for transfer of cargo to ocean steamers at shippers' request and will accept cargo for Russia and even to Europe. One of the most important features of this scheme is the full responsibility for delivery and safety of the cargo taken over by the above-mentioned Transport Company.

SHANTUNG MINE FLOODED

Eighty Lives Lost

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 19.

A section of the Lutai Mining Company's mine at Fang-tze was flooded on Monday as a result of which 80 lives were lost. Every possible effort was made to effect the rescue of the unfortunate people but to no avail. It seems that the miners in the section affected dug into another section which has previously been flooded and that the terrible inrush of water overwhelmed them and made escape impossible.

KORNILOFF'S APPEAL

Lodged in Tribunal of Last Resort

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Mar. 13.

The Korniloff appeal to the Senate at Peking has been forwarded by the accused's lawyer, Mr. A. A. Widder, from Peking.

The condemned man's sister is on her way out from Moscow en route for Peking, where she will personally intercede on her brother's behalf, bringing with her important documents bearing on the case from the Soviet Government.

SEQUEL TO DAUGHTER IN-LAW'S SUICIDE

Whole Family Bambooed: "Mutually Responsible" as Under Old Laws

From a Correspondent.

Chowkiakow, Ho., Mar. 14.

The other day a young wife committed suicide. A common enough occurrence in China, but somehow the district official got word of it.

The father and mother-in-law, the uncle, the four neighbours, and, of course, the local constable were all brought to court.

The neighbours were severely beaten for not interfering on behalf of the young woman, whose body was bruised all over by the harsh treatment that had forced her to take her life. Her uncle pleaded that he lived in an adjoining yard and should not be involved, but the magistrate would have it that he must have heard cries of the victim and ought to have taken her part, so the uncle was punished. Both the father and mother-in-law were bambooed. They were asked why their sons and daughters did not commit suicide.

The constable lived in a village two miles away, but he must have known of such cruel people, and should have reported the affair. For not doing so he had 1,000 blows, was dismissed from his post, and put in prison. Such official action is so uncommon, that the gossip of the town ran that the magistrate must have had some family history of painful memory thus to make him so hard on the offenders.

"When the old plaster comes off the wall it is replaced by new" is a common saying. New wives can take the place of the family drudge. And it is astonishing how even notoriously cruel people negotiate new victims without much difficulty if possessed of money.

On the very evening of the day on which the above case was dealt with, a mother-in-law either ignorant of what had happened, or too mad to be restrained, was starting to beat her hapless young daughter-in-law when her neighbours at once interfered, fearing they would be involved if trouble resulted.

GHASTLY CRIME NEAR SHAOSHING

Bandits' Unparalelled Cruelty

From Our Own Correspondent.

Shaoshing, Chê., Mar. 14.

A shocking bandit outrage took place near here yesterday, resulting in the murder of two women, a baby boy, and an adult male.

About 40 bandits descended upon a village within 20 li of Shaoshing, on the main canal to Mosan.

The first victim was a man who opened the door of the house attached! He was shot by the brigand who crossed the threshold. Inside the house, a woman was next fatally shot. Efforts were them made to secure the young son of the family. His poor mother, who was a graduate of the Baptist Girls' Boarding School and a woman of noble character, made frantic efforts to save her offspring. She was first of all struck in the face and cruelly beaten. Finally, with wanton cruelty, the bandits fired at her. The first bullet struck her in the hand and the second in the stomach.

Still conscious, she saw the bandits carry away her boy, aged five, together with a youth of 19.

Another baby boy was taken from its mother's breast. When they got outside, however, the bandits decided that such a mite would not be worth much in the way of ransom, so threw the child into the canal. Its dead body was picked up later.

The unfortunate mother who had been shot through the abdomen was taken to a Christian hospital. It was found possible to remove the bullet in the early hours of the following morning, but the shock proved to be too much for her and she died the same afternoon.

These bandits came from Chenghsien, the district which furnished the horde whose raid was reported by me on March 4.

SHANTUNG BEEF

Exporters to Japan Alarmed at Increased Railway Charges

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, March 19.

The Kiao Tsi Railway is considering an increase in the transportation rate for cattle of one dollar a head. The beef dealers are, consequently, much perturbed. Beef from Harbin viâ Vladivostok has recently been imported into Japan and in order to encourage the business, the Osaka Shosen Kaisha recently placed the Kagi Maru on the run between Japan and Vladivostok in place of the Hozan Maru, the former having refrigeration facilities and the latter none. It is felt that, should the Kiao-Tsi Railway eventually carry out its project to raise the transportation rate on cattle, the beef trade between Harbin and Japan will flourish at the expense of the Shantung business.

The Railway Administration on the other hand belittles the idea that the increase of merely a dollar a head would affect the business in Shantung beef. The Administration contends that the old rate has been much too low.

HONGKONG MILITARY LANDS

Award Accepted: The Best of a Bad Bargain

"I can only say, gentlemen, that after spending a considerable time in dealing with this matter and after writing many despatches, which I should like to produce to this Council but am unable to do so, but in which I can assure you I have placed the Colony's point of view somewhat forcibly before His Majesty's Government—I say that after considering all these things, I am strongly of opinion the bargain is one the Colony should accept, and I think in the future it will be very pleased to reflect that it has taken this opportunity of removing an obstacle to progress."

These were the concluding words of the speech of the Governor (Sir Edward Stubbs, K.C.M.G.) delivered in reply to the criticisms of the unofficial members in the Legislative Council on the resumed debate on the resolution approving the acceptance of Sir John Oakley's award in respect of the military lands of the Colony.

The unofficial members severely criticized the figures of the award, which they regarded as unwarrantably high, and assented to the resolution under protest.

HUPEH GOVERNOR'S BIRTHDAY

Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan Feted at Wuchang

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang,, Mar. 20.

The city is en fête to-day, to celebrate the 50th birth-day of the Military Governor of Hupeh, Gen. Hsiao Yao-nan.

The Governor himself has protested that, in the present unsettled condition of China, this is no time for excessive congratulations or extravagant entertaining. Nevertheless, a good deal is being made of the occasion.

During the past few days, presents have been pouring in from the leading merchant guilds, schools, and other organizations. Last night a big feast was given at the Yamên to a number of officials and leading citizens of from a distance with congratulatory messages from other provinces will be feasted royally.

HONGKONG CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Anti-Piracy Measures: Need for Naval Patrols: Storm Signal Service

Hongkong, Mar. 24.

At the annual meeting of the Hongkong General Chamber of Commerce to day, comenting on the proposed anti-piracy meaures, the Chairman said that the first essential was an adequate number of Naval patrols which would make attacks more hazardous and thereby act as a deterrent.

Referring to the storm signal service, the Chairman urged very close co-operation between Hongkong and Siccawei. He said that months had gone by and nothing seemed to have been done.

Mr. W. S. Bailey, speaking on piracy, remarked; "It is with feelings almost of shame that we must admit, in spite of the undoubted efforts of our authorities, our failure to bring to justice any of the perpetrators of these murders and robberies or to safeguard the lives of the captains, officers and crews of vessels trading in our watera."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OPIUM SUPPRESSION IN CHINA

Anti-Opium Association's Views on Control and Cure of Addicts

Peking, Mar. 22.

The International Anti-Opium Association has handed the following to Reuter:—

As frequent reference has been made recently in Chinese newspapers concerning the recommendations sent by the International Anti-Opium Association to the Opium Suppression Board, it is evident that the information has reached the press through channels other than our own and some statements are not quite clear. The facts are as follows:—At a recent conference of the Opium Suppression Board the General Secretary of the International Anti-Opium Association was courteously invited to express the views of the Association and to offer any advice on the question of control. The General Secretary spoke to the Board for over an hour and gave a résumé of opium conditions as revealed by over 100 foreign reports from various provinces. After discussion with the Board on the Articles already drawn up by them for the purpose of opium suppression, only two suggestions were offered by the International Anti-Opium Association to supplement these, namely: 1. The curing of opium smokers; 2. The prevention of smuggling.

THE CURE OF ADDICTS.

As thousands in the northern provinces have developed the opium habit in recent years, prohibition could only be effective if means were taken to cure opium smokers. The province of Shansi was quoted, where 51,000 smokers have been treated in "Cure Houses" during the last two years. If thousands are suddenly deprived of their opium by local suppression of poppy cultivation, smuggling from neighbouring provinces will inevitably follow, unless the addicts can be cured.

With regard to smuggling, it is obvious that with unrestricted and even compulsory cultivation in the south and western provinces, markets must be found for their surplus tons of opium which, unless a very extensive prevention service is established, will inevitably find its way to the north. To stop cultivation in the north and not prevent opium traffic from the south would be only changing the name and not lessening the evil itself.

Beyond these two suggestions the Association strongly urged the eradication of poppy and suppression of opium traffic in the northern provinces owing allegiance to the Central Government, and the Association is convinced that nothing will reaffirm the confidence of Foreign Powers more than the certain knowledge that Kansu, Shensi, Anhui, Hunan and Chihli are clear.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

HONAN TROOPS' MUTINY

Kueiteh Yamen Looted by Men of the 24th Division

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kueiteh, Ho., Mar. 22.

The hopes we entertained that all our soldier defenders of the 24th Division had turned over a new leaf since last year received rather a bad shock last night when some of them commenced looting at about 10.30, but fortunately most of the soldiers stood true to their duty and the actual damage done was not great. Several of the more flimsy thatched buildings in Gen. Wang's yamên were burnt and one or two looted. The chief sufferer is a Mr. Meo, who, in addition to having his house robbed, was shot through the body and is now lying in a serious condition in the Canadian Church Mission Hospital.

It is difficult to ascertain what has happened to the mutineers. Some say that they have fled into the country and others that they are still on duty in the army. Gen. Wong is away just now, probably in connexion with the reported change of leadership of the 24th Division.

Responsible military leaders, however, seem to be doing their best to protect mission property here, for when the trouble started last night Chang "Tuan Chang" immediately mounted a guard of his own 93rd "Tuan," who have a good reputation, at the Canadian Church Mission buildings in the city throughout the night.

ANOTHER LAUNCH SEIZED

Latest Canton Incident: Foreign Sailors Intervene

A report reached the "Hongkong Telegraph" on the 18th instant from Canton of the commandeering by a number of soldiers of another steam launch flying a foreign flag.

It is stated that on the 16th the launch was lying off the East Bund, near the Great Eastern Hotel, when a score of soldiers came aboard and took possession of the vessel. The coxswain could get no satisfactory statement from the troops as to why the launch was seized, and consequently he went ashore and telephoned to the foreign Consul concerned.

About an hour later, a number of foreign soldiers arrived on the scene and cleared the launch of Chinese troops, later handing back the craft to the coxswain.

CATTLE PLAGUE IN SHANSI

50 to 90 Per Cent. Mortality from Rinderpest: Animals Slaughtered Wholesale

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiangchow, Sha., Mar. 20.

The cattle disease now diagnosed as rinderpest continues unabated. We hear of villages all round and far afield where from 50 to 90 per cent. of the cattle have died.

The flesh of these diseased animals is invariably sold for human consumption. Outside the south gate of this city and in villages we pass through, the unrestricted public slaughter and sale goes on in a most disgusting and loathsome manner, despite protests by more enlightened Chinese. Last week even some chair coolies turned away from their usual eating house, protesting that the utensils of this food shop were too redolent of bad beef to permit enjoyment of their meal.

CHILDREN D ING.

It is encouraging to know that the Middle School here has now added hygiene to its curriculum, but this is not likely to impress the butchers.

The usual epidemic diseases are this year claiming a very large proportion of children, and fatal cases of measles and other childish complaints are exceptionally common in several neighbouring hsiens.

Mr. Hsu, the local official, died suddenly last Saturday a few hours after his arrival from the capital, where, we understand, he had just obtained permission to continue in office here, instead of departing to take up an appointment elsewhere. Like a good number of Shansi officials, he was one of the old type, trying hard to adopt the new style, and keep abreast with the Republican phraseology and fashions though little success attended his efforts.

CONSERVANCY OF THE MIN RIVER

Silting of the Fairway Below Foochow: Purchase of a Suction Dredger

Peking, Mar. 24.

Advices from Foochow state that the Min River Conservancy, of which the British Consul is Chairman, recently signed a contract with Messrs. Duncan and Company of Shanghai, the agents of Messrs. Lobnitz & Co., Ld., of Renfrew, Scotland, for the purchase of a suction dredger with an excavating capacity of 200 cubic yards an hour and 2,000 feet of pipe-line.

The new dredger will cost £27,395 and will be delivered early in the autumn. Its employment is expected to go far towards solving the difficult problem of controlling the heavy silting action of the Min River in the fairway below Foochow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A RACE CLUB IN MACAO

VOLCANIC ERUPTION IN THE PHILIPPINES

Manila, Mar. 24.

A report to the Constabulary states that the inhabitants of Babuyan Island, who are mostly fishermen, are believed to have been killed by a volcano eruption on March 1. TSINGTAO POLICE AND THEIR PAY

Superintendent Threatening to Resign: Navy Also in Deplorable State

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, March 19.

The Chief of the Tsingtao Police has warned the Administration that unless the Finance Department is more prompt with disbursements for the settlement of the wages of the police, he will resign.

Superintendent Cheng Wei-djen has had to borrow money from a Bank in Tsinan over which he has a good deal of influence through being a principal shareholder. The policemen here are only two months in arrear in the matter of wages and are, therefore, better off than their confrères in other parts of the country, but the community fully appreciates the fact that the chief of police here cannot be expected to be able to raise funds for ever on his own. In his warning to the Administration, Superintendent Cheng points out that when he accepted the post vacated by the former chief he had no idea he would have to act the part of the philanthropist.

The former chief of police has had a similar experience in the matter of not getting funds from the Administration, only in his case he was unable to raise money on his own with which to pay his men and probably had no intention to. When the present chief took over the control of the local police, he found the wages had been in arrear for some five months. In other words, almost from the outset of Chinese Administration, the Finance Department has given little attention if any to the question of providing the police with funds regularly. In this connexion the community is highly incensed. It is felt that the indifference shown towards the welfare of such an important institution is nothing short of disgraceful.

THE NAVY ALSO.

It is reported that the Ministry for the Navy will conduct an investigation into the real conditions of the ships forming Admiral Wen's squadron. It is furthermore reported that the squadron will be placed under the direct control of the Central Government and that Admiral Wen will be given a job ashore as an advisor for "face pidgin." This latter report is considered highly interesting, if true.

Admiral Wen has been in a quandary lately over the matter of funds. Although Wu Pei-fu promised a fixed sum monthly, he has done nothing himself and has confined his efforts in the direction of obtaining the money necessary for the upkeep of the squadron from the revenues of public utilities. The levy of $50,000 monthly which was put on the Chamber of Commerce soon after the arrival of the squadron here has never been met, likewise the $50,000 monthly levies on the Administration. True, $150,000 have been obtained from the Railway through the efforts of the Managing-Director but in view of the Japanese opposition that later arose, the Railway has since not parted with a single cash.

Admiral Wen is now reported to be after the Chefoo-Weihsien automobile service. "When will the Government get rid of Wen?" is the question freely asked here.

ELECTRICITY CUT OFF.

The local Electric Light Company, sick of pestering the Administration with bills for electricity supplied, has now cut off the supply to the Harbour Department and the Pu-tsi Hospital. The Harbour Department has been particularly extravagant in the consumption of electricity.

It is reported that Mr. Hu Hai-yun, formerly the Chief Accountant of the King-Sui Railway, has been appointed to fill the post of Finance Chief. He is a Wu Pei-fu man and a friend of Kao En-hung.

MR. W. J. Morrison, Accountant, Chartered Bank, Kuala Lumpur, is going to Delhi on transfer.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS IN SZECHUAN

Peking, Mar. 18.

The Government has delayed the several important appointments in Szechuan for some time in the hope that it could be arranged that these appointments would not provoke strife, but apparently the rivalry among those who hope to receive appointments has not yet been dissipated. The President sent a delegate to the province to make investigations and report. Marshal Wu Pei-fu did likewise, and, according to the report of the latter's representative, Gen. Chien Ping-chien, neither Gen. Liu Tsun-hiou, nominal Tuchun of Szechuan, nor Gen. Liu Hsiang are interested in any appointments at the moment, as they are still engaged in military operations, preparing against a rally on the part of the enemy. Gen. Liu Tsun-haouis is now at the Chien-yang front, while Gen. Liu Hsiang is assisting.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ICHANG LETTER

Chief Engineer's Exploit in 13-ft. Boat: Fewer Hong Changes This Spring

From Our Own Correspondent.

Ichang, Mar. 11.

The other day there was an accident which might have resulted in the loss of a foreign life. Mr. H. Kingswood, chief engineer of I.-C.S. Kingwo recently installed a new engine of 40 h.p. into a 13-ft. boat, expecting to get at least 25 knots out of her.

Speed trials were carried out at a place about three miles down river, and the ship's captain and Mr. Kingswood went down there to carry them out. Mr. Kingswood ran the boat first at a speed of 27.06 knots per hour. The Captain then did a run, and though none too experienced with such craft he being a lighter man, achieved 27.27. Unfortunately on turning about he ran into some fishing floats. In a moment he was in the water and the boat had disappeared. Luckily he had a life-belt on, and was picked up after being a few minutes immersion.

The raising of the boat has been put into the hands of native divers, but it may be difficult to locate as she lies in deep water.

Springtime usually brings a greater number of staff changes at the foreign hongs. So far, however, the only transfers mentioned are the approaching departures of Mr. Denniston, of Messrs. Butterfield & Swire, who goes to Ningpo, and Mr. Walter, of the Asiatic Petroleum Co., who is going on home leave, Mr. Millar, who has just returned from furlough, will relieve Mr. Denniston here, while Mr. Walter's place will be taken by Mr. C. A. Butland (from Shasi) and Mr. H. B. Dickson.

The A.P.C. are in future to supervise their business at Shasi from Ichang.

Messrs. Mackenzie & Co. are closing up their Ichang branch at the end of this month, but Mr. N. Ellis, their agent here, is remaining in the port. He is about to run a commission agency.

The river is beginning to show signs of rising, and soon there will be less risk for ships that have managed to keep going during the lowest water in facing the rapids, while others that have been anchored here for over two months will again get under way.

JAPAN'S BURNT BOOKS

Treasures Which Will Never Be Replaced: The Jesuit Book of Martyrs

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tokio, Mar. 10.

While it is possible, as time rolls on, to repair the enormous damages that fire and quake wrought in Tokio and Yokohama, the country has suffered an irretrievable loss in the destruction of valuable manuscripts, records and libraries which can never be replaced.

The destruction of the Tokio Imperial University Library is one of the greatest losses that Japanese culture has sustained, the majority of the 700,000 odd books having been burnt to cinders. Among the precious manuscripts that have been lost are the "Richo Jitsuroku" or the annals of the Yi dynasty of Korea; the "Yeiraku Taiten" or the records of the Yung Lu era in China; the Narvana Sutras in Sanskrit and in one of the Manchurian dialects; and the famous "Jesuit Press."

The most precious of all these is the "Jesuit Press" which faithfully mirrored the policy of the Shogunate Government towards foreigners and especially towards Christianity. The "Jesuit Press" consisted of reports submitted by Portuguese padres who were engaged in the propagation of the Christian gospel in the 16th Century. The cruelist measures were resorted to by the Shoguns to exterminate Christianity and Christians from the land. No Japanese historical records were permitted during a period of 300 years to make the slightest mention of Christianity or the attitude of the authorities towards it. The "Jesuit Press," therefore is the only available source of information.

CRUCIFIXION OF CONVERTS.

The "Press" records the greatest severities practised against Christians by Hideyoshi, the Japanese feudal lord. About this time quakes and fires were constantly assailing the country. Buddhist and Shinto priests said that these holocausts were due to the wrath of the Japanese deities against the new religion which had gained so many converts. Hideyoshi at first refused to listen to these superstitious suggestions, but unrequited love led him to massacre many Christians and missionaries in Japan. He was attracted by a beautiful Christian woman who spurned his advances, and suggestions that she should be added to his already numerous household of wives. Enraged he stabbed her to death and ordered the crucifixion of 26 "invaders" —missionaries and converts. The crucifixion took place on Tateyama Hill, near Nagasaki.

THE SHIMABARA MASSACRE.

One of the worst massacres of Christians took place at Shimabara on January 15, 1628, and was followed by the promulgation of the famous Seclusion Law against Western "barbarians."

The "Jesuit Press" describes the massacre graphically thus:

"Torches were burning at the scene of execution and effensive odours assailed the nostrils of the bystanders, odours from the chimney of the crematory. Women in white were dangling from pillars by their hair. Flames were gradually wrapping around them.

ENGLAND'S AID.

Two Japanese professors have left for England in connexion with the generous offer of the Earl of Balfour and other eminent British scholars to do their utmost to replace the losses. In the Earl of Balfour's words, England will do for Japan what she did for the library of Louvain.

MISSIONARIES who were motoring recently through Tondo, a district of Manila, in which there are many small Filipino and Chinese shops, were surprised to see the word "dammit" on several signboards. One of the women of the party expressed astonishment that the Filipinos had adopted English profanity to such an extent as to use it in their signs. It was then explained that "dammit" meant clothing in the Tagalog dialect!

UPPER YANGTZE STEAMER ON THE ROCKS

Ichang, Mar. 24.

The Yangtze Rapids Navigation Company's str. Chiping, whose agents here are Messrs. Gillespie & Sons, on her maiden trip to Chungking struck the rocks at the Kungling Rapid at 8.15 on the morning of March 21. There is about eight feet of water in her forcholds and the cargo is seriously damaged. Salvage gear was despatched this morning. The steamer is reported not to be in any immediate danger.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOOCHOW UNIVERSITY

Annual Memorial Service

The Rev. D. L. Anderson, D.D., first President of Soochow University, died on March 16, 1911. Every year following, a memorial service was held on that day until 1921, when it was decided to broaden the scope of the annual memorial service so as to include consideration of the work done by others who had contributed to the founding and development of the institution.

Since March 16 fell on Sunday this year, the annual ceremony was held on Monday morning, March 17 at nine o'clock. The whole student body of the college and middle school No. 1 attended in uniform, the service being held in the University chapel. The principal speaker of the day was Mr. L. G. Lea, a graduate of Buffington Institute, one of the three institutions out of which Soochow University has developed. Mr. Lea was intimately associated with Dr. Anderson in the Anglo-Chinese School at Kunghong, Soochow, and was for 18 years Proctor of the University. Mr. Lea gave an intenesly interesting review of the development of educational work in the Southern Methodist Mission, calling attention especially to the share in the founding and development of this institution by the Rev. J. W. Lambuth, D.D., the Rev. Young J. Allen, D.D., the Rev. A. P. Parker, D.D., the Rev. D. L. Anderson, D.D., and the Rev. T. Z. Tsao.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

In the afternoon a convocation of the College of Arts and Sciences was held in the University chapel for the recognition of good scholarship during the autumn term. Professor Z. M. Pan gave an interesting address in which he impressed upon the college students the great need for sound scholarship as a preparation for the intellectual leadership of the country.

The Registrar, Professor J. W. Dyson read the honour rolls. Seven students had won places on the second class honour roll, which requires all grades to be above 80 per cent. Thirty-four had won places on the third class honour roll by attaining a weighted average of 80 per cent. Three others were given honourable mention as having a general average of 80 per cent.

A very impressive item on the programme of this convocation was the signing of the college pledge by the new students who had entered at the beginning of the spring term.

THE SCIENCE HALL.

The new science hall is rapidly nearing completion. The cement stucco finish is all on and the scaffolding has been removed. A visitor, intimately acquainted with academic buildings throughout the country, has recently declared it the most beautiful and best planned of all the science halls recently erected in this country.

FIRE ON MANILA ESCOLTA

Manila, Mar. 23.

A fire broke out last night on the Escolta, the principal business thoroughfare, and enveloped the whole square. The loss is estimated at between P.500,000 and P.1,000,000. The fire raged for three hours. Its origin has not yet been determined. Traffic in a portion of the business section was paralysed.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SCHOOLBOY'S BARBAROUS TREATMENT

Falsely Accused of Abduction: Rescued from Prison by Chinese Christian

From a Correspondent.

Chowkiakow, Ho., Mar. 8.

During the winter recess one of the little missionary schoolboys in Chowkiakow was suddenly arrested and taken off to the county prison at Shanghai six miles from here.

A rumour of the strange arrest came to the ears of a Chinese evangelist who has charge of the church in that town. He went and asked to see the boy, who burst into tears, but could not explain the cause of his trouble. The Chinese stood surety for the boy and was permitted to take him to the Mission House and then made inquiries into the case.

It appears that the wife of a soldier had hired herself out as a nurse in the absence of her husband. In the course of her duties she had nursed the scholar's little baby brother for about a month during the mother's illness.

From there she had gone to help on a boat. After that she disappeared. Her own brother, who is supposed to have sold her, accused the boy in order to throw the blame elsewhere. The evangelist informed the official of this, and called his attention to the extreme youth of the accused.

The rogue had evidently got the name of the boy without having any idea of his age, and the warrant for arrest had been issued on the presumption that the child was an adult, for when the official was informed, he dealt with the case at once. When the accuser saw the accused he admitted that he did not know the boy.

A fine of $100 and brief detention in prison for the false accuser was the decision of the Court, but no compensation for the nine-year-old innocent. Even then the court minions wanted to get money from the boy. Had the Chinese Christian not been on hand they would have taken some of his garments, seeing the boy had no money to give them.

THE JAPANESE SUNKEN SUBMARINE

Little Hope of Rescue of Imprisoned Sailors

Tokio, Mar. 20.

The latest reports from Sasebo hold out little hope of effecting the rescue of the sailors imprisoned in the submarine. Telephone communications have been interrupted. The divers report that there is now no evidence of life.

Mar. 21.

Though salvage work is being continued it is believed that the imprisoned crew of Submarine 43 are dead. No response to communications has been obtainable since Wednesday evening.

Attempts to raise the stern of the submarine have failed and it is now proposed to tow the vessel to more shallow waters.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

"HURRAH FOR THE EMPEROR."

The Naval Department to-day issued the following communiqué:—Up to the sunset of March 19, telephonic communication was possible between the rescuers and the electric-motor compartment in the stern of the sunken Submarine 43, and at 7.35 p.m. that day, "Hurrah for his Majesty, the Emperor of Japan," were heard by telephone, but since then no answers were made from within. Judging from the above fact, it is likely that about this time, the electric-motor compartment, too, began to be submerged, water thus flooding every compartment. It is inferred that there is not a single survivor in the submarine. The floating operation is rapidly progressing. —Eastern News Agency.

A TEST OF CHINESE LAW COURTS

Lady's Appeal Against Wrongful Imprisonment at Tsingtao: Important Extraterritorial Bearings

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 22.

The way in which the Chinese judicial authorities here will handle a case over the wrongful detention of a Russian woman which will shortly be filed against the Public Procurator who caused the detention will show conclusively whether the former leased territory has been run on model lines, as promised by the Chinese delegation at the Peace Conference.

This is a case in which the lady will seek compensation for having been lodged in gaol for a fortnight and treated as a common miscreant for an offence committed by another. This was in November-December of last year. The facts of the incident are as follows.

The plaintiff started a boarding house here last year and, when she was obtaining provisions from a local establishment (Chinese), a boarder stood as guarantor. Business being bad, plaintiff was unable to settle her account as promptly as she had wished, with the result that the proprietor of the store sought the assistance of the Court, had the boarder's room sealed and his property attached, he having in the interval left Tsingtao on a short trip. When the Court officials accompanied by the police came to the boarding house, plaintiff was not in but her daughter was. The young lady was told to open all the rooms in the house for the Court officials' inspection. There would seem to have been some heated exchange of words over the young lady's refusal to do anything in the absence of her mother, which eventually led to a scuffle between her and the Court officials. Eventually the latter left, but in the evening returned and took both the mother and the daughter into custody. The charge preferred against them was that of assaulting Court officials in the discharge of their duty, and this despite the fact that the mother, being absent, had done nothing of the kind. Both mother and daughter were consigned to a filthy cell and given food such as a common coolie is accustomed to having. In due course, friends came to their assistance, one of whom, let it be said, was a Chinese.

In his final decision, a fortnight after the detention of the two, the presiding Judge imposed a sentence of a month's imprisonment upon the daughter, the case against the mother being dismissed, and, in the written decision, no mention at all was made of the mother, an admission that the lady had been wrongfully detained.

Sympathetic friends have now come to her assistance and with the aid of an attorney, a test case will be filed in a few days to ascertain whether the judicial authorities here are capable of putting aside the question of "face," and settling a grave case impartially, thus earning for themselves an honourable reputation.

It might be mentioned in passing that unpleasant pressure was brought to bear upon the Chinese gentleman referred to for his taking an interest in the case.

WHAT'S IN A NAME.

Foreigners here are occasionally given a chance to ponder over the efficiency of Chinese judges. A case heard not so long ago had a very amusing sequel. A young lady by the Christian name of Elizabeth, who had been previously charged with assaulting a policeman, was at a later date charged with having assaulted some-one else. When the second case came up for hearing, her name was set down in Chinese as "Li-tsu" (the nearest approach to "Lizzie"), in the previous charge sheet her name having been set down as Li-tsu-be-tsu." The presiding judge questioned the defendant for about half an hour as to her name. Defendant stated that her Christian name was Elizabeth.

"That cannot be" replied the Judge. "In the former case against you which I tried, the official register gave your name as Li-tsu. Evidently this present case is against a defendant named 'Li-tsu-be-tsu.' I cannot try this case with you as defendant." And his Honour dismissed the case forthwith, to the discomfiture of the complainant.

Friendly Soviet Protest Against Their Closure by Chinese

From Our Own Correspondent.

Harbin, Mar. 14.

M. Kubak, a member of the Dalrevkom (Far Eastern Revolutionary Commitee) the governing body of the Russian Far East, has arrived at Harbin from Vladivostok. He is staying here for a few days, to make himself acquainted with conditions in the railway area. A banquet has been given in his honour by the Administrator, Gen. Chu, which was attended by all the leading Chinese officials. The two questions which are interesting M. Kubak most are the closing of the Railway Workers' Unions along the railway line and the repatriation of Russian refugees in the railway area to their homes in Russia.

Gen. Chu informed the Soviet representative that the reason of the closing of these branches of the Workers' Unions was due to their engaging in politics. He was asked by M. Kubak to reconsider his decision, providing Russian members of these organizations undertook to leave politics severely alone.

As regards the repatriation of Russians, there is no hindrance on the part of the Chinese, but M. Kubak pointed out that it was necessary that the Soviet authorities have some special organization to co-operate with the Chinese authorities. M. Kubak informed Gen. Chu that such an organization would shortly be formed and no doubt would be quite satisfactory to all parties concerned. The reception given by the Chinese authorities to the Soviet representative has been most friendly.

MINE DISASTER AT TONGSHAN

53 Miners Entombed with Small Chance of Extrication

Tientsin, March 26.

A sudden inflow of clay and sand in a number of galleries of one of the Tongshan coal mines entombed 53 miners. Digging continued all last night but fresh falls of earth occurred as fast as the obstructions were removed. A message from Tongshan this evening states that there is no hope for the entombed men.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY IN CHINA

Claim Against Marconi Company for Commission on Government Contracts

London, Mar. 26.

In the King's Bench Division to-day, in the action of Mr. James A. Malcolm against Marconi's Wireless Telegraph Co., Ld., for commission in connexion with proposed wireless telegraph supplies to China, Mr. Justice Acton decided that defendants had succeeded with costs, contingent upon payment to the plaintiff of commission on £66,000 when received from the Chinese Government.

Mr. Malcolm, with a Mr. Birchal, now deceased, obtained the sole agency for China from Marconi's, who undertook to pay five per cent. commission on all business done by themselves with the Chinese Government.

Mr. Malcolm claimed commission on three contracts, or alternatively claimed damage on the ground that the third contract between defendants and the Chinese Government was a breach of the contract giving him the sole agency for China.

Marconi's admitted that commission was payable under the first contract, denied that it was payable under the two later contracts, and alleged that the breach of agreement, if any, had been waived by plaintiff.—Reuter.

THE DEATH OF MR. GILLARD

Peking's Need of a Hospital for Infectious Diseases: A Distressing Case

Peking, Mar. 23.

In connexion with the sad death of Mr. Gillard the Medical Officer of Health for the Legation Quarter states that there are no signs of any epidemic of smallpox among the Chinese in Peking. In fact, cases of smallpox among children have been fewer than usual this season. Mr. Gillard resided at Mentoukou and his wife and nurse as contacts are being quarantined at Mentoukou and not in the French Hospital as originally intended.

This distressing case revives a pressing need in our midst, namely, that there is no infectious disease hospital in Peking to which a foreigner can be taken, either inside or out of the Legation Quarter. It is true that there is a Chinese Infectious Diseases Hospital, but it has no accommodation for foreigners. Thus if a foreigner contracts an infectious disease arrangements have to be made for treatment at home, with the attendant risk to other members of the household. It is doubtful whether any other foreign community in the world is in such a helpless condition as the residents of Peking in this respect. How long they will remain apathetic over the matter is a question for their own consideration. The matter has been discussed over and over again, without definite result. Some years ago the Rockefeller foundation offered, if the Central Hospital could raise a certain sum, that such would be supplemented by the China Medical Board. The Central Hospital found the undertaking impossible.

Two years ago the question of an emergency isolation building was discussed by the authorities of the Diplomatic Quarter. It was proposed to erect a small isolation building of four wards, on the old German Glacis at a cost of $10,000, which were available for an approved purpose inside the Legation Quarter. The project was turned down by the adverse vote of one Minister, who contended that it was too close to the Legations. Later on this Minister stated that he would withdraw his objection if the scheme were approved by the Legation Medical Officers. The question was duly referred to them and the Medical Officer of the objecting Minister showed fatal opposition. Since then nothing has been done in the matter, and the Legation authorities are not inclined to hold the $10,000 indefinitely while improvements in the Legation Quarter are almost imperative.

It appears that the Legation doctor who opposed the isolation building attended Mr. Gilliard and proposed to send the two contacts to the French Hospital for observation, but the request was refused. The French Hospital is technically outside the Legation quarter, but it is much nearer to the Legations than the German glacis, which was opposed as the site of the Isolation building on the ground of dangerous propinquity to the Legation residence.

AN URGENT NECESSITY.

Since the foregoing was written it is reported that a member of one of the Legation staffs has contracted scarlet fever, while a foreign lady, a patient in the Peking Union Medical College, has developed smallpox. The lady will have to be taken back to her home, while there is no hospital to receive the other case. These deplorable facts should bring home to the opposing Legation the necessity for the isolation building, and to all foreign residents the need for an infectious diseases hospital in Peking. If general subscriptions were called for and the proceeds of future amateur productions devoted to a fund for the erection and maintenance of a hospital such as is required, it would not take many years to secure the $100,000 which is quoted as the minimum necessary. Every physician in Peking will endorse the necessity for such an institution, and nearly every doctor would sign a petition for the isolation building on the glacis to be constructed as soon as possible as a temporary measure.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOOCHOW'S ELECTRICITY ENTERPRISE

A New Company to Buy Out the Old: Fear of a Monopoly

From Our Own Correspondent.

Soochow Mar. 26.

We are getting better service since the old and new electric lighting plants combined about a month ago. The old company started operations about 15 years ago and in 1919-20, during the Japanese boycott, it was alleged that the company was partly owned by Japanese. The company lost some 90 per cent. of the private lighting and had it not been for the street lighting it could not, financially, have kept its head above water. The service became so poor that in many parts of the city the supposed 220 volts dropped to scarcely 40 volts Scores of small private lighting plants started up all over the city—small kerosene, fuel oil and producer gas engines sent up a great volume of "pop, pop, poppings," as soon as the sun went down!

Several leading men in our Chamber of Commerce organized a new electric lighting company. They bought one of the two old copper cent mints which 20 years ago were proving to be a gold mine, as well as a mint, for our Kiangsu Provincial Treasurer here in Soochow. The high chimney, engine house, furnaces and some of the old boilers of this old mint outside the Hsü Mên were used by the new company. In 1922 the new company obtained the street lighting franchise, but at the same time the old company regained much of its lost private lighting, in part by improving its service, but chiefly by lowering its rate from 20 cents per unit to 16 cents. Since the new company has taken over the old plant the rate goes back to 20 cents and now with a monopoly we may perhaps expect in the future to see the rate raised to 22 cents, the old company's rate in 1918.

It is reported that the old plant in the Chang Mên suburb is to be dismantled and the machinery moved to the new plant in the Hsü Mên suburb. It is also reported that in the future we are to have a day current, but at present the demand for power does not justify a day current. It was rumoured some time ago that a plan was on foot to build a large power station on the Grand Canal and the railway, half way between Wusih and Changchow.

MARRIAGE OF GEN. LU YUNG-HSIANG

Director-General of Chekiang Wedded to Shantung Official's Daughter

More than 10,000 of his friends visited the yamên of Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang, Director-General for the Reorganization of Military Affairs in Chêkiang, on Wednesday morning, to offer to him their congratulations upon the occasion of his marriage to Miss Waung, the daughter of a Taoyin (Prefectural Officer) in Shantung. A sprinkling of foreigners were seen amidst the dense crowd of Chinese officials and merchants present.

Although very simple, the ceremony was a most impressive one.

The bride, who had left the Shanghai North Station by a special train at 10 o'clock on Tuesday night, passed the night at Kashing, guards of honour and military bands meeting the party at each station. The train arrived in Hangchow promptly at 8 o'clock on Wednesday morning, as it was the Tupan's order that it should reach Hangchow station very punctually. Accompanied by her parents and relatives, the bride was met by four officials and two lady relatives of Gen. Lu. Immediately the train approached the station, Gen. Lu's military band struck up, and a band of young boys in gorgeous attire began to play on their Chinese musical instruments.

Steppping into Gen. Lu's private sedan chair, which was prettily decorated with red and green silk, the bride was carried to the yamên, preceded and followed by a score of cavalry officers and the band. At the yamên gates, over which hung the Chinese national flag and a Chinese army banner, a dozen officers and a score of servants stood, ready to welcome the guests. A little further inside were about 50 local officials, acting as ushers. Over their heads flew a double row of bunting.

Gen. Lu's private office was transformed into the hall of ceremony and within were as many people as could find standing room. Two large gold figures, representing long life and happiness, stood on the shelf.

The firing of crackers and a buzz of excitement announced the arrival of the bride, and four ladies immediately waited at the door to receive her as she stepped out of the sedan chair. Escorted into the hall, the bride was placed in a standing position facing the two golden figures. A few seconds later, the Tupan was standing by her right side. And then the ceremony commenced.

Mats were laid on the floor and the pair knelt upon them four times, offering kow-tows to each other. Arising, they bowed twice to each other and then thrice to those inside the room. The pair then entered another room where they were met by a number of relatives. Here wine was drunk and the relatives of both sides were introduced.

Gen. Lu was thereafter kept busy for the whole day, going from place to place, bowing thrice to his guests and thanking them for their presence. He stated that he would accept no presents and urged all his friends to contribute their money to charitable institutions.

Dinner was then served and the fête ended.

THE JAPANESE CAPTURED BY BRIGANDS

Peking, Mar. 27.

The Japanese Consul and a delegate from Peking have met General Tan Hsi-mou at Hokiang near the Szechuan-Kweichow border and discussed the question of liberating the two Japanese officers, captured from the Yiyang Maru. As a result of the conversations, it seems likely that the release of the captives will soon be effected.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mr. John R. Putnam, U. S. Consul, who officiated at Foochow during the absence of Mr. E. B. Price, is in Shanghai en route for Chefoo. There he will succeed Mr. Stuart K. Lupton, who is going to Sofia.

THE BATTLE OF THE RED WALL

A Stirring Episode in Chinese History

By Our Wuchang Correspondent.

One of the most famous episodes of Chinese history is the Battle of the Red Wall, which was fought somewhere in the present Province of Hupeh in the year A.D. 207. In this battle Ts'ao Ts'ao, the usurper of the Kingdom of Wei, north of the Yangtze, was defeated, and his fleet burned by Chou Yu, the general of Seng Ch'uan of the southern Kingdom of Wu, whose capital was the present city of Nanking.

The army of Seng Ch'uan is said to have numbered 830,000 men. His camp was on the north bank of the Yangtze, and his ships were collected in a mass upon the river and fastened together with chains. Some say that he did this because of the sea-sickness of his soldiers, who were not used to living on boats, others that he intended to make a bridge of his boats over which he could transport his army.

On the eve of battle Ts'ao Ts'ao held high feast with his captains. His tables were spread outside his tent in the open, and standing upon a high hill he could command a wide view in the brilliant moonlight. At his feet, the river flowed like a broad ribbon. Eastward, he could descry Tsai Sang on the southern bank, where Chou Yu had his headquarters. Westward, he looked to Hsia K'eo (the present Hankow). In front of him to the south was Linn Ping Shan. Northward, he looked on Wu Linn (Black Crow Forest)—a name of evil omen for the succeeding day.

AN ILL-OMENED DEED.

The feast was high, and as the wine went round Ts'ao Ts'ao spoke in vaunting words to his captains. He had made himself master of all the land north of the river. The morrow would make him master of the south. Even as he spoke, the Black Raven the Ho Lao Ya, bird of evil omen, flew over his head. Other faces grew pale; but Ts'ao Ts'ao recked naught of omens. In drunken glee, he seized a lance, and brandishing it in the air he chanted a song in boastful words. One of the captains, Liu Fu, was bold enough to remonstrate with his general for his foolish pride. In drunken fury, the spear was hurled, and Liu Fu was slain—a deed repented of and requited on the morrow.

Meanwhile Chou Yu, the general of Seng Ch'uan, remained inactive in his tent. His plan, inspired by the wily Chu Ko-liang, was to send fire to burn the boats of the enemy. Ts'ao Ts'ao himself had been warned of this danger; but the prevailing winds at that time of year were from the north and west, and for Chou Yu's purpose a southeast wind was needed. Ts'ao Ts'ao was confident that no southeast wind was possible. Day by day the wind kept steadily in the northeast, and Chou Yu was in despair.

But Chu Ko-liang, or K'ung Ming, as he is more commonly called, was quite equal to tackling the wind. On Lan Ping Shan a big altar was erected by his orders. It was made in three stories. The lowest storey was decorated with the 28 zodiacal signs. The second bore the 64 variations of the Pa-Kwa, the mystical diagrams used in divining. On the highest storey were posted four sentries, who watched day and night for the wind. Three times daily, K'ung Ming ascended the altar, to burn incense and to study the aspect of the heavens.

THE SOUTHEAST WIND AT LAST.

On a day and hour which K'ung Ming had already promised to Chou Yu, the southeast wind arose and blew steadily. All preparations had been made beforehand. Six divisions of soldiers, each consisting of 3,000 men, had been sent to different points on the north bank of the river to intercept the flight of Ts'ao Ts'ao's army. Chou Yu's navy advanced upon the river in four divisions, each formed by 300 boats pushing 25 fireships before them.

The ships of Ts'ao Ts'ao, massed together and united by chains, were unable to escape from the burning galleons of flame which bore down upon them. His land-forces, completely surprised, were seized with panic and fled northwards through the Black Crow Forest, only to fall victims to the ambushed warriors who lay in wait for them. Ts'ao Ts'ao made his escape with a small band of 300 followers in the direction of Lan Chuen.

Of two roads, the defeated general chose the nearer but rougher track which led by Hwu Yung to the city of Lan Chuen. All through the night they rode, with the beacon-fires of the enemy burning on the hills on every side of them. Heavy rain fell, and his men and horses were faint with hunger. Staggering through the mud, many fell, and were left by the roadside. Even here, K'ung Ming's marvellous foresight was able to forestall his foe. Unable to struggle on any longer, Ts'ao Ts'ao with his small band was forced to bivouac by the side of the road, and wait for the morning. They were overtaken by a small troop of horsemen under Yuin Ch'ang, specially sent for the purpose of pursuing and making them prisoners. It was only by the clemency of Yuin Ch'ang that the general himself was allowed to escape—clemency for which his benefactor afterwards paid dearly. Ts'ao Ts'ao reached Lan Chuen accompanied by 27 men, the remnant of his great army of 830,000.

OLD LANDMARKS RECOVERED.

There is always an interest in trying to find out the past scenes of historic events in places known to the present. In a land like China, where records have always been kept with some care, and where historic monuments abound this is often not difficult. In the present case, certain identifications are not difficult: Hsia K'eo is Hankow; Tsai Sang is Kiukiang; Hwa Yung is Chienlih; and Lan Chuen is Chiangling, or Chingchowfu. But where is the Red Wall?

According to the story, Ch'ih Pei (the Red Wall) ought to be somewhere between Kiuniang and Chingchowfu, and on the southern bank of the Yangtze, with Wulinn opposite upon the northern bank. There are five counties in Hupeh which claim the distinction of having been the spot where Ts'ao Ts'ao met with his great defeat at the hands of Chou Yu. They are, Huangchow, Chianghsia (Wuchang), Hanyang, Chiayu and Hanchuan.

Of these, two may be ruled out at once, for Hanchuan is not near the Yangtze at all, and Hanyang is on the northern bank. Hanchuan makes its claim on the ground that there is a small market-village, quite near the western border of the county and some 120 li from the hsien city, named Ch'ih Pei Kiai (Red Wall Street.) In Hanyang-hsien there is a hill called Ling Chang Shan, of which the southern peak is called Wu Linn, and is also said to have once borne the name of Ch'ih Pei Shan. But Ch'ih Pei and Wu Linn are obviously different places in the story, so that this does not seem to help matters.

Huangchow also boasts a Ch'ih Pei Shan; but unfortunately this is the "pei" of "nose", and not the "pei" of "wall," or "cliff." There remain Wuchang and Chiayu. Now on the southern bank of the Yangtze, in Chia Yu Hsien, there is a "Ch'ih Pei Shan", and opposite to it on the northern bank is a "Wu Linn". The road from this place to Chingchow-fu naturally leads through Chien Lih. This is in all probability the spot were Ts'ao Ts'ao met with his defeat.

TSINGTAO'S TRADE STATISTICS

Increasing Tonnage of British Steamers Using the Port:

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, Mar. 24.

The noteworthy feature in the 10 days reports of the Kiaochou Customs Returns is the gradual increase in British tonnage entering into and clearing from the port of Tsingtao. It is now always second to the Japanese and is from time to time not far behind, although in number British vessels are behind ships flying the Chinese flag. The latter are, however, coasters for the most part and many do not exceed even 100 tons net. American tonnage is usually third and is an important factor in the export of produce to the United States.

The number of foreign ships trading with Tsingtao is ever on the increase and for this reason it is regrettable that loading and unloading facilities are so meagre. Shipping companies have been clamouring for an all-round improvement, and the respective Consuls have lodged protests on their behalf, but with the present disorganized state of the Administration, it is doubted whether steps will be taken at an early date to remedy the present conditions. To illustrate the slackness in the Harbour Administration, its 10-day reports are always a month behind your correspondent's, and the business community here wonders why this should be so.

During the final 10-day period of February, 39 vessels of an aggregate of 59,801 tons entered and 39 vessels of an aggregate of 63,603 tons cleared from Tsingtao. In arrivals there were, 20 Japanese steamers aggregating 28,310 tons, 5 British steamers of 14,422 tons, one Dutch steamer of 3,924 tons, one Norwegian steamer of 3,544 tons, 9 Chinese steamers of 3,111 tons, one Polish steamer of 1,991 tons and one Danish motor-vessel of 274 tons. In clearances there were 19 Japanese steamers of an aggregate of 29,061 tons, 5 British steamers of 14,422 tons, one American steamer of 4,225 tons, one German steamer of 3,924 tons, 9 Chinese steamers of 3,915 tons, one Norwegian steamer of 1,032 tons, and one Danish motor-vessel of 274 tons.

BUILDING BOOM IN TIENTSIN

Modern Edifices Everywhere: Land & Investment Co's. Palatial Quarters

Tientsin News Service.

Tientsin, Mar. 24.

The rapidity with which new buildings are being erected in Tientsin is little short of amazing. One after another they are discovered in various stages of development, some being planted, other proudly emerging behind intricate scaffoldings.

The Tientsin Land Investment Co.'s building in Taku Road, British Concession, is the latest—a four storied edifice with a frontage of 155 feet and depth of 44 feet. Its architecture is English Renaissance and it is built to accommodate five suites of offices and three residential flats. Each office space has a floor space of 2,860 superficial feet, and consists of a central hall, general office, managers' offices, accountants' office, strong room, typists' office, sample room, compradore's offices, messengers and servants' rooms.

Two of the flats have a floor area similar to that of the offices and provide the following accommodation: Lobby, hall, dining, drawing, study, two bed, two bath, pantry, kitchen and two servants' rooms. The third flat is even larger, giving three bed, three bath and four servants' rooms.

The foundation of the building is reinforced concrete, built on piles, and each floor is strengthened by the same material. The walls are of brick faced with cement. The heating, sanitation and lighting will be modern in every respect. It will be the second building in Tientsin to have a lift, a four-passenger Otis elevator. The reinforcing metal is supplied by the J. E. Hayes Engineering Corporation, the Sanitary Installation by the Eastern Engineering Works, Electric Fittings by the General Electric Co. (China) and the lift by the Pacific Trading Co., Inc.

Behind the building area are four large reinforced concrete godowns, two of which have a floor space of 8,000 superficial feet, and two of 9,000. The floors and roof are designed to carry a load of 350 pounds per square foot, and the godowns are generally supplied with fire-proof doors and steel windows.

The entire building will be ready for occupation in July next. The ground floor space has already been taken up, one half by the Investment Co., itself, and the other half by the Deutsche-Asiatische Bank.

What purposes to be an experiment on the part of the Tientsin Land Investment Co. to provide reasonably priced residential accommodation is their new 17 house-terrace now being erected in Wellington Road, in the Extra-Mural Area of the British Concession. They will be rented at Tls. 60 without, and Tls. 75 with, central heating. They will have four large and one small room with the usual subsidiary accommodation as follows: Basement containing servants quarters, which will be effectually insulated by sound proof ceiling and ventilating flues. Ground floor consisting of hall, dining and drawing-rooms, pantry, kitchen and servants' lavatory. First floor containing two bed, one bath and one dressing room, with small porches, one in front and one at the back of the house. Each house will have a small garden in front and a small servants' yard at the back.

They will be ready for occupation at the end of October next.

Government Arsenal Workers' Federation Shortly to Be Established

Tokio, Mar. 20.

Workers in the Government Arsenals have decided to form their own federation, according to a resolution approved by the executive committee which met recently in Osaka.

More than 50,000 workers are expected to enrol themselves as members of the federation, which will thus become the largest labour organization in Japan.

The inaugural meeting of the new federation will be held in Tokio on May 1. The name of Keisaburo Moriyama, a retired Vice-Admiral, is being mentioned in connexion with the presidency of the union.

A similar union that will also be inaugurated on May Day is that decided on by the employees of the various electric railway companies operating within and in the neighbourhood of the city of Osaka.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING, Mar. 21.—A mandate issued last night relieved Gen. Chang Fu-lai, Tuli of Honan, of the command of the 24th Division. SIX PLANKS ACROSS THE LAMAISTIC STYX

The Strange Philosophy of Eastern Tibet

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tachienlu, Sze., Feb. 5.

In lamaistic parlance there are six planks across the stream of time to the shore of rest—Nirvana. Some of these planks are rather precarious; some are fairly solid, and some are absolutely safe. These planks are also known as the "six" means by which the patient devotee crosses this sometimes peaceful, sometimes turbulent stream. Old Mortality, on a plank all his own—safer perhaps and surer than the others—crosses this not too certain current.

We shall get a very clear conception of popular lamaism if we bear firmly in mind the insurgent motive in the life of every lama. Stated very simply it is this: the lama is "here" and his one ambition is to get "there" and between "here" and "there" flows a stream and across this stream lies the realization of all his hopes and fears. "Here" in the lama's mind is a very bad, wicked, sinful place; "there" is unalloyed, rest, peace and satisfaction. In the every-day life of every lama there is every inducement to prolong his stay in this wicked, sinful place. In the study of lamaism—as in the study of any religion—we must bear in mind its two phases, the popular and the ascetic. We saw him dying when he prayed and praying when he died, is only a particular application of lamaism.

The ascetic phase is confined to the very, very few; the popular side has many devotees. While "here" in this wicked place, the lama's mind, like that of the follower of any other religion takes only very furtive glances "there." As we see it daily practised here in eastern Tibet, however, lamaism is both wealthy and religious and as a system, is quite prepared to make the best of both worlds. How the idea or desire, so often characterized by painful and protracted application originated, philosophical lamaism, as far as we know, is silent. The lama, born into this mundane world, finds himself at a very early age obsessed by a peculiar desire to seek a better country somewhere across the stream of time and having, as he imagines, things which this world cannot give nor take away.

AN ACCOMMODATING PHILOSOPHY.

The first plank or "means" across this stream is common to all religions—in fact is common to all mankind—namely, the "doing of good deeds." "You help me," says the Tibetan lama to the Tibetan layman, "And I'll help myself." The simple dictum "It is more blessed to give than to receive" is wretchedly abused by these desperate lamas. They have brought up to a very fine science the philosophy of the "Twice blest gift" and apparently the principle works, as the giver and receiver both seem to be blest and happy. In a land like Tibet the system of doing good deeds is absolutely necessary. Thousands of lamas gathered in large lamaseries won't work but are not ashamed to beg, and this begging bears the gentle name of "blessing."

How, why and when did this system begin? Is it possible it began in this way? Centuries ago the lama appeared and his appearance necessitated the art of living and to live without doing a very great amount of work, he was suddenly and fortunately struck by the following ingenious system, namely—"if I can only get someone to work and supply [illegible] butter, tea, tsamba, and clothes, I don't mind praying and praying very hard, if by that means we can both get across the stream of time, to the land of [illegible]-Nirvana." They say that all great religions have very simple beginnings and it is quite [illegible] of lamaism.

[illegible] are no less than 20,000 lamas in [illegible] Tibet. Suppose every one of them is bent on crossing from this wicked world to that better land, what unbounded opportunities the lay population have for doing good deeds and getting across too. For sheer accommodation this lamaistic invention of the "twice blest gift" is unsurpassed. There is considerable elasticity in the means available for getting across the first plank and the good deeds fall under three heads. First, the bestowing of goods. Our experience forces us to the conclusion that the wealthy lamas and opulent lamaseries in Eastern Tibet suffer much inconvenience in this way! To make the crossing sure the layman invests the lamasery with all his worldly goods and the lama encourages him to do so. The Tachieh. Litang and Kanze lamaseries have 9,000 names on the lama roll and into these lamaistic receptacles flows the great wealth of Eastern Tibet. The layman considers it, however, money very well spent as the blessing it brings is more than money can buy. Doing good deeds is the simplest and most convenient means used by the Tibetan in gaining the land of rest.

CASTING OUT DEVILS.

Second, the affording of protection. The Tibetan is surrounded at all times and in all places by eight peculiar dangers; a little kindly gift and the omnipotent lama will immediately deliver the terrified layman. Real or otherwise these eight "fears of life" have a tremendous influence over every Tibetan. They are, however, quite peculiar to the layman and the power to expel them is in some inexplicable way peculiar to the lama.

Third, the giving of moral instruction. How much is moral and how much is instruction depends very largely on who gives it and who receives it. The lamas we have met throughout Eastern Tibet are quite prepared to give ad infinitum all the moral instruction the people are able to pay for. The moral reader is known by the name of Amcho and the Tibetans wisely take the precaution to remove their valuables before he comes to read his moral instructions. Most of the Amchos here recite their readings from memory, in this way they are able to use their eyes very profitably while giving moral instruction.

MORAL GIFTS TO MANKIND.

The second plank across the stream of time to the land of rest—Nirvana—is the careful observance of the moral law. In Tibetan this is known as the Gan Jur and contains no less than 100 volumes and the second is like unto it, known as the Dan Jur. The first is the original and the second is the explanation thereof. [illegible] all [illegible] are spending their lives trying to observe this multitudinous, voluminous, religious treatise. [illegible] is nearly impossible. While people in other parts of the world are amassing fortunes, building empires, and enjoying life, the lonely lama in his solitary cell somewhere on the Roof of the World is daily turning his prayer wheel, reading his sacred book, counting his precious beads, and bending his mind patiently on a land where such things are unnecessary and unknown. Fortunately the contents of these 100 volumes are very little known otherwise the Forbidden Land would become one gigantic asylum filled with men spending their days and nights vainly working out their own salvation. The method followed is that adopted by other religions, namely, a careful selection of parts likely to be of material benefit to the general public. The lamas during different periods of history have made these selections and it would seem that they cover almost everything but prayers for those "in peril on the deep."

In Tachienlu there is a lama procession every year and the carrying of these sacred books forms part of it. Over 150 Tibetans carry these ponderous volumes on their backs, and it takes 40 yak to move them from one place to another. If the poor burdened lama had only these 40 yak loads of sacred books to contend with, his lot might not be so difficult after all, but when you add to these 40 yak loads the "Traditions of men," the poor lama groans beneath an unbearable burden. It is now difficult to know where lamaism begins and ends; what is sacred, what is tradition and what is otherwise.

THE PATIENCE PLANK.

The third plank across the stream of time is "The exercise of patience." Job is not a solitary sufferer in the afflictions of life. In the land of the lamas many a lonely lama suffers untold hardship and pain in the pursuit of his ideal. The patient exploration of the four truths or four realities demands the exercise of unbounded patience. The four realities are, pain, the origin of pain, the annihilation of pain, and the way of annihilating it. The pain of obsession—deliver me from this—is his daily cry. As he sits in his lonely cell, mumbling the words from the sacred page, the thought must oftimes come into his mind—why pain? And the lama's only answer to this question is—Nirvana—the absolute cessation of all motion and excitement, both of body and mind which is necessarily connected with personal existance; absolute rest, which by the lamas is thought to be the highest degree of happiness, imagined by some as perfect annihilation of existence, by others, more or less, only as a cessation of all that is unpleasant in human existence.

To the lama, existence is pain: life with all its joy and buoyancy is pain; denying the heart and mind their simple pleasures is pain. There is only one sweet and holy thing in life and that is hope and hope is absolute rest, found only across the stream of time. It is most unfortunate that lamaism should have cast this awful shadow over this land of eternal mountains and snow. The patient follower of this mystic cult rigorously denies to himself anything and everything that makes glad the heart of man and in doing so fights against Nature's instincts—this is pain indeed and this is lamaism. The patience plank is, therefore, necessary as the lama's heart beats just like the nigger's. Is it conceivable that such a religion could exist in any other country? The land—surrounded on all sides by high eternal snow mountains—the people, dark-robed brooding lamas—the religion, mysterious lamaism.

SALVATION BY INDUSTRY.

The fourth plank across this wretched stream is diligence. If the lama would make his calling and election sure, zeal and diligence are of course necessary. He cuts himself off severely, or is supposed to do so, from the women of Tibet and the women of this Forbidden Land are just as pretty and as handsome as the natives of any other country. Zeal and diligence in his monastic life are his only hope—steady adherence to his books and prayers and meditations, his only saviour. Therefore to keep some pretty face from disturbing him and his devotions he seeks refuge in some lonely cell or rockbound cave..

In a recent journey we were impressed by the number of laymen we met who had formerly been lamas. The pretty face, with all its charms, had conquered and the priest became a layman, a husband, and a father—but hope, the bright hope of Nirvana had gone out of his life. Apparently he had not been watchful enough or perhaps the tempest was too fierce for his frail barque.

PROJECTING ONESELF INTO HEAVEN.

Plank five across the stream of time, takes us very high in lamaistic adventure—contemplation. To have reached this distance in his high and holy aspiration, the lama has left behind him a blood-stained trail. There is only one thing between him and the realization of his highest hopes and that is his own contemplation. The other day my Tibetan teacher defined contemplation, as having your body on earth and your mind in heaven. What a tremendous task therefore the aspiring lama has put upon his mind—using it as a mighty lever to move him to the land of peace and rest. It reminds me very much of the manipulation of the huge cumbersome rafts on the Poyang Lake. This unwieldy pile of wood would move in whatever direction the anchor was cast. In the lama's contemplation it is somewhat difficult to discover whether the push or the pull works the harder. Between Dante's Inferno and Milton's Paradise the poor lama has a wretched time. The lama's hell has shades, departments, and tortures ad infinitum and his heaven is pictured as an elysium incomparably peaceful and quiet. If therefore contemplation will keep him out of one and get him into the other, he is prepared to work pretty hard and very steadily. What will happen when Labour touches this grinding system is still a matter of conjecture

LAST PLANK OF ALL

The last plank across this imagined stream is great knowledge. There is something peculiarly interesting about the tense of this last plank. The lama by his own exertion has acquired all the available knowledge in the world and having acquired it, he has put himself "there" though his body is still in the flesh "here." By wisdom, knowledge and learning he is beyond deception, above temptation, and past any possibility of falling away. He is indeed the superior man, assured of his inheritance and therefore placidly satisfied. Some books mention 10 planks or "means" by which the stream of time is crossed, we have confined ourselves simply to six and their popular interpretation.

Old Mortality moves slowly across the high Asiatic plateau in search of what are known as Mani mounds: these are piles of stones on which are placed stone slabs with the strange device, "O mani padme hum." Weather tells severely on these stone slabs and sometimes the strange device is hardly discernible. Old Mortality spends his life moving from one Mani pile to another making clear and plain the sacred words "O mani padme hum."

A GROUP OF LAMAS.

SPREADING THE RED GOSPEL

Reorganization of Soviet Rebel Factory

A new move by the Soviet, designed to enable Moscow to speed up the work of revolution and at the same time disclaim official responsibility, was reported in yesterday's "Russia Abroad," which obtained its information from a Moscow newspaper. The report states that in connexion with revolutionary activity in Great Britain and Italy, a new organization, known as M. O. P. R., (International Society for the promotion of revolution) has been formed at Moscow. In addition to strengthening the Soviet's hold at home, the new society will establish communistic centres abroad wherever Soviet Missions have been admitted. The Communistic Internationale will continue to function as general director in all official conferences, while the M. O. P. R. will deal with "practical matters." Thus, all allegations as to violation of treaties can be referred by the Soviet Government to the M. O. P. R., the latter being an organization in which no member of the Russian Government will take official part.

The same newspaper reports that the greatest revolutionary activity is at present being carried on in Germany, Italy, Poland, Bulgaria, Hungary, Jugo-Slavia, Turkey, Esthonia, Latvia, and Spain.

THE AUTOMATIC TELEPHONE

Forthcoming Introduction to Shanghai Public: First in the Eastern District

Shanghai will soon be introduced to the automatic telephone, for the local company is bringing them into active service within a fortnight. No longer will the fluent foreigner utilize his slender command of Chinese to curse the operator over the telephone, when something goes wrong, nor will he find any recourse to 499 necessary, as long he himself takes proper precautions with calling, nor will readers of the correspondence columns of the "North-China Daily News" chuckle to themselves over the real or imagined plight of another.

It is the intention of the Company to bring into harmonious union with the other exchanges of the Settlement, Central, West, and North between 700 and 1,000 automatic phones of the Eastern district which have been in the process of installation for the past months. The management has long realized that the human element is a more vicious problem in Shanghai than elsewhere, that with dozens of different nationalities attempting to use the many languages common to the vicinity and, in addition, the many Chinese dialects, brought by travellers, there is more confusion for the operators than the users of the instrument.

COMMERCE AND EFFICIENCY.

But the plant engineers throughout the world are continually studying progress of the telephone and are cognizant that the manual system, now common, is gradually being displaced in the various metropolises of the world. For the commercial world demands the most efficient service obtainable. So it was resolved to make the first step in the transition, beginning in the Wayside district, where the least number of phones would be affected, and from which the elimination of the manual and the universal adoption of the automatic system will be accomplished.

Although Manila has already this system in complete working order, Shanghai will have the largest automatic arrangement on the Asiatic Continent when all is finished and with the exception of Dairen will have the first on the mainland. Tokio, too, whose telephones were destroyed in the earthquake and fire of last September has determined to replace the old system with the most modern machine possible, while Bombay is following in the same path.

A PERFECT AUTOMATON.

The automatic telephone as now being installed is constructed by Messrs Ericsson & Co., a Swedish firm. It differs from the manual system in that the subscriber possessing one, actually does all the calling himself, by means of a dial on his instrument, having no recourse to central at all. The numbering system differs from the manual in that instead of having a name as East or Central before the number, another digit is set ahead. The rest is simple. He disengages the receiver from the cradle, inserts a finger into a slot numbered and brings it toward him until it will go no further. He then releases it and goes through the same procedure with the entire five digits, permitting in each instance the slotted dial to return to rest before proceeding. He is immediately connected automatically with the party desired, at whose home or office the bell rings.

Several ingenious mechanical (electrical) devices have been attached to the phone, informing one as to the condition of the line, whether busy, broken or ringing. Firstly, if the receiver is lifted and he hears a steady low toned buzz, he will know that the line is in working order; secondly, if he has got his number, long buzzes resembling telegraphic dashes will inform him that the bell at the other end is working, as, — — —, and thirdly, if the number is engaged he will hear short buzzes.

Under the proposed system if the caller has made a mistake in using the dial or desires to change for any reason, he must replace the receiver, otherwise the connexion will not be broken, and he must not hang up the receiver while awaiting a call or the connexion will be broken. In other words, the machine registers continually as long as the receiver is off its cradle. Jangling and shaking the receiver up and down will not bring him the slightest benefit, as a matter of fact, unless he, himself makes a mistake there will not be the slightest need for such procedure, because the automatic does not make mistakes, it is a perfect automaton; nor will one be forced to shout to someone to get off the line, because no one can get on while one is using it.

With the entire complement (Eastern District) in working order, subscribers there will be able to call each other on their own telephone and not call Central at all, but those in the other districts calling each other will not be affected, nor will they be affected when calling the section in question, for their operator will get into communication with the eastern exchange, where the automatic process will be done for them and, vice versa. Those in Yangtszepoo will call on their dial subscribers in the Central, Western or Northern districts, but the manual process must be used to complete the connexion. Numbers to 20,000 have been reserved for the Central section, between 20 and 30,000 for the Western, 30 to 40,000 for the Northern and 40 to 50,000 for the Eastern. When Shanghai has outgrown these 50,000, the numbers up to 99,999 can then be adduced with no material changes. A letter such as A. B. C. or D can be used for a prefix when the 100,000 mark has been reached as a letter and five numerals can be more easily remembered than six digits.

HOW IT WILL WORK.

The "North-China Daily News" will publish before the actual transfer a rather more detailed account of the new system, elaborating the finer and more technical points of the system, including the complex machine in the exchange, with its "make," contact points and the circuit breakers, made possible by induction coils, as well as a description of the automatic device for regulating the humidity of the exchange room, which does not allow the percentage of moisture in the air to go above 70.

The Telephone Company is to be complimented on its introduction of the most modern machine to Shanghai.

THE CUSTOMS CLOCK

An Old Servant Takes Leave of the Bund

By Mainspring.

It is not often a clock addresses a newspaper editor, but I, the Customs Clock, feel that the present critical moment in my history warrants a few words to the public.

The occasion is this: They tell me that in two or three weeks' time people called "housebreakers" are coming to pull down the Customs House, in which case it appears extremely likely that I shall have to part company with the Tower, in whose roomy quarters I have lodged comfortably for more than 30 years. What is going to happen to me then I really don't know. There is a strong rumour that the blighters are going to sell me for a paltry sixteen hundred taels or so, but I hope this is'nt true. It would be rather a mean trick, don't you think, after so many years of faithful service?

It is an unhappy thought that I may now be taking my last look down on the Bund, but anyway, there is the consolation of knowing that my removal will be regretted by many friends in Shanghai who have for years looked up to me and admired me for my uprightness, fidelity to duty, and the useful characteristic of saying what I mean in plain language everyone can understand. I have never minced my words, that's one thing, and generally have managed to say the right thing at the right time, which is more than most public servants can do. Moreover, I have always tried to address the public in the cheerful, inspiring manner of my brother Ben, of Westminster, (another well-known public character, by the way). In fact, I may mention that we are all famous, and come of a well known Greenwich family.

As I say, I had hopes that my services would be retained, but I hear another member of the family will be brought out and installed in the new tower, his chief recommendation being, I believe, that he will have a face three feet bigger than mine, and "face" as you know is an important matter in this country.

I have no idea where they are going to send me. Not to "Breezy Ningpo," I trust, or any outlandish outport of that sort. If I must be transferred to another station I would much prefer to be put on one of the posh new buildings in Nanking Road. I should then have the satisfaction of watching how the new-comer does his work, and also get in communication with the other big fellow coming to the Chinese Post Office on the other side of the creek. This one is a fine chap, they tell me, but talks rather too loudly, and very possibly will have his tongue cut out so as not to disturb patients in the General Hospital.

Well, sir, wherever they send me I shall no doubt continue to do my duty as heretofore. I am a young man yet, with a fine constitution and, like some of the young bloods of Shanghai, capable of doing great things when thoroughly wound up. I must confess, however, that at the moment I am feeling a bit run down.

I thought I would just write a word or two, in case it means saying good-bye to Shanghai, though I still have hope of being able to chime in now and again.

MAHJONGG AND MURDER

Mysterious Crime in Haining Rd.

A quiet game of mahjongg being played by four Chinese at a House in Haining Road Thursday night last week was sensationally interrupted by mysterious visitors, and two of the players met their death.

Shortly before 11 o'clock, these armed men knocked at the door of No. 495, a private house, and upon being admitted by a servant, went straight to the room where the game was in progress. Addressing a member of the party, one of the men said: "So you are Mr. Vung," straightway drawing a revolver and firing. Four shots were discharged and all took effect, the unfortunate Mr. Vung expiring almost immediately. One of the company who went to his assistance at the moment of the attack was also fired at, and received a fatal wound.

At present, the motive for the crime is a mystery, and nothing is known about Mr. Vung Tsangpiau except that he is connected with the stage, is a member of the Actors' Association, and arrived in Shanghai from Shaoshing a few days ago. The other man who was killel is a Mr. Li Fujen.

The three assassins bolted from the house immediately after the shots had been fired, and nearly half an hour passed before any alarm was raised or word given to the police. When the room was inspected later, the police found the empty cases of five .32 automatic pistol cartridges, and a spent bullet in the courtyard.

An inquest on the deceased was held at the Mixed Court last Friday, and a verdict of wilful murder was recorded.

EMPRESS LINERS IN SHANGHAI

Advantages of Coming Up River. Canada and Australia to Remain Outside

The experiment of bringing the Empress boats up river, a matter of some anxiety in view of their size, has been attended with complete success and the C.P.R. service to Shanghai instead of to Woosung may now be regarded as established.

For the time being, however, only the Empress of Russia and the Empress of Asia will be brought up to the Shanghai and Hongkew wharf, their length and tonnage being considerably less than those of the Canada and Australia, which will continue to disembark passengers at Woosung. The first two vessels have a length of 590 ft. and gross registered tonnage of 16,850, while the Canada's length is 650 ft. and the Australia's 615 ft. and their tonnage about 22,000, a difference in bulk which makes them more difficult to handle in the river. The other two vessels have been brought up without difficulty, and their berthing at the dock has been very greatly to the convenience of all concerned, three hours alone being saved by elimination of the tender service, to say nothing of the discomfort and delay experienced in rough weather.

Another improvement to the service which travellers will appreciate is that there is now through booking to Manila and, travelling from Shanghai, passengers will be able to remain with the boat during the two days' stop at Hongkong.

WEDDING

Green—Dewar

A very pretty spring wedding was celebrated on Saturday afternoon in Holy Trinity Cathedral, which was effectively decorated with blossoming boughs, when Miss Violet Baxter Dewar, daughter of Captain and Mrs. John Dewar, became the bride of Mr. Albert Edward Green, son of Mr. E. C. Green of Ardmore, Sudbury, England. The Very Rev. Dean Symons performed the ceremony, which was fully choral, with Mr. Young at the organ.

The bride, who was given away by her brother, Mr. J. G. B Dewar, owing to the illness of her father, was a picturesque figure in white charmeuse, cut with three circular flounces, and embroidered with crystal beads, with a spray of orange blossoms on the right shoulder. A long lace veil, held in place by a wreath of orange blossoms, fell in soft folds, forming a train. The bridal bouquet was of roses, sweet peas and orchids.

The bridesmaids, the Misses Anne and Jean Dewar, sisters of the bride, and Miss Doreen Holgate were dressed alike in mauve georgette with frilled skirts in three shades, and panels of silver lace. They wore hats of black crinoline with flowered rosettes and carried baskets of violets and heliotrope. The bride's mother was gowned in fawn georgette crêpe, with an overskirt of matching lace, and a georgette panel. She wore a brown hat and carried sweet peas.

The bridegroom was attended by Mr. W. R. Davison, as best man, and the ushers were Messrs. T. R. Banister, A. M. Bourne, W. S. Harvie and H. E. Jones.

A reception, attended by a large number of friends of the popular young couple, was held at the house of the bride's parents, 74 Avenue Road, which was artistically decorated with spring flowers. Dr. Ivy proposed the health of the bride. Among the numerous and handsome presents was a silver mounted blackwood tray suitably inscribed, the gift of the No. 1 Ranger Company of Girl Guides, of which the bride is a popular officer.

After receiving the best wishes of their many friends Mr. and Mrs. Green left to spend their honeymoon in Hangchow, the bride wearing a fawn silk knitted costume with ribbon hat to match.

SATURDAY NIGHT'S FANCY DRESS BALL AT THE CERCLE SPORTIF

THE CERCLE SPORTIF BALL: MME. DU PAC DE MARSOULIES AND A VENETIAN ATTENDANT AT THE LEFT HAND CORNER

Numbers were not the most notable feature of the masked ball held at the French Club on Saturday night, but those who attended enjoyed every moment of the frolic. The floor was just comfortably filled with dancers and the orchestra was never more popular. Between dances, the floor space was utilized by guests masquerading as schoolboys, apâches, and so on for such antics as kept the spectators in roars of laughter. Of course, there was the usual tango during the course of the evening and it was particularly enlivened by one inspired performer in beef-eater costume who whirled his partner through glides and turns of remarkable intricacy to the extreme delight of everyone. Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Meise, dressed as maids, were highly diverting as were also two unknown gentlemen disguised as rag dolls. The apâche group, which included Mme. Watrin, was also very good. M. Brault, as a Turk in bath towelling was most amusing.

Though the clownishly costumed provided the hilarity, there were also many beautifully apparelled and from behind protecting masks flirtations were carried on in the atmosphere of the "Bal Masque." Among the most beautiful dresses were the Venetian costumes of Mme. Du Pac's party in green and silver. This group received first prize in the award, while second prize went to Mme. Premet's group of white Pierrots. For ladies' costumes, Mme. Howell wearing a black costume sprinkled with stars received first prize. Mme. Nouveau as Columbine received second prize. For originality, Mlle. Lemière received first prize. She was dressed to represent a white rabbit with long flapping ears, pink eyes and mouth and white pom-pom tail. The first prize for couples went to Mr. and Mrs. Barraclough.

After the grand march at 12 o'clock, supper was served in the supper-room and the guests began to thin away at the psychological time when the pleasure of the evening was not yet dimmed by weariness.

SHANGHAI NEWS

WATERWORKS CO. AND THE COUNCIL

The Annual Report: Company's Offer to Sell and Council's Counter-Offer: Further Question for Ratepayers: Company's Complaint of 1905 Agreement

We have received from the Shanghai Waterworks Co., Ld., the report and statement of accounts which the directors will present at the annual meeting of shareholders on April 3, as follows:—

It will be seen from the accounts that the gross revenue for the year from all sources amounts to Tls. 1,366,056 as against Tls. 1,255,217.85 in 1922. and that the balance of Working Account transferred to credit of Profit & Loss Account is Tls. 573,375.74 as against Tls. 611,041.21 the previous year.

After writing off Tls. 110,732.01 for depreciation on permanent works, paying interest on debentures and sundry other items, the nett profit for the year is Tls. 167,866.45. To this must be added Tls. 29,594.85 brought forward from 1922, making a total Tls. 197,461.30.

An interim dividend of 10/- per share at exchange 3/0⅞ declared and made payable on July 31 last absorbed Tls. 109,485.71; to the balance of Tls. 87,975.59 it has been decided to add Tls. 40,000 transferred from Equalization of Dividend Fund, making the amount available for distribution Tls. 127,975.59, which the Directors recommend be disposed of as follows:—

	Tls.
To pay a final dividend for the year 1923 on 33,530 shares of 10/- per share = £16,705 at Ex. 3/2⅞	103,500.96
Carry forward to New Account	24,474.63
Tls.	127,975.59

The Directors regret the unsatisfactory result of the year's working, but as has been repeatedly pointed out, the Company is unable, at the rates fixed by the Agreement of 1905, to collect revenue commensurate with the increased cost of providing an efficient supply of water. Hitherto the balance of Working Account has been increased by the profit derived from the Fittings Department, but this year's result has been disappointing. The profit from the sale of water shows an increase over that of 1922.

COMPANY'S OFFER TO COUNCIL.

On April 13, 1923, the Directors informed the Municipal Council that they were prepared to recommend the shareholders to sell the Company's "business and undertaking and all the lands, buildings, plant, machinery and effects belonging to the Company," as at December 31, 1922, for the sum of Tls. 14,947,780.00 (subject to certain conditions), to which would have to be added further capital expenditure up to the date of purchase.

At the Ratepayers' Meeting held on April 19, 1923, the following resolution was passed:—

"That the Council be and it is hereby authorized:

(1) To take such action as may be requisite to exercise the powers of purchase vested in the Council under Clause 9 of the agreement made between the Shanghai Waterworks Company, Ld., and the Council, dated July 1, 1905 And, in the exercise of such powers, to purchase the business and undertaking of the said Company and all the lands, buildings, plant, machinery and effects belonging to the said Company, and

(2) To raise, upon terms and in such manner as the Council may, in its discretion, think fit, such sum as may be required to complete the purchase hereinbefore authorized, and following upon such purchase

(3) To carry on the business so purchased as a municipal undertaking on the general principles laid down in the report of the Special Electricity Committee 1915 and adopted by the Ratepayers Provided always that the Council shall not exercise the authority hereby granted until it shall have laid its views thereon before the ratepayers in a meeting assembled for this purpose by public notice, given 14 days in advance, and shall have taken the directions of such meeting thereon, whether or not there shall be a quorum of ratepayers present, as is required by the Land Regulations in the case of a Special Meeting of Ratepayers."

COUNCIL'S NEW PROPOSAL.

On January 18, 1924, the Municipal Council informed the Company that it was advised that the effect of passing the resolution stated above, with the proviso contained in Sub-section 3, was that the Municipal Council could not exercise the powers entrusted to it except with the authority of a Special Meeting of Ratepayers at which a quorum would be present and that under the circumstances it might be necessary to lay the whole matter de novo before the ratepayers at their next annual meeting. The Municipal Council stated further that it was prepared (subject to the ratepayers' approval to be sought at the next annual meeting) to purchase the Company's business and undertaking, etc., at a price to be arrived at on the basis of 15.3846 years' purchase of the profits earned during the year 1922 (i.e. capitalized at 6½ per cent.) and suggested that its letter be accepted by the Directors as an intimation of its intention to purchase, subject to confirmation at the next meeting of ratepayers. The Directors replied on February 22, 1924, stating that they were unable to agree that the price to be paid should be arrived at on the basis suggested by the Municipal Council, and that if the Municipal Council persisted in adhering to that basis, they saw no recourse but to appeal to arbitration. They suggested further that some compromise might be arrived at on the basis of a profit-sharing arrangement in lieu of purchase.

DEBENTURES AND EXPENDITURE.

Of the Tls. 300,000 debentures bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum offered for issue at the end of 1922, Tls. 100,000 debentures were taken up at the price of Tls. 107 per cent. and Tls. 200,000, debentures at the price of Tls. 105 per cent.

Capital expenditure during the year amounted to Tls. 236,087.61; details will be found in the Engineer-in-Chief and Manager's Report.,

A small piece of land on Wetmore Road, Yangtszepoo, has been sold.

Tls. 12,000 has been transferred from Stocks Reserve Fund to Working Account to make up for the loss on certain fittings sold at less than cost.

Directors:—Mr. A. W. Burkill resigned from the Board on his departure from Shanghai on leave, and Mr. C. R. Burkill was appointed a Director in his place. Mr. A. W. Burkill was reappointed to the Board on his return, and Mr. C. R. Burkill resigned. Mr. L. J. Cubitt was reappointed a Director on his return from leave when Mr. L. E. Canning resigned. Mr. C. G. S. Mackie has resigned from the Board.

In accordance with the Articles of Association, Mr. A. W. Burkill retires from the Board, but, being eligible, offers himself for re-election.

THE NEW BICYCLE RICSHA

Ingenious Device to Increase Speed Comfort and the Driver's Dignity

Residents in the French Concession in the vicinity of Route Doumer and of the roads near by in the Model Settlement, as well as pedestrians on some of the central highways, have been surprised, to say the least, at a new form of vehicle, rubber-tyred with four wheels, but with motive power furnished by a coolie, riding astride what appeared to be a bicycle.

To the casual roamer of Shanghai roads, with their high-power motors, brokers' traps and ricshas, this was indeed a strange sight, for it seemed to be a combination of a reduced old style, big front wheel bicycle with a rather swanky-looking, but low-swung ricsha attached behind. The puller, or in justice we may say, pusher, for the energy was supplied by a downward pressure on pedals, did not seem to be ill at ease, but rather looked as if he enjoyed his task, not because of the novelty of the arrangement, but perhaps because of the quiet, easy sedate movement, and still more from a sense of superiority over his fellow workers.

After some little persuasion the coolie permitted a test to be made as to the riding qualities and a representative of the "North-China Daily News" got into the seat, after which he calmly mounted the bicycle, stepping right over the saddle; it is a ladies' type of cycle with no cross-bar. He slowly applied his feet to the pedals and the ride was begun. There was no jerk at all and the motion was smooth and forward with not the usual up and down motion so common to the ricsha as it is trotted along, but there was a sinuous side-to-side motion until the ricsha was well under way. The passenger sits lower than in an ordinary ricsha and one seems more at ease with nothing before one but the strong back and pedalling limbs of the coolie.

THE MODUS OPERANDI.

The vehicle is the first of the pedicabs which are now being considered by the authorities for use in Shanghai streets. A closer inspection at the garage in which it was kept showed it to be a simple mechanical machine—two wheels in a line, the forward one 26 in. in diameter and the other, where the traction is applied, 18 in. To the rear are two more 26 in. rims upon the axle of which is set the body swung on inverted elliptical, three-leaf, springs. The centre of gravity is thus very low. A detachable top is attached for summer or winter. Although the machine is constructed in two parts, the ricsha and bicycle, a very ingenious swivel joint is provided and a lock-pin is inserted into openings to connect them, while the swivel allows for plenty of action laterally. On either side of the pin have been placed springs, probably two inches wide and three inches long, which act as shock absorbers, so that the passenger gets none of the jolts that come to the puller, while the springs permit the coolie to overcome the inertia of his own portion before effort is required on the other part.

The nine-and-a-half foot vehicle is easily controlled by the foot-brake, which reacts just as the usual bicycle brake does, but for emergencies still another brake is provided, by means of a lever just under the fingers gripping the handlebars, which, when applied, sets two cleats in the grooves of the rim of the front wheel. On the other side of the handlebar is another lever which alters the gear of the transmission to make the coolie's work easier over hills and upgrades.

TRY IT YOURSELF.

A personal test was made and though 12 years had elapsed since our representative had ridden a bicycle, and all overcoated as he was, he had no difficulty in managing the mechanism, the only difficulty experienced being in negotiating the curves, for which a double joint is provided, the swivel in the centre and the fork under the handlebars.

We have been informed that an ordinary test run was made from Route Doumer to the Astor House in 20 minutes, while on another occasion the run from the same place to the Municipal Building was completed in just over 12 minutes. This is the 12th model constructed in Brussels and it seems, with the central traction wheel and double joint, to overcome the difficulties of the previous experiments.

Captain Vadim J. Polynine, the sponsor, has just arrived in Shanghai, after a world tour, and comes direct from Belgium and Paris, where the tests were completed.

TO HONGKONG IN FIVE HOURS

Chinese Report of Southern Aeroplane Service

It was reported last Friday in the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce," that a Chinese interested in aviation is about to raise $200,000 capital for the establishment of an aeroplane passenger and postal service between Shanghai and Hongkong.

The scheme, as outlined by this report, provides for two daily services, express and ordinary. The express service will have one stop, at Yenping in Fukien, in the course of the 750 miles of journey, while five stations are proposed for the ordinary service, viz., Ningpo, Wenchow, Foochow, Amoy and Swatow, the express doing the run in five hours and the ordinary in 8½.

It is suggested that, at the outset, $150 will have to be charged for the single journey, a fare which would be reduced if the venture proves a success. The Chinese credited with this enterprise is a Mr. Dun Nan, who lately came to Shanghai from America and has returned there for the purpose of arranging details of the scheme.

FIRE ON JAPANESE STEAMER

Cargo Reported Damaged

Wireless messages were received in Shanghai last Friday morning stating that fire had broken out in the hold of the T.K.K. str. Korea Maru, just outside the mouth of the river.

The fire, which was confined to the No. 3 hold, filled with tobacco, had got a good start and was not noticed until the smoke was seen oozing from between the hatch combings, whereupon steam was turned into the affected area from the engine room. These methods, however, did not prove at all sufficient and while the vessel was still outside, the Deputy Chief Officer of the Fire Brigade with 15 men proceeded by launch at 10.15 to Woosung to meet the burning vessel. At 2.30 in the afternoon, the Customs fire float proceeded to the scene but was informed that assistance was not necessary.

The cargo is reported damaged. It is thought that the fire may smoulder for a considerable period without being completely extinguished, but with absolutely no danger to the vessel or crew.

OBITUARY

Mr. N. B. Leighton

We regret to announce the death, which took place on Wednesday at the General Hospital following an operation for appendicitis, of Mr. N. B. Leighton. He was only 24 and had not been in Shanghai long, joining the firm of Hall & Holtz last September, and remaining with them until taken to hospital. He belonged to the Field Artillery Battery, in which he was a popular figure and an enthusiastic Volunteer. His brother, Mr. E. C. Leighton, arrived in Shanghai on Wednesday evening from Tientsin to learn the sad news.

PRESIDENT TSAO KUN has promoted Admiral Tu Shih-kuei, Commander-in-Chief of the Chinese Navy, to High Admiral of the Seas.

RESCUE BY THE I. C. S. KWONGSANG

Crew of Lights-Tender Saved After Two Days Without Food and Water

On Friday last the Indo-China Steam Navigation Co.'s str. Kwongsang, en route from Swatow to Shanghai, when 35 miles southwest of Ockseu came upon a dismantled rudder-less junk, exhibiting signals of distress.

The Kwongsang was manœuvred alongside and the distressed vessel was found to be a Lights Department tender of the Chinese Maritime Customs. Twelve men and a dog were taken off in a more or less exhausted condition, having been for two days without food or water.

The vessel had left Tung-yung lighthouse, bound for Foochow with mail, etc., on the morning of March 17. She lost her rudder and mast in a strong gale the same evening and had drifted and sailed under jury rig 140 miles to the southwest in the four days that passed before she was picked up.

After receiving every care and attention on the Kwongsang, the rescued men, with their dog, were transhipped, on March 21, to the Japanese str. Kaju Maru, which was bound for Foochow, where their homes are.

Captain W. F. Bichard is master of the Kwongsang, a vessel he has commanded for many years.

AMERICAN INSURANCE

Another Company Begins Business in Shanghai

Another American insurance company has begun business in China, viz., the International Life Insurance Co., of St. Louis, who have set up their offices in the "North-China Daily News" building, No. 17 the Bund. From information supplied to us by the company (whose representative is Mr. A. K. Taylor) we understand that for some months past the company has been in operation here, re-insuring the excess liabilities of the Asia Life Insurance Co. It will undertake all the usual forms of insurance, from whole life to endowments. The International Life Insurance company is rated as one of the most enterprising and successful of the younger American companies. It was organized in 1908, under the insurance laws of the state of Missouri, said to be among the strictest in the country in supervisory insurance legislation, and has made steady progress. The International Life was one of the first of the American companies to deposit with its State pledges of approved securities to cover legal reserves on all outstanding contracts. Last year the company wrote business amounting to over G.$60,000,000, an increase of 65 per cent. over the previous year, and one of the best showings made among the American companies. The insurance in force now totals G.$165,000,000. The company has a paid up capital of $787,000, assets $20,703,424 (1922), and a surplus of $1,904,239 (December 31, 1922). The company has offices in 32 of the American States, and in Hawaii, and the new step in China is said to be the first move in a general expansion in the Orient.

THE Chinese Ratepayers' Association has once more addressed a letter to the provincial authorities requesting that their annual subsidy of $12,000 be paid as usual. The financial commissioners at a recent conference struck out this item from the provincial budget.

THE Chapei Silk filature calamity continues to agitate the Chinese of the district, and the latest proposal is that the Military Governor should step in and appropriate the insurance money on the building—said to amount to $110,000—and distribute it among the families of the victims. A full list of the dead is being got ready with this object in view.

THE PURIM BALL

Attractive Gathering at the Carlton

The annual Purim Ball which was held on Wednesday at the Carlton Café under the auspices of the Hebrew Relief Society and the Jewish Women's Benevolent Society was highly enjoyable and successful in its two-fold purpose of giving pleasure to those participating and providing assistance for the less fortunate. At the end of the ball room the six-pointed Star of Solomon blazed out over the stage, with an illuminated "Welcome" beneath, while the initials of the societies H.R.S. and J.W.B.S. stood out on either side of the archway behind whose curtains were concealed the mysterious beauties of the Turkish Café. The stage itself and the steps leading up to it were banked with potted plants and narcissi tastefully arranged.

Mr. E. S. Kadoorie, who has recently returned from a lengthy trip to Europe and America, was the evening's guest of honour, and shortly before ten o'clock declared the ball open, saying that he thanked the committee for inviting him to open the ball and appreciated the honour paid him. He added that he hoped those present would remember the character of the Purim festival, a season of good-will and happiness for all, but an anniversary which could not be fully enjoyed without thinking of those less fortunate, the poor and needy for whose benefit that evening was arranged. Many destitute refugees had come to Shanghai seeking work which they had been unable to obtain and it was for those present to remember their sufferings in the midst of their merry-making.

Mr. Kadoorie went on to say that everybody knew of the good work being done by these relief agencies and that their future work depended largely upon the financial success of the entertainment so that he hoped every one present would do his best to make the evening all that could be wished for. The speaker closed with words of appreciation for those who had worked so hard in the preparations for the ball and wished them the success they so richly deserved. After these words the Jewish National Authem was played and following that, Mr. Kadoorie opened the ball with Mrs. Hoorin.

TURKISH ATTIRE.

The ladies of the committee were attractively costumed in 18th century garb or in Turkish attire, the last group attending in the picturesque Café where Turkish coffee, cigarettes and sweetmeats were served. Mesdames Shainin, Holper, Lipkovsky, Samsonovich and Podpakh were among the Turkish group in the coffee room which rich Oriental rugs, handsome brasses, softly shaded lights and luxurious cushions made very attractive.

During the evening musical numbers and special dances added to the pleasure of the audience. Mrs. Julius Rosenfold sang "Vilanelle:" Mme. Karinskaya gave Russian songs in costume; two numbers were contributed from the ballet of the Midnight Follies, under the direction of Mr. Holt; Mr. Harmon sang "Roses of Picardy" and "My Hero"; and Mrs. O'Hara sang "Kiss Me Again" and "Sweetest Story Ever Told."

Alluring raffles found many patrons, as did the sweets, kewpies, and flowers offered for sale. The prizes offered for the most handsome and original costumes were: for the ladies a Venetian glass perfume atomizer and a beaded hand bag; for the gentlemen a crystal clock and leather pocket book. Many clever and artistic fancy costumes were seen.

The profits of the evening were most satisfactory and included a gift of $1,000 from Mr. E. S. Kadoorie. The prize for the most beautiful costume, gentleman's, was awarded to Mr. Peter Li, who wore an English costume of the 18th century, further decorated with electric lights which twinkled on and off. The prize for the lady's costume went to his partner, a young Chinese girl in a costume of the same period. The most original costumes were voted to be those representing a sewing machine, the hat being a perfect representation of the head of a "Singer" with representations of the other parts scattered over the suit; and a pretty "sun flower."

VISIT OF JAPANESE NAVAL SQUADRON

A Week of Entertainments

Officers and men of the Japanese naval squadron, which arrived at Woosung on Saturday morning, and is now at anchor in the river, are having a busy week of entertainment and sightseeing.

The squadron is composed of 13 destroyers, headed by the Kitakami, the flagship of Rear-Admiral Iida. On Saturday afternoon, the Japanese Consul-General (Mr. S. Yada), and leading Japanese residents, visited the flagship to welcome the squadron, the reception being also attended by commanding officers of all the foreign men-of-war in port. The compliment was returned on Sunday morning, when Rear-Admiral Iida and members of his Staff visited the various men-of-war. In the afternoon, he paid a visit to the Defence Commissioner, Gen. Ho Feng-ling, Admiral Lin, Commander-in-chief of the Chinese Navy, and Mr. Hsu Yuan, Commissioner for Foreign Affairs. In the evening, the Japanese Consul-General gave a banquet at his residence, the function being attended by the commander and officers of the squadron and various Chinese Naval, Army and civil officials.

On Monday morning there was a special parade of 1,500 sailors and officers, who marched to the Japanese naval cemetery, which is situated near Hongkew Park, to pay a tribute to comrades who are buried there, and the rest of the day was spent in sightseeing, various parties being arranged to visit various places of interest. Soochow was visited by a large party of officers. In the evening, the Admiral and officers were entertained by Japanese residents at a dinner, held at the Nippon Club, and on Tuesday night a similar function was held on board the flag ship, leading Japanese residents and Chinese officials being guests.

RECEPTION ON THE FLAGSHIP.

A reception was given on Wednday afternoon by Rear-Admiral Iida, Commander-in-Chief of the Japanese squadron now in port, on board the flagship Kitakami and was attended by upwards of 150 prominent Japanese and Chinese residents, including Mr. Yeh Wei-chuen, director of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Zee Pin-we, manager of the Foh Tah Co., and Mr. T. K. Yung, general manager of the Sung Sing Cotton Spinning and Weaving Company, Admiral Iida, welcoming the guests said, briefly:—

In making a trip to Shanghai and Hankow, we have no special mission whatever; we have merely extended to China our yearly cruise which we have hitherto confined to the waters of Japan. That during our visit here, short as it is, we have been daily cordially welcomed and entertained by various quarters, foreign, Chinese, and Japanese, is a matter for which we are grateful from the bottom of our hearts. The fact, in particular, that there seems to be no misunderstanding on the part of the Chinese public about our present visit to this country is most gratifying to me and is what I have heartily hoped, for we, as Japanese subjects, with the people of Japan in general, are always endeavouring to promote friendship not only with the people of China, but also with all the nations in the world. It is in fact most encouraging and satisfactory to note that the agreement reached at the Washington Conference in favour of the restriction of armaments has completely dispelled our apprehensions about the probable occurrence of another war. Indeed, it is gratifying to see, for the sake of world's peace as well as for humanity, that all the Powers are faithfully living up to the Washington Agreement with the lofty idea of avoiding hostilities among them so that peace and order may be maintained.

CORRESPONDENCE

EDUCATION AND CHINESE CHILDREN.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Does the report of the Educational Commission recently published meet squarely the question as to the responsibility of the Municipal Council for the education of Chinese children living within its jurisdiction?

The report of the Education Committee of 1911 is clear in this regard. It states that (1) the Council has no absolute duty to undertake the education of Chinese children; (2) the Council should aim at a model training of a limited number rather than a general scheme of education; (3) that as regards elementary education Chinese should have the same facilities as those outside but no more; (4) that in respect of secondary education the Council should regard it sympathetically, assist where the Chinese were themselves willing to assist, and also assist the Polytechnic School.

Does the Educational Commission of 1923 accept this policy or does it feel that this policy should be altered?

Speaking for ourselves, we would like to see the Council definitely recognize its responsibility for the education of Chinese children within its jurisdiction, particularly as regards the need for primary education.

We understand that several influential Chinese bodies including the Chamber of Commerce, the Ningpo Association and the Chinese Y.M.C.A. have recently addressed the Council asking that special attention be given to the subject of primary education. The Shanghai of to-morrow is dependent upon the generation that is now growing to maturity. The future of the Settlements depends upon the preparation that the children of to-day are given. Every civilized government is doing its utmost to eradicate ignorance which is recognized as a curse and blight, to be tolerated only as long as necessary.

Some one should speak a word in behalf of the thousands of children who will grow up without the opportunity of an education unless something is done by us to-day to prepare the way.

For this necessary education we cannot depend upon private initiative. The Commission does not give figures showing the growth in number of private schools since 1911, but we venture the opinion that the number of such institutions has not kept pace with the growth in population.

It is our pride that so much is done in the Settlements to make it a "model" from the standpoint of good roads, and sanitation. We spend money, lots of it, upon these. In addition we have the police department and the volunteers and a band and orchestra. Are we doing our duty in the education of Chinese boys and girls?

We have heard much said lately about Shanghai's being the second largest port in the world. Great plans are afoot to increase the harbour facilities. We are to become a bigger Shanghai. Will we also become,—can we become a better Shanghai, if we do not have larger plans for the training in schools of the future citizen?

We do not know the practice in other countries, but we do know that, in America, education—particularly primary education—is accepted generally as an essential function of municipal government fully as much as road upkeep, sanitation, police and public utilities. No municipal government in that country would dare to ignore its responsibility for educating the rising generation. Do we want to be known as neglecting this responsibility, or, to put it better, of missing this opportunity to give the children that are living in our midst that education which will equip them for life?

It may not be possible to do all that we would like in the immediate future. The task is a great one, and will cost money. Yet, even now, is it not possible to lay foundations for a scheme of education that will make it possible in the future for every deserving child to have an education at least through the primary grades? Is this not the duty of the Council, rather than to continue to build up a few expensive middle schools which only the well-to-do can attend? The schools, as far as they go, are excellent except that a school can hardly be called a "model" which is expensive and subsidized from municipal funds far beyond what any other institution can afford.

Shanghai does not spend as much on the education of the Chinese as it does for the Volunteer Corps, only a little more than half the cost of the fire brigade and only one-third more than is required for the orchestra and band.

The municipality of New York in 1914 spent 28 per cent. of its annual current budget on education. The figures for Chicago are 27 per cent. and for Washington, D. C. 21 per cent. In comparison the figures in our budget are pitiably small.

We are not presuming to say that the situation in Shanghai is analogous with the cities above mentioned. What is done in those cities is the result of growth of public sentiment in favour of education. What we do urge, however, at this time, is that the Municipal Council take into its purview the whole educational task and begin at once to lay the foundations of a plan which will culminate in the ideal at some time in the future. Anything less that this is unworthy of the best aspirations of this community which is set in a position where its influence is large among the peoples of Asia.

The report of the Commission does not point the way to this goal. It seems to have taken for granted that the ratepayers are not prepared to spend money on education as one of the functions of municipal government. We do not feel proud of this implication. Nor do we feel proud that we have only 1,281 Chinese in municipal schools and a current budget of Tls. 181,900 in the Settlement with a population of nearly a million.

We think it only fair that the question should be raised for discussion in the columns of the papers and at the annual ratepayers meeting.

I am, etc.,
W. W. LOCKWOOD.

Shanghai, Mar. 24, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. W. W. Lockwood opens a discussion in your columns with the following question:—

> Does the report of the Educational Commission recently published meet squarely the question as to the responsibility of the Municipal Council for the education of Chinese children living within its jurisdiction?

The conclusions of the Commission on this subject were expressed in these terms:—

> "There appears to be no absolute obligation on the Council, certainly no legal obligation under the Land Regulations, to undertake the education of the children of Shanghai."
>
> "The Council is not compelled to educate the children, nor can the Council compel parents to educate their children."
> "In discussions on education in Shanghai it seems to be frequently forgotten that Shanghai is an extraterritorial Port and not a Colony."

In any discussion that may take place it is to be hoped that participants will bear in mind this essential factor in the situation, viz., "that Shanghai is an extraterritorial Port and not a Colony" and, I would add—not a place in the U. S. A., or in Europe, or in any other land, except that Shanghai is a place in China!

I think the Education Commission met this question both squarely and fairly and the answer to Mr. Lockwood's query is distinctly in the affirmative.

Throughout his letter I notice he uses the pronoun "we" in preference to the personal pronoun "I," therefore I gather that he is writing on behalf of the Chinese Y.M.C.A. organizations which he represents.

Now most people will be willing to acknowledge the varied activities of those whose personal interests lie in the direction of that vast organization dealing with the "Commerce of Uplift" known as the Y.M.C.A., and many of us have an admiring wonderment for the admirable and most efficient publicity methods which, it almost seems, regard the Universe itself as subsidiary to the "Y" and the wherefores of such industrious and busy people.

So efficient are these methods of publicity that a short time hence I verily expect to read the chronicle of the mere passing from one side of the street to another of distinguished and even lesser distinguished officials and members of the male and female "Y" organizations which abound in our midst.

I dwell on this aspect of "Uplift" for a moment because it is an interesting phenomenon in modern life.

The constant Conferences of Universal, World, International, National, and Local Committees held at the four corners of the earth and the constant peregrinations of the Uplifters in rushing from one place to another are recorded in the columns of the daily press with an industry and precision that do the utmost credit to the Publicity and Propaganda sections of these enterprises.

I can bear witness myself to the ubiquitous diligence of "Uplift" for, when I published a letter some time back dealing with the rickshamen of Shanghai I was immediately pursued by a charming virgin from the Y.W.C.A., who, when she caught me, presented me with a "questionaire"—a long list of questions about the rickshamen, their wives, their children, their family affairs and much else beside, which she desired me to answer. On inquiring of my delightful interrogator the "Y" and the wherefore of her curiosity she informed me that my letter about the rickshamen had stimulated the interest of her Committee—(I forget whether it was a World, International, National, or which species of Committee it was, but no matter)—and that they wished to gather a docket of information about the ricsha in Shanghai to forward it to the League of Nations at Geneva where, no doubt, it would be on the agenda for discussion when the next World's Conference of Corresponding Secretaries of the Federated Sections of the National Committees of the International Bureaux of the Young Men and Young Women's Christian Associations of Both Hemispheres should meet.

I do not know what happened but, for me, life is too short and precarious to begin the task of answering the questionaires of "Uplift," but I asked that charming lady to convery my respects to the National Secretary of the International Committee of the World's Conference and my satisfaction at knowing that any humble words of mine should have been the medium for bringing to their attention, and under their purview, the matter of Shanghai rickshamen.

One has to be careful when writing to the papers nowadays for any stray word may incontinently disclose a fresh "Need" of mankind to be heeded by those worthy people who engage in the Commerce of Uplift.

They seem always on the lookout for "Needs"—in fact, "Needs" are needed as the daily bread of Uplift much as bread needs kneading by the common or garden and industrious baker.

Thus when Mr. Lockwood opens discussion about the education of Chinese children in these Settlements and tells us that the Council must begin to spend millions in achieving this new "ideal" that he discovers, I enter the lists in direct opposition to his views.

He is entitled to go to the U.S.A., and start a "drive" for as many millions of their excellent gold dollars as he can get and bring them back to Shanghai and commence to teach every Chinese child in the Settlements the rudiments of Business Systems and the intricacies of Basket

DISASTROUS FIRE IN "SHANGHAI TIMES" OFFICE AND SILK GODOWN

The Building Completely Gutted: A Difficult Fire to Fight: Sheets of Greasy Flame and Smoke: Several Firemen Nearly Suffocated

One of the worst fires that has ever occurred in Shanghai broke out on Thursday night in the "Shanghai Times" building at the corner of Soochow and Museum Roads at 7.20 o'clock and completely gutted the entire structure, consuming the silk goods stored in the three upper floors and damaging beyond repair most of the expensive printing presses and linotype machines on the ground floor, as well as destroying a new supply of paper which had been just brought in.

Five firemen were overcome with smoke and the pulmotor had to be resorted to in order to bring them back to consciousness, two of them being brought from the ruins on stretchers by their comrades. One of the foreigners slipped from his post on the ladder just above Chief Officer Pett and fell on to his shoulders and was carried down by his superior, who himself was later affected by the smoke, but who returned in a few minutes to direct the fire fighting operations. Two of the Chinese, though restored by the motor, had to be taken to hospital where they are doing nicely.

The building was a blazing furnace within a few minutes after discovery and flames shot through all the windows in an oily mass, baffling the firemen and driving them down from the extension ladders placed alongside the fiery cavern. But they returned again, lines in hand, only to retreat once more. Towers then had to be erected in the roadway and the high pressure jets run to the top, where a single man directed the nozzle, lashed at the highest point. It was a valiant struggle and shortly after 9 p.m. it appeared as though the battle was done. However, with renewed fury the flames burst out again more intensely than ever and great fears were entertained for the walls themselves. The upright ladders had to be moved back, for it seemed as if even iron and steel could not resist the heat of the raging fire. With an additional motor adding its strength and with the application of another line from Chapoo Road run all the way across the Chapoo Bridge and yet one more from a distant hydrant in Museum Road, 300 yds. distant, everyone thought that the Brigade must win. But the silk in the building burned like gasoline itself.

THE ROOF FALLS IN.

Although at this stage the flames seemed to have eaten themselves out it was but for a few moments, and a tremendous gas pressure, growing from underneath the glowing mass of silk, burst out and the heavy iron fire shutters, clamped and looked over the windows, burst out with resounding crashes and the revived mass of fire streamed out, lighting the sky all round. This was shortly followed by the expected collapse of the roof, through which aperture showers of sparks shot into the heavens. Increased activity by the Brigade centred on the seething mass now. Seven streams were directed from the roof of the Eastern Garage and the alleyway between and additonal jets from behind and from Museum Road until not less than a score were flowing steadily.

Shortly after midnight the bare walls of the building remained, though the heavy wooden beams obstinately burned on, while the contents which had dropped to the bottom as successive floors gave way, were ultimately precipitated to the ground floor. The oxygen sucked in below fed the fire and it rose through the upper storeys.

THE FIRST WARNING.

The first warning of fire came from Miss Lucille Douglas, society reporter attached to the "Shanghai Times," who was returning from the Linotype room at the rear of the building and saw the flames burst down through the ceiling from the floor above. The office boy dashed for the telephone and the Brigade was on its way within the minute, but it was much too late to salvage anything at all. For the flames, it seemed from all reports, had begun in the godown above and had already gained a strong hold when they burst through below. As a matter of fact the Soochow Road Fire Station just over the way not 30 yds. distant, were not aware that anything was wrong until the telephone call came through.

Everyone set to hurriedly to save what he could and a few records from the lower front office were carried out, and even after the arrival of the engines a few files came to safety, but the smoke grew so thick that it was impossible to see through it and further permission to enter the building was refused.

FIREMEN NEARLY SUFFOCATED.

It was in the early stages of the catastrophe that the firemen were hurt, one foreigner and one Chinese in particular being so badly overcome that stretchers were utilized to carry them down the ladders. The minute they were got to the ground they were hurried to a rear corner, the intersection of Museum and Hongkong Roads, and first aid given. Before it was known that they had been hurt, a call had been sent in for the Rescue Van, S.F.B., which has two pulmotors for such emergencies. Blankets were thrown on the sidewalk and the men placed on them. The hood of the motor was quickly attached to the bridge of the nose and the machine began to pump clean air into the lungs. Within a few moments the men opened their eyes. After an hour of fire fighting another man went under, but the pulmotor was barely attached when he got up and pushed the mask away. Dr. O'Hara was called in and superintended the reviving. The others recovered without the external assistance.

EASTERN GARAGE AND LYCEUM.

Luckily the flames were confined to the building in question, for had the slightest assistance been given them by the wind, they would have made short shrift of the B.-A.T. building opposite on Museum Road, which is now undergoing extensive remodelling and the dry lumber and unfinished state of the walls being reconstructed, would have made proper food for the blaze. A very bad backdraft sucking round behind the burning structure and coming to the front through the Eastern Garage nearly ruined the eyes of the men below not equipped with masks. As far as the Szechuen Road Bridge the acrid, oily and acid-laden smoke made it almost impossible for the spectators, who thronged to the scene, to get through. The Lyceum Theatre directly behind but separated by a 15 ft. alleyway, was not in the path of the flames. The entire force of coolies, chauffeurs and staff at the Eastern Garage had a few anxious moments until the cars were all removed.

Masses of people crowded round near the building; but when some danger of falling walls threatened, with the exception of the police and press representatives they were forced either over the Bridge or on to the lawn adjacent to the Rowing Club. Another added danger lay in the fact that high tension wires strung near by, might break and some one be electrocuted.

In consequence of the fire the Quaints could not give their performance at the Lyceum.

Many of the large number who came to attend "The Beggar's Opera" by the artistes went inside and assisted members to remove their belongings, all of which were brought out, with no damage excepting by some smoke and water.

We have been informed that the building is the property of Mr. E. S. Shahmoon, while a portion of the silk stored within belongs to Pohomull Bros. A well-authenticated rumour has it that a short time ago cargo to the value of Tls. 3,000,000 had been placed within. Mr. E. A. Nottingham is proprietor and manager and Mr. G. Burton Sayer, editor of the "Shanghai Times." Insurance will cover a portion of the loss.

UNDER CONTROL.

The flames continued to burn fiercely until half an hour after midnight, by which time the building was gutted, scarcely more than the shell remaining, the iron guards at the windows glowing red with the tremendous heat. There appeared to be no danger of the structure collapsing, or of the fire spreading to adjoining buildings, but the Brigade had to remain in attendance for the greater part of the night.

FIRE IN COUNTRY CLUB

The placid pastures of the Country Club were disturbed on Thursday between 7 and 8 p.m. by the unusual excitement of a fire. Some of the members were playing billiards when, through the ventilator grating of the coffered ceiling in the extreme west end of the room, they noticed a light. It soon became evident that a fire had broken out, doubtless through a short circuit. The ceiling is high, there is no way into the roof and accordingly the Brigade were called up. They responded with their usual despatch, under the command of Deputy Chief Officer Dyson. But they, too, were for some time hampered in getting at the seat of the fire. Presently the flames burst through the roof, quite a brilliant display. They did not, however, penetrate to the billiard room. Now the Brigade had the roof well open and the fire was soon out. A good deal of water came down into the billiard room, but luckily not on the tables which had been carefully covered. Beyond the damage to the roof no great harm was done.

ARMED GANG IN THE FRENCH CONCESSION

Eight Robberies and the Murder of a Two-Year Old Chinese Girl During a Raid

The arrest of nine men by the French Concession police is believed to have laid by the heels a gang which has been busily engaged in crime not only in Shanghai but in Soochow and Hangchow as well. So far as the French Concession is concerned eight acts of armed robbery are alleged against them as well as the murder of a two-year old girl, while farther afield it is thought that they were engaged in piracy on boats using the creeks in the vicinity of the towns mentioned.

Th activities of this gang first came under the notice of the police in December last when an exchange shop in the Concession was raided. The robbers escaped with the money they had taken on that occasion, and they followed this act by further attacks on cigarette and other money-changing shops. The last occasion proved fatal to their designs, while this was also the worst of the crimes. As they were departing the alarm was given, and by way of intimidating the people in the place one of the men turned and fired a shot from an automatic pistol. A Chinese girl two years of age, was sitting in the shop at the time nursing in her arms a baby—her recently born sister. The bullet struck the girl in the forehead and killed her, but the baby escaped unharmed. The police were soon hot on the trail of the gang, and they were promptly rounded up.

Two automatic pistols, one of German make, were captured along with the men and there was also a revolver of heavy calibre. The fact of their possession of the latter weapon is held to indicate that these may be the men who have been practising piracy in Soochow and Hangchow. It is a larger weapon than the armed robber who confines his attention to cities usually carries, being hardly so convenient as an automatic, and, bearing in mind recent reports as to piracy on the creeks, the police are now communicating with the other centres for evidence which may possibly be used against this gang.

THE Peking Government has telegraphed to Mr. Hsu Yuan, the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, instructing him to prevent the secret sale of the Russian ships at Woosung.

THE RETIREMENT OF JUDGE LOBINGIER

His Services Acknowledged by American Bar Association

Members of the American bar gathered at the U. S. Court for China on Wednesday afternoon to pay a tribute to the fine work accomplished by the Hon. C. S. Lobingier during his record 10 years' of service as Judge of the Court. There was a good attendance, and special apology was made for the unavoidable absence of Mr. S. Fessenden, President of the Bar Association, who was away at an important Council meeting. In his absence, Mr. C. S. Franklin, vice-President of the Association, presided.

A presentation from members of the Bar was made to his Honour by Mr. P. M. Linebarger, the gift taking the form of a handsome embossed silver shield, with this inscription:

"To Charles Sumner Lobingier, First Judge of the United States Court for China to serve a full period, and the only Judge whose decisions were never reversed, this testimonial is presented in grateful acknowledgement by the members of the Bar of said court."

In making the presentation, Mr. Linebarger recalled hearing in 1904 of the appointment of "a man from Nebraska," (Judge Lobingier), to the Philippines' court, and a discussion as to why a man of such attainments and qualifications had been sent there. He arrived in the Islands towards the end of the revolution and, in addition to the exercise of his high legal knowledge, was soon seen to have the qualifications of a peacemaker. On one occasion he went out into the midst of the insurrectionists, and to this day suffered from the effects of the wounds he then received. In those days the Manila Court was a centre of intrigue and disagreeable gossip, and no Judge wanted to go there, but, by his straightforwardness, clear-headedness and diligence Judge Lobingier held this most difficult office as its senior for a very long period, consummate in the exercise of all the qualities required of an active legal mind. He had exercised the same strong influence for good in the U. S. Court for China, and had successfully and gloriously served his full term of service, with still the best years of his life before him. He had scientifically built up and established a system of law for the Court, and his record of not having had a single decision reversed would stand, the speaker concluded, as long as the court itself.

BLAZING THE TRAIL.

Mr. C. S. Franklin, in an appreciation of his Honour's work, said that, having himself occupied a similar position he could very well appreciate the difficulties under which Judge Lobingier had laboured. He thought there was no judicial position in the U. S., or probably in the world, equal in difficulty with that of the U. S. Court for China. Deprived of the assistance of a jury—upon whom so much responsibility could be shifted—the Judge of that court had himself to bear the burden of unravelling intricate questions of law and fact and traverse the entire field of extra-territoriality. Judge Lobingier had not only threaded this intricate maze without a reversal, but had plotted his course, blazed a trail for those who were to follow, and as long as there was an extraterritorial jurisdiction anywhere existing, his opinions and authority would be cited with approval.

Major C. P. Holcomb also expressed high appreciation of the work done by his Honour, and observed that there was a feeling not only of regret but almost of distress when it became known that he was not going to be re-appointed.

PROGRESS OF THE AMERICAN BAR.

In acknowledging the gift, and the expressions of appreciation—(all of which were very cordially applauded)—

Judge Lobingier said:—Mr. President and members of the Association: I am reminded this evening of the meeting held in this room nearly 10 years ago to organize the Far Eastern American Bar Association. I look back upon that event as one of the most important and gratifying during the whole period of my connexion with the Court. Previously, the Bar, which was then much smaller than now, was unorganized and therefore inarticulate and also incohesive. But by forming the Association it was provided with an authoritative organ for the expression of professional opinion, and by adopting the National Association's canons of ethics it established definite standards of professional conduct. Meanwhile, the Bar and the Association have grown, not only in numbers but in quality, and their continued support through this long period has been a source of strength for which I cannot find words adequate to express my gratitude.

In saying that the Association has grown in quality, I am glad to be able to add that steps have recently been taken which ought greatly to facilitate that line of growth. Some time ago the Bar Examining Board recommended to me that office study be no longer accepted for admission to the Bar, but that a Diploma from a recognized law school be required of each applicant. This recommendation was directly in line with the resolutions adopted at the Conference of Bar Association Delegates held in Washington two years ago last month at which I had the honour of representing this Association. Then, too, in common with others here, including, evidently, the Bar Examining Board, I had felt for some time that we have been somewhat lax in our requirements for admission and that we need the professional ideals, the standards, and the esprit de corps which accompany law school training. I had come to realize along with others that conditions would have been much better had we adopted such a requirement long ago. And so I was glad to give my approval to the Board's recommendation, and to make it a part of the rules for admission to the Bar. I feel sure that it will prove helpful to the Court and will insure a higher standard on the part of future members of this Association.

And I am very hopeful of the Association's future. It stands unique among the organizations in this part of the world and I feel that its career of usefulness is just beginning. For its loyal support of the Court and myself and for this superb expression of your confidence and esteem, I return my profound appreciation (applause).

LONDON BULLION

Samuel Montagu & Co.'s Report

Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co.'s report on the London bullion market dated February 21 is as follows:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 13th instant amounted to £126,259,895, as compared with £126,256,975 on the previous Wednesday.

There has been a moderate demand on Indian account for the fair supplies of gold available this week.

Gold valued at $5,500,000 has arrived in New York from London.

Last week the Imperial Bank of India raised its rate of discount from 8 to 9 per cent.

The "Financial Review" of New York dated January 12, 1924, has the following remarks regarding the gold output of North America during 1923:—

"In the United States, there was a smart recovery in output to approximately $50,000,000. This was largely attributable to increased copper production, with consequent by-product gold yield, as well as the stimulating influence of reduced mining costs and increased labour efficiency. Evidences of a substantial revival at Cripple Creek, Colorado, where spectacular ore finds prove of great depths, are particularly encouraging. In the Oatman district of Arizona, the shrinkage in production is growing acute. However, to offset this decline, California is gradually enlarging the scale of its gold output.

"To the north, in Canada, new discoveries and rapid developments give rise to the hope that increased production there may make up for the indicated impoverishment and decline of the great South African gold mines. The prolific Kirkland Lake gold zone has been followed for 40 miles eastward, into Quebec, where the Rouyn district holds great promise. The Larder Lake area is another important new accession. At Kirkland Lake the ore values have steadily increased with depth, so that the permanence of this bonanza district is now assured.

"In Porcupine, the 'Big Three'—Hollinger, Dome, and McIntyre—are steadily increasing their scale of operations, with ore reserves indicated ahead past the 2,500 foot level. Hollinger is now third leading gold mine of the world, exceeded only by Crown Mines and Government Gold Mining Areas, in South Africa. However, as these two are really giant consolidations of other mines, Hollinger may therefore be regarded as the actual world leader. With the accomplishment of capacity increases now in progress, first position will soon be wrested from all other competitors."

SILVER.

The market has not been so robust, chiefly owing to easier exchange rates in China resulting in sales on account of that quarter. These have not been much in the way of fresh commitments, but have consisted mostly of purchases made since the Chinese New Year. Indian inquiry has been slight; America has been a fair seller, but the movement of the U. S. exchange has retarded American selling with freedom and has even rendered an occasional purchase possible. The Continent is inactive. On the whole the tone of the market is not very promising at the time of writing.

Mail advice from Bombay under date of the 2nd instant states as follows:—

"The principal feature of the Bombay silver market this week has been a heavy off take. This demand has been created by the commencement of the marriage season and some silver is also held with a view to take a chance of duty on silver as the Budget is now drawing near. The January 26 settlement has progressed satisfactorily. There was good forward business doing in the bazaar on some days as the bulls have commenced buying. upcountry demand for the metal being very good."

Mocatta & Goldsmid's Report

Reporting on February 21 Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid state:—

During the end of last week, the market was dull and inactive, with very little business doing. This week, China has been a steady seller, and there has been little buying except bear covering. At the lower level, India showed more interest in the market, and unless China sales continue, we think prices are about low enough.

Gold. The inquiry from India and the Continent has been small this week, and the bulk of the arrivals has been shipped to New York.

The price has varied between 95/9d. per ounce fine and 96/2d. per ounce fine.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

A Dull Week in Most Departments Though a Brightening up of the Auctions

Mar. 29.

The past has been an uninspiring week in business. While the piece goods auctions have shown firmer prices, the trade as a whole continues in a dull and uninteresting condition. No further business is reported in local yarn, while exports are of little moment, except in silk in which Lyons is still interested.

PIECE GOODS.

The most satisfactory feature in piece goods this week was the improvement in prices registered at the auctions and the better demand there experienced. This, however, is not to say that the market generally is in a better state, for the improved auction prices are more or less only in the nature of a reaction after the sharp drops experienced during the past two or three weeks. It has to be noted that in the case of some private chops there has this week actually been a decline, and very little inclination to operate forward is displayed. It may safely be said that seldom has so dull a spring demand been experienced. This is principally accounted for by the state of the country, but a contributory cause is the renewed fall in American cotton.

The cold weather is affecting the Spring trade in woollens, and no new business is reported. Deliveries, however, continue good. The wool sales held in London this month have registered an advance of from 5 to 15 per cent. in spite of the increased quantities sold, and this is expected to have an appreciable effect on the price of locally held stocks.

At the auctions more trade orders were in evidence, and distinctly more optimism was shown on the part of speculators. This resulted in firmer prices and generally proceedings were very brisk. The dealers report encouraging sales from the interior, and clearances have been very satisfactory. In respect of Italians, which have shown the most pronounced drop since China New Year, dealers seem to have concluded that prices must have been at about bottom last week, and that if they desire to replace cheaply it must be done without delay. Looking at the position generally, one important factor is that compared with previous years the amount of cargo which has been placed on the market during the first quarter has been very small, and this must influence dealers accustomed to replace at this stage. Consequently the tone of the auctions has again become brisk, and several useful recoveries have been made in prices. Korea has been a dull market, this on account of the heavy shipments which have recently taken place. It is pointed out that a certain amount of Whites have been booked for May, and their arrival should exercise an affect upon this branch of the market later on, but as supplies are in the meantime short there is little reason to look for any drop during April.

COTTON AND YARN.

China Cotton—Owing to careful holding on the part of dealers, China cotton keeps steady, notwithstanding the continued drop in the American staple. It is interesting to note also that neither Egyptian nor Inidan cotton has followed American. The Indian staple is now very much on a parity with the local product, and a certain amount of import is proceeding. On the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange the quotations for China cotton are:—April 44.50; May 43.90; June 43.50; July 42.90; August 42.40. Spot rates on the market are:—Tungchow 47.50; Shanghai 44; Shensi 44/46; Hankow 43.

Yarn—Following upon the recent good demand from the interior, requirements seem to have been satisfied, and the yarn market has accordingly become much quieter. Clearances continue fairly good. There has been a fair business in local cloth both for north and south China and for the Straits. On the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange the yarn quotations are:—April 173.30; May 170.70; June 168.60; July 167.50; August 166.40.

SILK.

Owing to the improvement in the franc rate demand for silk is reviving on the Lyons market, and up to the time of writing continues fairly active.

As regards the New York market there is very little news of interest. Speaking generally the market is stagnant, buyers there believing in still lower prices. A few orders have arrived but at prices which do not allow merchants to connect.

PRODUCE.

The produce market continues inactive, with little or no business passing. There are no price movements of any importance to report.

SHARE SETTLEMENTS IN HONGKONG

Record Turn-over Negotiated Fairly Satisfactorily

Hongkong, Mar. 25.

Considering the record magnitude of the turn-over, which is estimated at $100,000,000, the Stock Exchange settlement to-day appears to be being negotiated on the whole satisfactorily. It is at present known that some speculators have defaulted, the differences varying between $10,000 and $80,000. The heaviest losses were on dealings in Cements, Ropes, Docks and Wharves, all of which show a wide disparity from the peak prices of the January boom. One sharebroker states: "Several firms of brokers have suffered from defaulters and big inroads have been made in our brokerage."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Lancashire Cotton Industry

London, Mar. 25.

The Federation of master cotton spinners has reported at Manchester that, in conformity with resolutions adopted by all but one per cent., the mills spinning American cotton have restricted their working hours to 26½ hours a week. The change has effected a wholesome improvement in the condition of the industry.—Reuter.

U. S. Steel Corporation

New York, Mar. 24.

The annual statement of the United States Steel Corporation for the year ended December 31 shows that the net earnings were $123,177,000 and the surplus net income $54,260,000. A dividend was declared of 7 per cent. on preferred shares and 5¾ per cent. on common shares.—Reuter's Amedrican Service.

A Slump in Tin

London, Mar. 24.

Tin this morning slumped £20 to £239 on heavy American selling.—Reuter.

Ball, but, for my part, I will oppose most strenuously the doctrine that any responsibility rests upon the foreign residents of this Settlement for providing primary or universal education for the masses of children of the Chinese masses dwelling here under our rule.

Mr. Lockwood is one of those good people who consciously or unconsciously undermine the position of the foreigner and his extrality in China.

The reason why we live under the protection of extrality in this country is the self-evident one that the Chinese themselves cannot govern even themselves.

The Chinese have had Tsingtao given to them. Tsingtao was really a model place and an object lesson of German Municipal genius for the whole world to gaze upon, and admire.

The Chinese have been given this ready-made jewel of the Orient in thorough working order —and what have they done with it, and, what are they doing with it?

I am bold enough to tell my fellow foreigners that no obligation rests on us to use revenues, or raise revenues, for "educating" the children of the Chinese masses.

An obligation rests on us to provide them with water, and Chinese and foreign merchants will sell them soap if they want it, and in our governing of those Chinese who choose to come and dwell under our banner our only "ideal" that we need concern ourselves about is to give them a fair and square deal under the explicit conditions they must accept if they wish to dwell under extraterritorial rule in the port of Shanghai.

Mr. Lockwood quotes figures of the municipalities of New York, Chicago, and the capital, Washington, showing that upwards of 25 per cent. of the revenues of those cities are spent on education.

I accept his figures and their obvious inference that the inhabitants of those cities doubtless need education to that extent.

The Chinese inhabitants of this Settlement do not need such a proportion of our revenues to be spent on their education as Mr. Lockwood tells us his people require, and one important reason for my pointing this out is that a large proportion of our revenues must be spent on various forms of armed protection, not only for foreigners, but also for Chinese residents of the Settlement.

New York, Chicago, and Washington, D. C., do not live under this perpetual threat, nor do the municipalities of those cities have to cope with, and provide for, such an ever present contingency. We have!

It is not my business to criticize those engaged in the Commerce of Uplift or how they choose to spend the enormous sums in their budgets, but when one of the leaders of such enterprises invites discussion and advocates a policy diametrically opposed to my interests I take up his challenge and make no apology for the length of this opening shot in the conflict.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Unless Mr. Lockhart has to keep up his reputation as a clever writer, I fail to see why he must interpolate his arguments with irrelevant travesties on the work of the Y.M.C.A. and with the conventional story of China's inability to govern herself. The "Y" may be most exasperating in its ceaseless efforts to "uplift" us when we are quite content to stay where we are. China may be rotten to her core. But both these have have nothing to do with the point raised by Mr. Lockwood in his letter to you two days ago.

Granted that Shanghai is not a colony but an extraterritorial port. Granted that the foreign residents are the only ones that should be considered. Granted also that the Chinese living in the Settlement have to be satisfied with what they can get, being not able to get anything so good in the territories governed by their own people. Granted that the Chinese have every right to pay but no right to demand anything in return. Granted all these, and still Mr. Lockwood is not wrong in pointing out, as one foreign resident to other foreign residents, that the Council's provision for the education of 1,350 Chinese boys in a population of over one million is inadequate. The Council may not have the funds to provide for more. Or the Council may be doing something which is not its business to do. But since the Council has started to educate the Chinese, maybe, out of charity, and has done good work in that way, there is nothing in a request to the Council to do more in the same way to warrant Mr. Lockhart trying to ridicule and burlesque the workings of the Y.M.C.A. Still less reason has Mr. Lockhart for making it a text to "boost" his all-impotant extraterritoriality and cry out in all triumph as if it were a new discovery that China cannot govern herself as a republic.

Will he kindly keep to the point and leave China and the Y.M.C.A. alone China as a nation and the Y.M.C.A. as an institution can exist without his cleverness.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—As an individual, may I say that I personally feel that, if we are not responsible for the education of all the Chinese within the Settlement, we are at least responsible for spending the same proportion of the taxes received from Chinese sources, on Chinese education, as the sum now spent on foreign education bears to that contributed by the foreign community to the general revenue; and that this education should be as widely available to the poorer classes as the funds will admit. I also feel strongly that the cost of special benefits exclusively enjoyed by the foreign community, such as the Band, Parks, Library, etc., should be made up to the Chinese taxpayer in other ways. Perhaps made available for the Child Welfare work, made necessary by the advent of Western factory life for which we have been responsible.

Gilbert E. Peet.
Shanghai, Mar. 26, 1924.

 It would be interesting to know exactly on what figures Mr. Peet bases his calculations, because the figures published by the Municipal Council do not show exactly what is paid in rates by Chinese and what by foreigners. There are items headed "Foreign" which, upon analysis, will be found to include Chinese contributions, and vice versa, and in order to ascertain the precise total paid by Chinese and foreigners the Municipal accounts would have to be gone through item by item, an impossible task in view of their immense number. According to the best estimate we have been able to obtain, there is no gross unfairness in the proportion spent on Chinese education and the proportion spent on foreign education, the amounts being relatively about the same to the amounts of rates paid by Chinese and by foreigners.—Ed.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Every attempt to express views on Municipal matters seems always to be met by the objection, that we are not in a position to judge because we are not in possession of full information on the subject. In reply to your comment on my letter in yesterday's issue, I quote the following figures roughly taken from the Municipal Financial Report for the year 1922. To me these figures give the broad facts of the case and I must use them till better ones are produced.

∴ Mr. Peet did not read yesterday's footnote carefully enough. The important point was that "there are items headed 'Foreign' which, upon analysis, will be found to include Chinese contributions, and vice versa, and in order to ascertain the precise total paid by Chinese and foreigners the Municipal accounts would have to be gone through item by item." The belief that "there is no gross unfairness in the proportion spent on Chinese education and the proportion spent on foreign education, the amounts being relatively about the same to the amounts of rates paid by Chinese and by foreigners," was based on what should be very sound judgment.—Ed.

THE SINGAPORE NAVAL BASE.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I think the majority of Britons will be proud of the decision of their Government definitely to abandon the scheme for a Naval Base at Singapore.

From a purely nationalistic and selfish viewpoint such altruisim on our part may appear to be very unwise, but from the viewpoint of "the creation of international confidence" surely Great Britain's aim is a noble one and therefore one to be admired.

All nations alike can defend military plans on the plea of "defensive" purposes. They all alike can say they intend nothing "offensive"; that nobody need have fears about trusting them, but that they much regret their inability to trust anyone else! A Briton may be wholly assured—and of any nation who has more right?—of his good intentions in his relations with the rest of the world, but surely he cannot be very surprised if those of other nationalities are not so easily convinced of those intentions.

Anyway, the world has tried this "self defence" plan long enough now, and we all know how it has failed; so why not try another plan? Has it not usually been found that those who prepare, most for war get the most war! (not an original expression of mine by the way).

Indeed and in very truth such noble altruism does involve risk to the nation that will embark on such an unusual policy, but it is worth it. The strong man who is generous has been altogether a too unfamiliar figure in the past history of the world; we may well take pride in the knowledge that Great Britain is trying to make him less unfamiliar, and is thus setting a chivalrous example to the world.

What, Sir, have you to say on the subject? Surely it is at least worth a "leader," as marking a notable step in promoting the brotherhood of man.

Enclosing my card.

I am, etc.,

Shanghai, March 20, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Whatever may be the British plea for construction of Singapore Naval Base, it is pure and simple a menace to Asiatic nations, and inasmuch as Japan has been cited in the British Parliamentary discussions regarding the Base, it may be taken for granted that Japan is chiefly aimed at and consequently the impression among the Japanese is that her old ally is now preparing against Japan and it is not only those Japanese who remember the utterances of Lord Northcliffe at Peking a few years ago will be bitterly convinced that the racial war will eventuate at the initiative of British Imperialists whatever pretenses parties interested might make laying stress upon distance of 3,00 miles or such like vulgar platitudes in this connexion, deliberately ignoring the records of rapid strides made in speed of crafts both waterborne and aerial with far more prospect for future developments.

However, it is a sign of relief on the part of the Japanese to note that the scheme has been shelved and what is more gratifying for them locally is to read in your correspondence column today under the heading of Singapore Naval Base by "Spectator" who will surely win for his opinion a very high regard of the saner section of the Japanese nation.

Believing myself to represent the majority of Japanese sentiment in this respect and with a view to promoting deeper amity between the two nations I have taken trouble to bring a Japanese view in nakedness into limelight for British consideration.

Trusting you will be kind enough to let me enjoy the hospitality of your valuable space for the sake of peace and amity,

I am, etc.,
T. Shinohara.
Shanghai, March 22, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—According to your correspondent "Spectator," in your issue of the 22nd instant, the abandoning of the Singapore Naval Base by the present government is a sure sign of inspired forethought.

Forethought, I regret to say, has seldom appeared on a British political menu, so far as preventing war by being prepared for war; as, for instance, the Danish War of 1864, when we treated our Treaty with Denmark as "a scrap of paper," owing to unpreparedness. In conjunction with the pro-German leanings of our late "Good Queen," their unpreparedness gave Prussia her first military start. Then came the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. In this case I would remind "Spectator" that over one year before that catastrophe, William Ewart Gladstone went to the country with the cry of reducing the national debt, and when he got into power closed down recruiting.

The memorable speech of Disraeli is worth recalling when he denounced this procedure as "a sin against God and humanity"; that instead of stopping recruiting the Queen's bounty ought to be doubled and recruiting for the Army should be intensified, as two of the most powerful European nations were looking askance at one another. Six months from the date of that speech, France declared war against Prussia, and Bavaria ratted from France, mainly because we dare not help France.

UNPREPAREDNESS: Instead of our being the means of preventing war by being prepared, we had to sing very small and salve our consciences by sending flour and sticking-plaster to poor, shattered France! Thus again our unpreparedness for war was directly the prime factor in building a German Empire by bringing into existence the Germanic Federation.

Again, for two or more years before the World War, General Roberts was preaching a similar gospel to Disraeli, but was scoffed at by the pacifists and passed over as a dotard. Had he been listened to, had we had an army of, say, a million, would William Hohenzollern have plunged the world in blood? Therefore, the saying that those who prepare for war get the worst of it is not a good saying and worthy of acceptation.

Now comes the Singapore Base: Arguing on the same premises, is it not possible that if a strong naval base is built at Singapore, it may be the means of preventing war and, again, causing untold misery, especially after the letter appearing in your issue of the 21th over the signature of T. Shinohara?

Thanking you for the hospitality of your columns, and apologizing for the length of my letter.

I am, etc.,
W. V. Carmichael.

BLACK TEA.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In your leader on China Tea in your issue of March 24 you state that the export of black tea during the season 1923-24 was as follows:

About 14 million pounds to the United Kingdom.

About 4 million pounds to the Continent.

About 10 million pounds to America and Canada.

These quantities are misleading and entirely wrong. The correct figures of black tea shipments for the Season 1923-24 are as follows.

From Shanghai to the United Kingdom	14,301,783
From Hankow to the United Kingdom	7,390,791
Total	21,691,549
From Shanghai to the Continent	4,319,864
From Hankow to the Continent	2,689,957
Total	7,008,821
From Shanghai to U.S.A. and Canada	10,018,320
From Hankow to U.S.A. and Canada	1,985,050
Total	12,003,370

I am, etc.
Excusez Moi.
Shanghai, Mar. 20, 1924.

 The figures we quoted were supplied to us by one of the leading tea firms in Shanghai. The fact that the exports from Hankow were not included hardly affects the purport of the article in question.—Ed.

Some few days ago the house of a Chinese doctor living in a lonely spot on the Pootung side was attacked by a gang of robbers and the doctor, in putting up a defence, received a number of knife wounds His wife, who went to his assistance, was also wounded, and the two unfortunate people were bound with ropes while the robbers searched the house and spent a comfortable two hours there. Whilst they were carousing, the doctor's wife contrived to loosen her bonds, crept from the house and, despite her wounds, crawled to the nearest village police station, some three li distant. A number of police were got together and set for the house, but by the time they arrived the robbers had vanished Such is the story which appeared in a Chinese newspaper this week. It probably is correct, but sounds uncommonly like a cinema tale.

LAW REPORTS

EX-GRANTHIS CHARGED WITH FRAUD

Local Politics Barred: Magistrate's Warning to Defence

There was again a full attendance of Sikhs at H. M. Police Court last Friday, when the two former Granthis at the North Szechuen Road Gurdwara, Sucha Singh and Amar Singh, appeared on remand charged with having fraudulently converted to their own use the sum of $910 belonging to members of the Skih police.

When before the Court on Wednesday, the accused were not represented by counsel, but Mr. R. C. Faithfull now appeared on their behalf and applied for a further remand, saying that he had only received instructions on the previous afternoon and had had no time to go fully into the case.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, for the prosecution, made no objection, not wishing to embarrass the defendants in any way, and the Magistrate granted a remand until Monday. "You must make it clear to your clients," his Worship observed to Mr. Faithfull, "that we do not want the time of the court wasted by discussion of local politics."

Mr. Faithfull—I shall not touch on politics. It is no part of the defence.

His Worship—Well, a statement has been made that the charge is brought as an attempt to prevent the defendants from being successful in an action against the Municipal Council for wrongful dismissal.

Jemadar's Evidence

Further evidence was heard by Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court on Monday.

Sirdar Sahib Buddha Singh, Jemadar of Sikh Police, was put into the witness box to be cross-examined by Mr. Faithfull.

In the course of cross-examination witness said the two defendants were dismissed from the Gurdwara for thieving on December 9.

The Magistrate.—Dismissed for theft—then why did you not prosecute them then?

Sirdar Sahib—It was Gurdwara business. The committee did not wish to bring it into the Courts.

Further cross-examined witness said the two men were employed as policemen after their dismissal from the Gurdwara.

The Magistrate: What, after December 9?—Yes Sir.

When they had been discharged from the Gurdwara for dishonesty?—Yes Sir, they were paid $19 per month as 5th class constables and given an allowance of $15 each for their services as granthis.

Indar Singh, treasurer of the Sikh ghee account was next called and spoke to handing over the ghee, etc., to the granthis at various intervals. No receipts were taken from the men.

The witness delved into figures at some length. Various totals were given to his Worship. The treasurer appeared to be in an extraordinary muddle, and after he had been in the box for about three-quarters of an hour the magistrate adjourned the case until next morning.

Capt. Barrett and Ghee Accoun

The accused came before Mr. G. W. King again on Tuesday afternoon.

Indar Singh, treasurer of the fund, was put into the witness box again and continued to go into the account books with the Court.

Captain E. I. M. Barrett, Assistant Commissioner of Police, told the Court that the defendants were appointed Granthis to the Gurdwara in 1921. They received $15 per month from the Municipal Council and $35 per month from the Gurdwara. About December last Amar Singh informed witness that he and his companion had been dismissed by the Gurdwara. He wrote to the Gurdwara Committee asking them by what right they dismissed men who were on the Municipal pay roll without reference to the Council, and asking for details of the charges brought against them. The committee replied setting forth certain reasons and affirming that their decision could be reversed by no man for it was, in fact, the "word of God," a decision of the "sunghat," therefore irrevocable. Not being satisfied with this he enlisted the two men into the police force and gave them duties as Granthis at the Gordon Road Gurdwara. He discovered a feeling of resentment among his own men at the appointment and called a mass meeting of Sikh police at the Central Station to deal with the matter. He there learned that the majority of the men felt that these Granthis were not fit and proper men to act as priests or Granthis for their Gurdwara. With that he gave the defendants the opportunity to resign and advised them to do so. They accepted his advice and he secured deferred pay for them and their passages back to India from the Municipal Council. One man had accepted the pay but neither accepted the passage. Captain Barrett added that he once kept the ghee accounts himself.

The case was again adjourned.

Both Men Sent for Trial

Amar Singh and Sucha Singh, the two ex-Granthis of the Sikh Gurdwara, North Szechuen Road, were committed for trial by Mr. G. W. King, at H.M. Police Court on Wednesday.

Amar Singh, in evidence, said he took the ghee fund over from Sucha Singh on October 10, 1923, since when Sucha Singh had nothing to do with the fund. He denied that he owed anything of the $910 concerning which he was charged. Actually the police owed him $10 expenses. He denied, also, that he had ever resigned his position, as stated in evidence by Capt. Barrett.

Cross-examined by Mr. Maitland, witness denied telling the police they could keep his deferred pay on account of what he owed on the ghee account. He denied that he spent any of the money in connexion with the Imperial Hotel.

Mr. Maitland.—You are connected with that hotel?

Amar Singh.—I refuse to say.

Mr. Maitland altered his tactics.

"Do you remember" he asked, "going round to the hotel so drunk you had to be put out?"

Witness—I don't know.

Do you remember coming into this Police Court because it was alleged you were drunk on those premises?—I don't know.

You don't remember saying you were entitled to go into your own house?—I remember that,—but (after a pause) my house is the Gordon Road Gurdwara.

Witness then continued to delve into the figures as shown in his books. He said 31 Sikhs to whom he had sold ghee had gone away without paying and that accounted for over $520 of the missing money.

PARTNER IN THE IMPERIAL HOTEL.

Sucha Singh also gave evidence. He denied resigning from the police force and denied that he owed the $910.

In the course of cross-examination he stated that he was a partner in the Imperial Hotel; Amar Singh was not. He put $1,500 into the hotel himself.

Mr. Faithfull, in his address to the Court, submitted that the whole question was one of accounts, and was not a case for a jury. Other people had been selling the tins of ghee as well as the defendants. He did not think a jury would thank the Court for sending a case of this sort to them, probably to take up two whole days going into a mass of figures and accounts which did not agree. He very much doubted whether the Crown Advocate would go on with the case even if it were given to him.

The Magistrate said the case had been a wearisome one in that Court, but considerations as to whether the jury would thank him or whether the Crown Advocate would carry on if he committed the prisoners could not affect him in any way. The accused would be committed for trial in the higher court. Bail was allowed.

THE ROWARTH CASE PERJURY CHARGE

Accused Committed for Trial

The prosecution of W. H. Goulbourn, who is alleged to have committed perjury in the Rowarth trial, was continued at H. M. Police Court on Saturday, and at the close of the proceedings Mr. G. W. King committed the accused for trial.

The charge framed against the accused is that on June 29 last, being a witness at the trial of Judith Rowarth, he falsely swore that Mrs. Rowarth did not leave the house of her daughter before 8.30 on the night of May 4.

Mr. E. T. Maitland prosecuted and Mr. Mansel Reece defended the accused.

Upon the Magistrate reading over the charge and cautioning accused, Goulbourn answered that he was not guilty and wished to give evidence. He was then sworn, and stated that he was the son of Mrs. Rowarth, and was employed by the Union Insurance Society of Canton.

Concerning his evidence given at the trial, Mr. Reece asked: From what you have heard of the Chinese amah's evidence and that of the Inspector, have you any wish to change what you said?

Witness—No.

Counsel—Are you satisfied in your own mind that the Inspector has quite forgotten what was said at the trial?

Witness—Yes, I am quite satisfied.

Continuing, witness described his movements after leaving office on the evening of May 4, and went on to say that he left the Club Lusitano in company with a Mr. Marques at about 7.15 or 7.30, they together going to the house of Mrs. Davies. Mrs. Rowarth was then in the house.

Counsel—Did you at any time during the trial say that Mrs. Rowarth never left Mrs. Davies's house on the night that the Indian was assaulted?

Witness—I never said anything of the kind.

Counsel—Have you any idea how the Inspector has arrived at this extraordinary recollection of your evidence?

Witness—No idea at all, unless he has mistaken some of the other evidence for mine.

In cross-examination, Mr. Maitland reminded accused that, at the trial, he stated that he arrived at the house at 7.30 and supper was at 8.30, that there was nothing extraordinary about Mrs. Rowarth, and that she was there all the time up to and during supper, and witness repeated that this was correct. It meant that she was in the house between 7.30 and 8.30 on the night the Indian was assaulted. Witness repeated that he had no doubt as to the date and none as to Mrs. Rowarth's presence in the house.

You have heard the evidence of Pakha Singh, who said she arrived at his house at 7.30?—Yes.

And he said the assault took place about 8 o'clock?—I remember hearing that.

In reply to further questions, witness said Mrs. Rowarth never left the house from the time he got there until after 8.30. That was all he knew. Whether or not she went to Pakha's house afterwards he did not know.

You don't suggest now that she did not go to the Sikh's house?—I suggest nothing. I am here to answer a charge of prejury, and I am answering it.

MR. ROWARTH'S DEPARTURE.

Do you know that your mother has left Shanghai?—Yes.

And Mrs. Davies?—Yes, so I have been told.

Do you know when they left?

Mr. Mansel Reece—This is not material at all. I object to it as certainly not being material to a charge of perjury.

Mr. Maitland—You do not know when they left?

Witness—I am here to answer a charge of prejury, Mr. Maitland.

His Worship—Where does the question lead to? Mr. Maitland—It shows how intimate these people were together.

Counsel did not pursue the matter, and in answer to the Magistrate, witness said he stuck to what he said in the Supreme Court. He saw Mrs. Rowarth leave the house with a crowd of people, but did not see the amah go with her.

Det. Sub. Inspector Quayle was again re-called and questioned by Mr. Mansel Reece. He repeated his statement that Goulbourn had said Mrs. Rowarth never left her daughter's house on the night the Indian was assaulted.

You are certain he said that? (You are the only person who does say it)—To the best of my knowledge, that is exactly what he did say, that she never left the house between 7.30 and 8.30.

Why do you think he added "between 7.30 and 8.30"?—I have'nt the faintest idea.

You failed to get a conviction against Mrs. Rowarth?—Yes.

And you have failed to get a conviction against anyone else in connexion with the case?—We have not tried to convict anyone else.

It is well known in Shanghai that you are anxious to obtain a conviction in connexion with the Rowarth case?—We are anxious to secure the conviction of the person who committed the crime.

How do you account for the fact that the statement you attribute to Goulbourn is not to be found in the Judge's notes of the trial?—I cannot account for it.

It is very material. Do you think the Judge would overlook it?—I don't know.

The true answer is that the words are not in the Judge's notes because they were never said?—I beg to differ.

The Magistrate—The Judge need not put everything down.

Mr. Mansel Reece—Quite so, but it is not likely he would miss a point like that.

Mr. Mansel Reece then addressed the court for the defence, laying stress upon the necessity for the strictest proof and exact corroboration in a charge of perjury, and on the important discrepancy in time stated by the Sikh and the Amah, there being a difference of an hour and a half in the time they stated that Mrs Rowarth called at the Sikh's house. If accused were committed for trial, coursel continued, in all probability the Judge would not allow the case to go to the jury and there would be a direction that the charge be dismissed. The prosecution had already seen how matters were going when they withdrew the charge of conspiracy, and it would be just as well for them to withdrew the charge of perjury.

The Magistrate said it seemed to him there was something in the case for a jury to decide. He felt there was a great deal in Mr. Reece's remarks, but it was not for him to comment on the evidence. The matter was out of his hands, and the accused would have to go for trial.

Goulbourn was released on bail, himself in $500 and two sureties of $500 each.

His Honour Judge Peter Grain disposed of another batch of debt cases in H.M. Supreme Court, on Monday. He gave judgment for the Hongkong & Shanghai Hotels against W. E. Holmes (who did not appear) for $1,470.95 for board and lodging, and $100 costs; for J. Lebovich against the same defendant for $115 for remaking and relining a lady's fur coat; for the Yangtszepoo Stores against J. Richie for $64.41 for whiskey supplied, and $12.50 costs; and for Budan Singh against Amar Singh for $100 borrowed money, and $5.50 costs. The case of Sundar Singh v. J. J. Ellis, which came up on a judgment summons for $495, was adjourned until next month on the defendant's statement that he then could meet in a lump sum the instalments due, the Judge indicating that a committal order would follow if he failed.

DISTURBING THE PEACE

Important Decision in U. S. Consular Court: A Charge Dismissed

The U.S. Commissioner, sitting in the American Consular Court, has given a decision of great importance in the case of U. S. v. Jay Elmont. The decision is as follows:—

The defendant in this action by motion to dismiss has raised the point that the complaint herein does not allege sufficient facts to constitute a criminal offence within the jurisdiction of this Court:

The laws applicable to criminal offences in this jurisdiction are embodied in section No. 4086 of the United States Revised Statutes and are as follows:

"Jurisdiction in both criminal and civil matters shall, in all cases, be exercised and enforced in conformity with the laws of the United States, which are hereby, so far as is necessary to execute such treaties, respectively, and so far as they are suitable to carry the same into effect, extended over all citizens of the United States in those countries, and over all others to the extent that the terms of the treaties, respectively, justify or require. But in all cases where such laws are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, the common law and the law of equity and admiralty shall be extended in like manner over such citizens and others in those countries; and if neither the common law, nor the law of equity or admiralty, nor the statutes of the United States, furnish appropriate and sufficient remedies, the Ministers in those countries, repectively, shall, by decrees and regulations which shall have the force of law, supply such defects and deficiencies."

Having made a diligent search through these laws as prescribed by the statutes, this court fails to find that the offence of disturbing the peace of a single person comes within the purview of same. It further appears that no decrees or regulations applying to this particular offence have been made by the Ministers of the United States for China. It seems that this Court is without jurisdiction for the prosecution of an offence of this nature, and will be so until definite action of some character is taken by such tribunal who has the power to remedy this situation. This status of conditions is not without precedent.

A CASE FROM TANGIER.

In Judge Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. 2, page 630, mention is made of a similar case occurring in Tangier. An American citizen there was charged by the consul for the offence of wife beating, and the Consular Judge found him guilty and sentenced him to be flogged, and that said sentence was duly executed.

Mr. Adee, acting Secretary of State at that time, criticized the action of the Consular Judge, and said, in part, as follows:

"Wife beating is not, at common law, a distinctive offence; nor is it made such by any statute of the United States, or regulation enforceable in your Consular Court. By the earlier common-law authorities, the wife was considered so far under her husband's power that he might give her moderate correction ex causa regiminis castigationis, but that doctrine is repudiated by all the modern authorities in this country and in England, so that in the present state of the common law beating a wife is assault and battery, in like manner as the beating of any other person would be. There is no United States statute specially providing punishment for assault and battery on an unofficial person. So we must look to the common law for the punishment of the ordinary offence."

By this it appears that the law enumerated by the revised statutes must be strictly followed, and if it develops that a criminal offence is not within its purview it must fail. This is the status of the offence charged in this complaint, and the defendant's motion to dismiss is accordingly sustained, and he is discharged from further pleading to said action.

One of Korniloff's accomplices, Pinegin, was sent to penal servitude for life on the 15th instant, the Chamber of Justice at Harbin upholding the verdict of the lower court. As in the case of Korniloff, who stands under sentence of death for several murders, the accused was told he could appeal to the Peking Senate within 10 days. On hearing the verdict, Pinegin fainted.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES

A GREAT BILLIARDS MATCH

Mr. Johnson, Champion, Defeated by Capt. Barrett after Sensational Finish

Billiards enthusiasts were afforded a sensation on Monday evening when Capt. E. I. M. Barrett knocked out Mr. R. C. K. Johnson in the second round of the Amateur Championship. Play in the first session was fairly good, but the second session was somewhat slow, though relieved by one very fine break by Johnson and by a sensational finish. It is quite possible that both players, though they professed at first not to be disturbed, were put off their game by reason of the orchestral practice which was going on in the main hall at the Town Hall, for it is hard to believe that any man, however steady his nerves, can play properly to the accompaniment of the crash of 50 instruments.

In the first session Barrett held the lead the greater part of the time, but Johnson never let him get too far ahead, invariably overhauling him when the advantage became too pronounced and ending up just under 50 points to the good. Barrett opened with a number of small but useful breaks and went first to the century (102-82). He continued in the same style, Johnson not scoring anything better than 35. The champion had been confining himself almost entirely to red ball play and seemed to find it difficult to get the strength of the table, but eventually he got going, put the white where it would not worry him and strung together a splendid break of 85, scoring only off the red ball once he had worked it into position. He broke down at an easy middle pocket, but had gone into the lead at 182-136 and shortly afterwards another break put him at 221 153.

Then Barrett pulled up again, levelled the scores and with a run of 39 completed the third 100 at 331-290. After this Johnson played very steadily and looked like running to his points with one break, but it stopped at 41, with the score at 399. Barrett gave a safety miss and the session ended:—Johnson, 400; Barrett, 353.

After dinner the small hall was well filled with spectators. Barrett still was in a scoring mood and soon passed his opponent, who was unable to put together more than 12 or so at a break. The game was called in Barrett's favour at 502-486. Johnson, with his first break over 30, again went into the lead at 539, but Barrett promptly replied with 40, which included some very clever shots and entered the next 100 at 603-572. Barrett continued to forge ahead and was only six points off 700, with Johnson 40 behind, when the best play of the match was seen. Johnson added 20 and then at his next visit to the table put on 80 with a splendid effort. He dropped the white with his first shot and thereafter very seldom had the red away from the middle pockets, playing it from side to side in delightful fashion and with perfect judgment.

This gave Johnson the lead at 755-695, but Barrett was not beaten and once more put a thrill into the game with successive breaks of 23 and 29. The players had an interesting duel for position, with a run of misses and safety shots, out of which Barrett came off best. However, he only made six points and left Johnson with such an easy position that it seemed the champion must win, but he finished after adding 24, the game then standing 756-756 in his favour. Barrett replied with 14. Johnson missed the easiest of shots, but Barrett did worse. There are few to touch him at winning hazards, and yet, with the game in his hands he missed a novice's cut. Johnson was left with still another certainty and only 13 points for game, but once more he broke down at an easy shot.

Barrett had two simple shots to start with. After that he had to work hard, but he was in that sort of mood when a man can score off almost anything and amidst a buzz of excitement he went from shot to shot in a break of 31 and ran out a winner at 800-787, being the first man to defeat Johnson in championship play in Shanghai.

Both players made several twenties, but apart from Johnson's 85 and 80 there was no really big scoring. Johnson's other leading breaks were 35 (twice), 39 and 41. Barrett is much to be congratulated. He scored very consistently, making 31, 32, 36, 38, 39 (twice), 40, 46, 50 and 55.

COMPANY MEETINGS

REPAH RUBBER AND TAPIOCA ESTATES

Annual General Meeting

The 11th annual general meeting of shareholders in the above Company was held at the offices of the secretaries and general managers (J. A. Wattie & Co., Ld.) on Monday afternoon. Mr. B. A. Clarke presided, and was supported by Messrs. A. J. Welch, G. Grayrigge and E. S. Kadoorie (Directors) and Mr. W. S. Royston, representing the secretaries and general managers. The attendance represented a total of 117,523 shares.

The secretary having read the notice convening the meeting, and the auditors' report, the Chairman said:—

Gentlemen,—When I last addressed you I had occasion to congratulate shareholders on the improved prospects of the company. The company, shortly before the introduction of enforced restriction, was practically bankrupt, and on the point of going into liquidation. We were saddled with debts amounting to almost Tls. 105,000 against which we had liquid assets of only Tls. 24,790.57 at December 31, 1922. During 1923 we made good progress towards clearing off this indebtedness and the accounts in your hands show you that our total debts are now Tls. 76,614.22 against which we have liquid assets amounting to Tls. 18,732.50.

Two factors, gentlemen, contribute towards this improved state of affairs; the first is the beneficial effect of the restriction, which is borne out by the average sale price of 15.28 pence per lb., as against 7.65 pence per lb. in 1922. The second is the continued and greatly appreciated assistance of Mr. E. S. Kadoorie, one of our Directors, who guaranteed the company's overdraft at the company's bankers. For this assistance, gentlemen, I now beg to voice the shareholders' thanks to Mr. Kadoorie.

The benefits of restriction are so very obvious in this particular case and in hundreds of others in preserving this great rubber-growing industry, that it continues a matter of surprise and regret to most people interested that the Dutch East Indies do not come into line and help instead of standing aside and profiting on other producers' efforts to place the industry on a safe and reasonably profitable basis. Whilst British producing countries reduced their 1923 outputs by almost 40,000 tons as compared with 1922, the Dutch East Indies increased theirs by almost 35,000 tons. This fact, gentlemen, combined with the unsettled state of Europe, is no doubt the reason why rubber is so cheap today. I am told there is an average of about 7 lb. of rubber in a tyre. What difference would a price of 2/- per lb. instead of 1/- per lb. make to the manufacturer or consumer? Very little indeed. But to the rubber grower the difference between 1/- and 2/- is the difference between semi-starvation and comparative affluence. Let us hope Dutch interests will shortly realize the facts of the situation and join in making this industry what it should be, a safe and profitable undertaking.

Concerning Repah, we have a really fine property of 1,308 acres practically all of a tappable age. The estate is in excellent condition and a good deal of cultivation and improvement is going on all the time. We produced 217,087 lb. at the satisfactory cost of 22.66 cents per lb. f.o.b. including duty.

The area of the estate as I said is 1,308 acres capitalized at the modest figure of Tls. 275,000 and once we liquidate our debts I feel quite sure Repah will be a good dividend earner. We shall have some capital expenditure to face probably next year for a new factory and manager's bungalow but the total will not be large.

Our manager, Mr. Choveaux, continued to handle the property single handed with his usual energy and efficiency until November when he went for a well-earned six months holiday. Mr. Strettell, late of Shanghai Klebang, has been appointed acting manager and his reports indicate his appreciation of a valuable property. One extract from Mr. Choveaux's Handing Over Report is worthy of record, namely, "The bark renewal is really extraordinary and renewed surfaces promise better tapping surfaces than the original bark."

Mr. A. J. Welch visited the Estate last year and gave us a very favourable report.

The mortgage of Tls. 60,000 was paid off on March 31, 1923, and the title deeds are now in the possession of the company.

The accounts make fairly good reading. The Estate working account shows a profit of Tls. 35,060.41, and after providing for Shanghai expenses and the cost of interest on overdraft, this item in itself amounting to Tls. 5,936.27, the net profit for the year is Tls. 26,537.72. Deducting this amount from the loss brought forward from 1922, the adverse balance of Profit and Loss account is reduced to Tls. 9,584.87 which figure will surely disappear during the current year.

There was no discusion, and the formal resolutions were carried unanimously.

MAJOR BROS., LD.

Annual General Meeting

The annual general meeting of Messrs. Major Bros., Ld., was held at 2 Canton Road on Monday, under the chairmanship of Sir E. C. Pearce.

The notice convening the meeting having been read, the chairman said:

Gentlemen,—The report and accounts having been in your hands for some time, I will, with your permission, follow the usual procedure and take them as read.

The result of the year's working, whilst better than the previous year, is disappointing, as in view of the closing down of the works during 1922 to rebuild our sulphur burner, we hoped that our troubles as regards plant were at an end. Unfortunately the stone ware filling of the Glover Tower collapsed through disintegration in July, and its rebuilding caused another stoppage, with the result that we had again to buy acid to fill contracts made.

As far as we can tell now, the plant is in a fairly satisfactory condition, but as it is old, we have to face the fact that troubles in connexion with it will have to be looked for, and the question of the future of the company is occupying the attention of your directors. After years of uphill work, we have a well established business which should now be profitable, but for possible plant troubles.

The accounts are presented in their usual form and do not call for any special comment, but before putting the usual resolutions to the meeting, I shall be pleased to answer any questions that may be asked.

There were no questions and the formal resolutions were carried without dissent.

Charge Against American Seaman in U. S. Court: Accused Committed for Trial

[redacted] President Jackson, by Superintendent Woodfield of the River Police in the U.S. Commissioner's Court for China before Mr. N. E. Lurton. It was alleged that accused had attempted to smuggle four [redacted] combined wooden stocks and holsters, and 200 rounds of ammunition ashore, but the only charge applicable under American law (accused not being on Chinese soil) was that mentioned.

Giving evidence as to the finding of the weapons, Neville A. Mellish, Customs officer, told the Court that he became suspicious of accused when he noticed that he, a slim youth, wearing a large overcoat, should have such a large bulge at the waist, so he approached him and wished to search his person. Accused when accosted said "You've got me this time." On unbuttoning the overcoat, an ordinary top coat, witness saw the butts of two holsters above the man's belt, which he took from him. The police were called and Roberts was taken into custody.

John Newey, chief steward, declared that he saw defendant give Mellish the two pistols, which he saw projecting from above the trousers, after the coats were loosened. He first saw defendant come into the mess room, followed by the Chinese watchman and the Customs man.

Mr. Clyde Foster Bryant, fourth officer, had been standing on the afterdeck; a Chinese had already been arrested, when he heard that two more had been caught near the gangway. He went below and saw the party described by the steward; also noted two wooden cases above the trousers when the coats had been unloosened.

Mr. Woodfield—Are your satisfied that they were weapons?—I can only say that I saw what seemed to be wooden cases, though they were just like the gun holsters on the table there.

Witness did see the four guns and the cartridge cases in the [redacted] after the first two guns were found.

Defendant did not wish to cross-examine any of the witnesses, nor did he desire to make a statement, and the Commissioner accordingly bound him over [redacted] the Higher Court (Judge Purdy when he arrives). Bail was fixed at G.$200.

Alleged Theft of Overcoat

With the conclusion of the arms charge, Pedro Antonio, a Filipino, was charged with larceny of an overcoat from the Filipino Club, 470 Chapoo Road, on Wednesday evening, the property of Mr. F. Modesto Kyko, well known to the Shanghai boxing fraternity.

Det.-Sgt. Schmidt, outlining the case, said that accused had been arrested by a Chinese constable on information from the watchman at the Club. He, himself, was present at the Station, when Antonio was searched by detectives under his orders and [redacted] the pawn ticket [redacted]. He told the detectives to recover the article. Constable [redacted] told him there had been $20 in the [redacted] of the coat, but this was not found on defendant, nor did the searchers, called to the station, hear any knowledge of the money, stating that there was nothing in the pockets when he went through them. Defendant said when questioned that he had no fear, no place to show, so he stole the coat.

Mr. Kyko declared to the Court that he went from his house to the Club shortly before [redacted] and left the overcoat on the table and went to wash his hands. He had been inside about five minutes when the watchman told him that the coat had been taken. He assisted the police, who made the arrest. He identified the coat.

Accused was bound over to the [redacted] Court for China and bail fixed at G.$100.

AMAZING CHARGE OF TORTURE

Allegations Against Chinese Detectives by Man Accused of Armed Robbery

Allegations that he was tortured by Chinese detectives at the Central Police Station and a false confession of guilt extorted from him, were made to Mr. Martin, British Assessor, and Magistrate Kuan in the Mixed Court on Monday afternoon.

The man was one of six Chinese charged with committing an armed robbery in Yunnan Lane last December. His story was that he was arrested, taken to the Central Police Station and locked up. Before a statement was obtained from him he was, so he related, seized by a number of Chinese detectives and taken into an upstairs room. Here he was bound to a ladder, his head pulled back by the roots of his hair and then tied; an electrical battery was brought in, according to accused's story, and the terminals run over his body from his feet to his thighs. The current was then switched on and he was tortured by means of electric shocks till he was in great pain and agreed to confess his guilt when called upon to do so. Prisoner went on to say that when he was taken into the charge-room before Det.-Insp. Cruickshank the interpreter told him to say "yes" to all the Inspector's questions. He was so frightened that he did so.

A different complexion was put on to the prisoner's story when the Inspector went into the witness box. He stated that it would have been impossible for any of the Chinese detectives to have spoken to the prisoner during the day he alleged he was tortured, unless it were through the bars of his prison. No Chinese was allowed to open the door of the cells unless a European was there at the time, and the European would have had to get leave from witness himself.

Replying to Mr. E. T. Maitland, prosecuting, witness said it was true a printed rule had been distributed among the Chinese members of the Force warning them that unnecessary violence used against prisoners would be followed by instant dismissal, and last year a number of constables were discharged for such an offence.

ASSAULT ON A GIRL.

The six prisoners were charged with committing an armed robbery in Yunnan Road early last December. They were alleged to have followed a girl till she came to a dark and isolated quarter and then to have attacked her, threatening her with revolvers and stealing a bangle valued at $60.

Mr. E. T. Maitland prosecuted, Mr. T. Addis represented the first four defendants and Mr. L. K. Kentwell appeared on behalf of the other two. Dr. Fischer represented a witness named Wong-Ah-loh, and Mr. S. Moss represented another witness, Dung Ding-ze.

Mr. Maitland, describing the circumstances of the case, said the charges had been heard once before, when four of the accused were before the Court. Two were sent to the Arsenal and there made statements implicating the two new defendants. Two of the old defendants had been identified by one of the witnesses and and two admitted the charge. Another man who had admitted the charge in the police station, however, denied it in court. Although the plaintiff had seen only four men, she admitted there could possibly have been seven or eight, for it was very dark where she was attacked and everything happened quickly. Regarding the men who had been sent to the Arsenal, she had received a communication warning her that if they were shot "a life for a life" would be taken.

The second defendant then went into the witness box. With remarkable unconsciousness he confessed that he had committed a number of robberies at one time and another, but denied that he was implicated in this one.

The other defendants were called, including one of the men who had been sent back from the Arsenal, the man who made the allegations of cruelty. He described the alleged process whereby he was tortured with electric shocks, as already described, and strongly denied that he was ever implicated in the robbery with which he was charged. He would never have made the confession unless it had been forced out of him. The witness went on to make further allegations against the Magistrate by whom he was first tried, who, he said, told him he was not to say anything when asked to defend himself. There was no foreigner present when he was "tortured."

AN IMPOSSIBLE STORY.

Inspector Cruickshank was then called. He described the prison rules, whereby it was impossible that any prisoner should be taken out of the cells without his permission and said it was impossible that the prisoner could have been removed that day. He added, as a possible explanation to the prisoner's story, that he had been approached by a Chinese detective that morning who told him that one of the prisoners had asked him for food. He had refused and the prisoner thereupon said he would take his revenge by "talking bad" about him in court. He could not say however, whether this was the prisoner in question.

Mr. Maitland, at the conclusion of his address to the Court, said he hoped they would take the cruelty allegations at their true value. They were obviously trumped up charges made in a vain hope that they might have some effect in obscuring the issue and obtaining his release, and to throw mud on the police who had brought about his downfall. He asked the Bench to express their disbelief of the story.

After the other counsel had addressed the Court, the charge against No. 3 was dismissed, No. 4 was sentenced to one year's imprisonment on a further charge of returning from expulsion, and discharged on the charge of armed robbery. The Court reserved its decision till Friday morning in the cases of the other four defendants.

ALLEGED ASSAULT BY CHINESE SHOEMAKER

A Kick in the Back with Hob-nailed Boots Followed by a Bite on the Face

Mr. Louis Frank Roth charged a Chinese in the Mixed Court on Thursday before Mr. Martin, British Assessor, and Magistrate Kuan, with assaulting him by kicking him in the back with a heavy nailed boot, twisting his arm and biting his face and hand.

Mr. Roth's story was that the defendant, a shoemaker, executed some repairs for him. There was a dispute over the price, defendant wishing to charge $10.40 for the repairs, and they eventually agreed on $7. On the 7th inst ant Roth gave him $4 and gave him the balance on the 14th. He was not satisfied, however, and on Sunday he went to Roth's house, at Carter Road Terrace, walked straight in without knocking on the door, and went into the bedroom where complainant and his wife were. He was told to get out and started to throw things about the room and generally made a nuisance of himself. With that Roth got up and chased him out. Later in the day he was talking to his wife in Carter Road Terrace. He had one hand on his wife's arm and with the other held a camera. The Chinese came up from benind, unobserved, and kicked him. Witness again ran after him, and he turned and threw a heavy pair of boots in Roth's face. A couple of Russians came to the scene then and in the scrimmage that followed as they rescued him defendant bit him in the hand ard face. He made a complaint to the Bubbling Well Road Police Station.

Mrs. Roth corroborated her husband's story.

Yih Sih-ling, a Chinese bystander, said he saw the defendant being assaulted by three foreign men and a woman. They were assaulting him; he was not assaulting them.

Defendant was cautioned.

COUNTERFEIT BANK-NOTES

Wholesale Forgery of Ningpo Commercial Bank Bills

Three Chinese, including one woman, appeared before Messrs. Martin and Kuan at the Mixed Court on Monday morning charged with uttering counterfeit notes, purporting to be the genuine issue of the Ningpo Commercial Bank. Mr. L. K. Kentwell defended the second accused.

Det. Sub-Insp. Yorke said the issue had been brought to their attention by an informer last week who declared that the first accused had offered him $50 worth of $1 bills for $25. The police party went to 1934 Haining Road where the woman, Wong, was said to be living (she being thought to have led the gang), but she was not there. While the officers waited for her the second and third accused put in their appearance and were taken into custody. The former told them that he had helped the woman to remove to 19 Koulan Road in Chapei, so a detachment accompanied by Chapei men entered the premises but could not find the fugitive. While in the house the second accused told the officers to look into a basket in which he said they would find what they were looking for. There were 725 unfinished notes, printed on one side, a number of plates bearing reproductions of the genuine bills, and some blank paper.

The old woman Wong was to be detained if she returned, but it seems that she went to the home of the second accused in Myburgh Road, where his mother told her that he had been arrested. She nevertheless went to her dwelling, where the tenant also spoke of the raiding party and took her into custody. Just then a man came up and said that he was a detective, told them he would take the woman and they should report the affair at the station. The Settlement police had not seen the woman since. The printing had begun before the China New Year holidays, but a quarrel had forestalled further developments.

A representative of the bank said the notes were counterfeit and identified a genuine one, after which the informer went into the box.

Addressing the bench, Mr. Kentwell said that there was not the slightest evidence against his client and the mere fact that he was acquainted with the family should not be held against him.

First accused was sentenced to one year's imprisonment and the other two were discharged.

THE $50,000 CLAIM AGAINST I. R. C.

Club's Denial of Liability for Libby's Alleged Ill-Treatment at Hands of Police

In the Mixed Court on Monday concluding evidence was heard in the case in which S. Libby sued the International Recreation Club, claiming $50,000 damages for an alleged assault at Kiangwan Race Course, Mr. F. J. Schuhl appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. G. H. Wright for the club.

Mr. Chen, the I.R.C. traffic inspector, cross-examined, said that the Chapei police handled Libby somewhat roughly but neither witness nor any of his men did anything of the sort. Pointsman No. 2 attempted to fend off some blows aimed at him by Libby. Libby's car remained parked in an unauthorized place for 20 minutes.

An interpreter in the traffic office said that he did not see any of the trouble. Giovaninni came to the office and said that he wanted his friend released as they did not know the rules. The police traffic officer said he would have to pay a fine and Giovaninni then took out $5. It was explained that it would take a long time to send to headquarters for a receipt and it was suggested that witness should make out a temporary receipt, this to be exchanged for the proper receipt when it arrived. Witness did not hear any complaint of an assault.

Mr. Chang, overseer of the Kiangwan race course, said that Giovaninni asked him to help them as they did not know the rules. Witness went to see the police on their behalf and was then informed that the two foreigners had broken the traffic rules and assaulted the police. Witness said that the foreigners were guests at the race course and should be well treated. Giovaninni said that he was willing to pay a fine and he paid $5. The police officer in charge said that he was willing to release Libby on witness' recommendation, but the fine must be accounted for to the head office. Giovaninni replied that he would rather have an informal receipt on the spot because it would look bad if he had to go to the head office and it would take up too much time. It was because of that that he was given a temporary receipt.

Mr. Schuhl—Is this the first foreigner you have fined?

Witness—The police fix the fines. The club cannot make fines.

Libby, recalled, denied that he assaulted anyone or that he swore at any Chinese, though he admitted saying, "Get away from here," or words to that effect. The Chapei police did not assault him.

Giovaninni, recalled, said that when he paid the fine he demanded a receipt, which was given very reluctantly.

In summing up, Mr. Wright submitted that no case had been made out for damages against the club either for assault or for false imprisonment. The police were entirely independent and if Libby felt that he had a grievance his claim was against the police. The I.R.C. was no more responsible than the Shanghai Race Club would be if the Shanghai Municipal Police arrested a person at the race course. All this was assuming that the action of the police was illegal and unjustified, which he (Mr. Wright) would not admit. It was impossible to believe that a junior official of the club would assault a foreigner for no cause whatever.

"They seem to be," said Mr. Wright, "the type of foreigner, of whom I am glad to say there are not many in China, who resent having to take instructions from a subordinate Chinese."

Mr. Schuhl submitted that the club's officials instigated and acquiesced in every action of the police and they gave a receipt on behalf of the police for the fine. Therefore he contended that the club was responsible for the arrest and so there was cause of action against it.

Judgment was reserved.

Mr. W. P. W. Turner, H.M. Consul, sitting with two Assessors, last week at Peking started the hearing of an action by Mr. E. Reading against Mr. B. Lenox Simpson and the "Far Eastern Times." Plaintiff sues for damages for wrongful dismissal, claiming a sum of $6,950. The defence is to the effect that the plaintiff was not dismissed but merely suspended. It is also pleaded that the handling of certain Rosta News Service articles by the plaintiff resulted in the loss of an advertising contract worth $6,000 per annum as well as other prospective business from the same source. The case is proceeding.

THE SINGAPORE NAVAL BASE SCHEME

Debate in the House of Commons: The Dominions' Protest: Another Case of "Wait and See;" Policy of World Disarmament: Japan's Helplessness

DIVERGENT VIEWS OF GEN. SMUTS AND ADMIRAL JELLICOE

London, Mar. 23.

In an article in the "Observer" endorsing the Government's decision relative to Singapore, Mr. Garvin expresses the hope that Australia and New Zealand will realize that the project has not been absolutely abandoned but postponed in order to strengthen the Prime Minister's efforts to bring about a definite degree of general disarmament, but if no reciprocity is secured the strengthening of Singapore would be unavoidable.

Mr. Garvin lays stress on the fact that Japanese development is still in a military expansionist phase, while Singapore is strategically the throttle valve of the whole English speaking world, the capture of which by Japan would make impossible effective Anglo-American cooperation in the Far East in the event of conflict between Japan and the white races, which all sane men profoundly pray may never arise, and Japan would have an excellent chance of establishing her sovereignty over China and all the East Indies.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 24.

In the House of Commons today, Commander Bellairs (Conservative) asked whether, in view of the gravity of the issue, and in regard to the time required to complete the Singapore project in the event of the Government's disarmament negotiations not succeeding, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald could state the approximate time whereby the House could know whether the negotiations were successful or not.

The Prime Minister replied that it was not a matter of time but of circumstances. If the circumstances did not change, then the loss of time would not be loss at all. Singapore would become necessary when conditions made it necessary.

Later.

Numerous questions about the Singapore base continue to be levelled at the Ministers in the House of Commons.

Replying to Mr. G. Lambert (Liberal), Mr. Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, gave the main details of the proposed £10,500,000 expenditure which, he stated, had not provided for aeroplane or military defence.

In reply to Commander Bellairs (Conservative), Mr. Ammon said that King's Dock at Singapore was the only one which would take a cruiser of the Hawkins class. It would also take any existing mibulged capital ship, smaller aircraft carriers and the projected 10,000-ton cruisers. It would take nine years from the date the orders were given to begin work before the naval base could deal with modern capital ships and aircraft carriers.—Reuter.

Melbourne, Mar. 24.

In response to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's inquiry, Mr. Charlton, the Federal Labour leader, has cabled that the Australian Labour Party had opposed Mr. Bruce's committing Australia to the Singapore base.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 25.

The debate on the question of the Singapore scheme opened in the House of Commons to-day.

Sir Robert Horne (Conservative), moving a reduction of £100 in the Navy estimates as a protest against the Government's policy, said that the Government, while professing to consult the Dominions, had merely announced their decision to the Dominions and did not give them a chance to do anything to alter the Government's judgment. He had never seen consultation take a more discourteous form.

Sir Robert Horne emphasized that the Dominions mainly concerned, Australia and New Zealand (Opposition cheers), had very emphatically protested and had expressed dismay at the Government's decision. He then read extracts from Mr. Bruce's communication and said that it was impossible to imagine a protest expressed in graver language.

Mr. Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, said that the Government did not challenge the question of naval or military strategy. In view of the reported desire of the Americans for an international disarmament conference, we should make a moral gesture in the hope that there would be some co-operation. We would be in a much stronger position if, after exploring all the possibilities, we were compelled to continue our armament policy.

The Protection of Australia.

Referring to Mr. Bruce's view, Mr. Ammon pointed out that the Leader of the Opposition in Australia had said that he did not believe that Australia was in any danger of attack and that he did not think there was any danger in the Pacific. He had declared that a base at Singapore would undoubtedly hamper establishment of international confidence and lay our good faith open to suspicion. Japan was still suffering from the effects of the earthquake and was not likely to complete her armaments. Japan had given every earnest of her desire to carry out the Washington Agreement. Strengthening and enlarging the authority of the League of Nations, Mr. Ammon declared, would be a greater defence to the peace of the world than all the armed forces and new docks that could possibly be built anywhere in the world.

Publication of Correspondence.

Later.

The correspondence relating to the Singapore scheme has been published.

General Smuts, expressing whole-hearted agreement with the Government's policy, declares that the proposed base would be out of keeping with the spirit of the Washington Agreement. The South African Premier sincerely trusts that Mr. Bruce, the Australian Prime Minister, and Mr. Massey, Premier of New Zealand, will acquiesce, because no promise of real security is contained for them in Singapore, for European troubles, would probably synchronize with any future tension in the Pacific and make it out of the question to move the Navy to Singapore.

Admiral Jellicoe's Views.

Admiral Viscount Jellicoe, however, regrets exceedingly the Government's decision. He points out that the foremost naval authorities have stated that a modern fleet would not be able to operate without a properly equipped base, and for the protection of those portions of the Empire situated in the Pacific and Indian Oceans there is no place so suitable as Singapore. The matter intensely concerns Australia, India, New Zealand and a number of Crown Colonies, who, he says, are looking to the present British Government to remember that every citizen of every country of the Empire is entitled to protection from the possibility of attack by a foreign foe. Singapore was intended for defensive purposes and is no more a threat to Japan than Gibraltar is to the United States. New Zealanders had hoped that the lessons of the sufferings of the Navy and the Mercantile Marine in the Pacific during the war would not be so quickly forgotten. The very existence of the Empire, declares the Governor-General of New Zealand, depends upon the Navy. An eminent authority has declared that unless a base like Singapore is established it will be absolutely impossible for the majority of the Empire capital-ships to operate east of Suez.

The Japanese Bogey.

Commander J. M. Kenworthy, Liberal Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, did not believe in the bogey of a Japanese danger, but was of the opinion that the best answer to a possible Japanese invasion of Australia would be a submarine cruiser base somewhere in New Guinea or North Australia.

Commander C. Bellairs, Conservative Member for Maidstone, declared that when the question of disarmament was raised the Premier was bound to be faced with the question of Japanese emigration to Australia. He said that we desired Japan to find room for expansion, but not at the expense of the British Empire in Australia or elsewhere.

London, Mar. 25.

The views expressed by Admiral Viscount Jellicoe in the correspondence relating to the Singapore scheme are those of Mr. W. F. Massey, the New Zealand Prime Minister, on behalf of whom Viscount Jellicoe transmitted the message.—Reuter.

Queensland's Premier's Point of View: Present Amity of Japan and Britain

London, Mar. 26.

Mr. E. G. Theodore, the Prime Minister of Queensland, speaking at a dinner of the Knights of the Round Table to-day, said that, if by delaying the commencement of work at Singapore some process could be carried through which would lead to greater amity among nations, nobody could say that the delay was fatal. He realized that in the event of a clash in the Pacific, Australian interests might be affected and they would be blind if they did not guard against the possibility of disaster. The policy of the British people, however, was not aggrandisement, but the desire to see the British race developed in its own conception of freedom. Japan and Australia were going to loom out in future in the Pacific and it would be to the benefit of the world that they should live in amity. Mr. Theodore thought that the hope of the world lay in the League of nations.

The Japanese Naval Attaché was among the guests.—Reuter.

RESIGNATION OF M. POINCARE

French Government Defeated in Chamber of Deputies on Vote as to Pensions Bill: An Unexpected Motion and Small Attendance

Paris, Mar. 26.

Following a defeat in the Chamber of Deputies on the question of pensions, M. Poincaré has tendered his resignation.

The vote was on an Opposition motion for referring the Pensions Bill back to the Finance Committee with a view to conciliating the views of the Senate and the Chamber. The Government opposed reference to the Committee on the ground of urgency and M. de Lasteyrie, the Minister of Finance, made the question one of confidence.

Upon the announcement of the figures, 271 votes to 264, the Chamber adjourned. M. Poincaré was not present at the sitting.

It is expected that President Millerand will ask M. Poincaré to reconstitute the Cabinet.

Later.

After the vote, M. Poincaré and the other Ministers hastily met in a side-room of the Chamber and decided to proceed to the Elysée in a body. They lost no time. The result of the vote was announced at noon and M. Poincaré tendered his resignation to the President at 12.15. The Cabinet Council, under the presidency of M. Millerand, sat till 1.15, when it was announced that the Premier's resignation had been accepted.

A communiqué states that President Millerand strongly urged M. Poincaré to present himself again at the Chamber and at the Senate in the afternoon in order to receive another vote, but M. Poincaré flatly refused.

M. Poincaré left the Elysée smiling. He told journalists that he had finally and irrevocably decided not to remain in power.

It is now expected that the President will call on M. Barthou to form a Cabinet.

Taken by Surprise.

Later.

The vote in the Chamber was most unexpected. Only a hundred Deputies were present. M. Poincaré was in an adjacent room making a statement before the Foreign Affairs Committee with regard to the Treaty of Lausanne. He had apparently not thought his attendance in the Chamber necessary.

The Pensions Bill was voted by the Chamber at the end of 1923 and by the Senate in February last, but the Senate had adopted the Government's recommendations reducing the pensions of workers on the ground of economy. This aroused the opposition of the parties of the Left, who are championing the cause of the workers. The Government insisted on acceptance of the Senate's amendment, and the Opposition introduced a motion referring the Bill to the Finance Committee with a view to revision. The Government were defeated in the vote on this motion, the Chamber's voting system permitting votes to be cast on behalf of absentee Deputies.

A Reconsideration Probable.

Later.

Urged by President Millerand to form a new Ministry, M. Poincaré has asked for time to consider the matter and has promised to reply to-morrow.

No Change of Policy.

Mar. 26.

The resignation of the Cabinet has made no impression whatever on the disposition of the Bourse.

Mar. 27.

M. Poincaré, interviewed by the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies yesterday evening, said that he believed that he would accept the task of forming a new Cabinet. He stated that in the event of his refusal President Millerand was determined to accept only a Cabinet which would adopt a foreign and domestic policy identical with his own.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 26.

It is practically certain that M. Poincaré will resume the Premiership.

M. Poincaré's resignation created surprise and a degree of regret in official circles in London on account of the excellence of the relations growing out of the recent exchange of notes between the two Premiers. The atmosphere thus created is unlikely to be dissipated by the advent of a new Government, but it is felt that a Government of the extreme Left, such as M. Barthou would be less stable than a moderate Left Ministry headed by M. Poincaré.—Reuter.

STRIKE OF LONDON TRAMWAYMEN

Demand for More Pay: Streets Denuded of Public Vehicles

London, Mar. 20.

The tramwaymen's wage negotiations have broken down. The Transport Union announces that the strike of London busmen and tramwaymen will begin at midnight to-morrow.

The Ministry of Labour has decided to establish a Court of Inquiry. The employers have requested the Union to postpone the strike in the meantime, but the Union has refused.—Reuter.

London, March 22.

London's vast network of street and passenger transport has been practically paralysed by a strike of 40,000 workers operating nearly 2,000 tramcars and 4,000 omnibuses normally carrying 5,000,000 people daily, which began at midnight.

The men did not show great enthusiasm but they unhesitatingly obeyed their leaders' orders. The only hope of settlement lies in the official court of inquiry into the wages dispute, which will open this morning under the presidency of Sir Arthur Colefax, K.C.

Fortunately, the underground railwaymen have hitherto refused to take part in the strike, while an attempt will be made to continue to run 250 "pirate" omnibuses owned by companies outside the combine, but even this limited service is likely to be greatly impeded, if not prevented, by energetic picketing at the garages.

Stoppage Complete.

Later.

The strike committee of the Transport Workers' Union sat throughout the night and reported this morning that the stoppage of buses and tramways was complete.

This is evident on the streets, where an occasional "pirate" bus is to be seen in spite of the close picketing at the "pirate" garages.

A suggestion that the tramways should endeavour to run a non unionist skeleton service has been countered by a threat by the electrical trades union to cut off power, which would also extinguish all lights in London.

The tubes were unusually crowded with City workers this morning and charabancs were also utilized, but it is understood that the underground railwaymen are anxious to join the busmen in sympathetic action on behalf of the tramwaymen.

The court of inquiry opened at the Law Courts this morning.

What the Strike is About.

The origin of the strike, which involves 21,000 busmen and 17,000 tramwaymen, is the demand of the Transportworkers' Union for increase of wages of the 17,000 tramwaymen by 8 shillings a week. The action of the busmen is purely sympathetic, the tramwaymen claiming to be put on a level with the busmen in the matter of wages.

The employers, who include the London County Council and other municipalities and tramway undertakings in the metropolitan area, plead that the state of the finances of the tramways, which has been unsatisfactory for years, forbids an increase of wages. The Transportworkers' Union had previously refused arbitration and only agreed to be represented on the court of inquiry on condition that it would not be bound by the decision of the court. The Union declares that the employers in the past have resisted arbitration and refused to accept the findings of the court of inquiry in 1921. The present claim, which is said to be the minimum, will cost £353,000 a year. The employers allege that the Union has broken the National Wage Agreement by now giving three months' notice to terminate the existing arrangements.—Reuter.

Wasteful Competition

London, Mar 23

Co-ordination of London transport facilities was suggested at the Court of Inquiry into the tramway strike as the only way out of the present difficulties which are attributed to wasteful competition under present conditions.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Venereal Disease.

With reference to the letter from the Shanghai Medical Society on this subject, published in the Gazette of January 17, the Commissioner of Public Health has reported as follows:—

Shanghai, March 6, 1924.

Before commenting on the report of the special committee of the Shanghai Medical Society appointed to investigate venereal disease in Shanghai, it is fitting for me to point out that the great and complex problem of the prevention of venereal disease cannot be solved solely by putting into practice methods of medical science, for the success of these methods must depend on the sympathetic attitude and wise co-operation of the community.

The problem has in the past been unfortunately confused with social, moral and religious considerations. These have hindered spread of knowledge of prevention through a false belief that such knowledge would increase immorality.

It is sufficient to say that true morality is of the inner consciousness, and no true distinction can be drawn between the person who commits an immoral act, and the one who desires to commit the act, but refrains through fear of consequent infection with disease.

To one whose chief concern is the practice of Preventive Medicine in promoting Public Health the problem must be approached as all problems of the prevention of all disease, with a mind open to knowledge and a will ready and able to apply such knowledge for the health and well-being of the community.

Venereal disease, as other communicable disease, will be stamped out by prevention, rather than by treatment, and prevention is the first and highest aim of a Public Health Department.

Past victories over such diseases as Typhoid, Malaria, Typhus and Smallpox have been won by general preventive measures and specific prophylaxis.

Perhaps it is insufficiently realized what a peril to the family, and what a menace to the vitality, efficiency, physical and intellectual progress of the race venereal diseases are: how in addition to the vicious, hosts of the innocent suffer, and how hundreds of thousands of little children lie diseased, deformed, blind, deaf and imbecile, in asylums, poor-law institutions, hospitals, blind-schools and many homes throughout the world, as a result of these diseases.

Education, prevention and treatment are the three essential ways of dealing with the problem.

Education.—This must include knowledge of the facts of sex, instruction in the hygiene of the sexual life and in the nature and consequences of venereal disease. Education to be of value, must, in the words of Huxley, "mould the desire to live in accordance with the laws of Nature."

Prevention.—Venereal diseases are among the most easily prevented of all communicable disease. The best way is, obviously, to abstain from promiscuous sexual intercourse. Self-control is therefore of fundamental importance.

If exposure to risk has occurred, venereal disease can be prevented with almost complete certainty if proper precautions are taken in time.

The germs of Syphilis and Gonorrhoea are of low vitality outside, or on the surface of the body, and are easily destroyed by a disinfectant.

Since the germs soon begin to make their way into the body, the disinfectant must be applied immediately after exposure to infection, at the latest, within an hour. All preventive measures are useless after 12 hours.

Treatment.—If disease has been contracted, treatment should be as early and as complete as possible, and, in the case of Syphilis, should be controlled by the Wassermann Test.

With reference to the recommendations of the special Committee of the Shanghai Medical Society, I will comment briefly on them in order.

Paragraph 1, 2 and 3.—These are matters which concern the Council's policy.

It should be noted that it is, at present, quite impossible to prevent brothels from harbouring prostitutes infected with venereal disease.

Paragraph 4.—The increase of solicitation in the streets, and of clandestine intercourse in parks, is largely, if not entirely due to the large number of poverty-stricken Russian women who are at present refugees in Shanghai.

In spite of the best efforts of the Police the complete solution of the problem must await solution of the greater problem of the Russian refugees.

Paragraph 5 and 6.—It is most desirable that the Council should do all in its power along these lines.

Paragraph 7.—It is gratifying to find that the Shanghai Medical Society so fully endorses the Municipal Free Clinic for venereal diseases.

All recommendations under this heading have already been carried out, except provision of facilities for "prophylaxis", and a Clinic for Women.

These are on the programme and will be established in due course.

Paragraph 8. — Educational measures have already begun in the publication of special pamphlets, and will be extended and amplified in due course.

Paragraph 9.—This is not necessary at the present time, and usually turns out to be an undesirable arrangement.

Paragraph 10.—It is only necessary to endorse these views.

Paragraph 11.—This might be attempted during the year, but it is also highly desirable that all medical practitioners should fill in a similar form in order that statistics may be as complete as possible.

Mixed Court Report for February

Jurisdiction over vessels in the Whangpoo.—An important decision regarding the jurisdiction of this Court within the harbour limits was given by Messrs. Allman, Siqveland and Li, in a case preferred by the captain and other officers of the s.s. "Paul Regendanz" against 17 members of the Chinese crew for assault. During the affray a Chinese fireman was shot by the second officer, a Norwegian; the ship was registered under the Republic of Panama, while the captain and most of the officers were of German nationality. Before the case was concluded the complainants secured their clearance papers from the American Consulate, which looks after the interests of Panama and left the port. It was argued on behalf of the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs that the Court had no jurisdiction over a ship flying the Panama flag and lying in the Whangpoo at Pootung, and consequently the accused should be handed over to the Native Authorities for trial. The Court in sentencing the accused to three weeks imprisonment from the date of arrest handed down the following decision:

"Although the complainants have left this jurisdiction the accused admitted that they took part in and intended the assault. In reading the rules of the Mixed Court of 1869 the Court finds that it has jurisdiction in the Treaty Port of Shanghai and this certainly includes the Foreign vessels on the Whangpoo in the Harbour of Shanghai, especially where Foreigners are concerned and this Court therefore has jurisdiction on the premises. If the representative for the Bureau for Foreign Affairs is dissatisfied with this ruling the matter should be taken up between the Bureau and the Consular Body."

Injunction re native orders.—In a case of False Pretences filed during the month, exception was taken by one of the Chinese Banks to an injunction granted by this Court forbidding the banks to cash the native order under dispute. The bank contended that such an order would result in chaos if upheld by the Court, as once a native order had been issued by the bank it was a negotiable document and must be honoured if presented by any person who had come into possession of it through the usual business channels. As counsel for the complainant expressed the opinion that the vacation of the injunction would not affect his client, the bank's application was granted without argument.

Court Orders carried out by force.—The defendant in a Portuguese Civil Case was arrested on a warrant for failing to sign the perpetual lease of a certain piece of land as ordered by Court. He was brought before Court on February 25 and flatly refused to sign the document. As he still refused to carry out the judgment the Bench through the Magistrate gave instructions that he was to be made to sign by force and eventually he was forced to mark a cross. The tipao was then called on to chop the document which he did but not with the official seal. On being ordered to use the correct seal he said he would if the defendant had signed his name. The Bench then ordered a writer to put in the name, after which the tipao chopped the document. The defendant has since filed an application denying his signature.

Public Health Report for February

The health of the community continued to be satisfactory, the death rates among both Foreigners and Chinese being below those of last month, but slightly above those of the same month last year.

Smallpox was still present. There were no deaths from the disease among Foreign residents, but 4 fresh cases were notified among non-residents; there were 2 deaths. In one case vaccination had never been performed and in the other, unsuccessfully on 3 occasions.

Among the Chinese 29 deaths were reported compared with 35 last month.

One death from epidemic encephalitis, or encephalitis lethargica, sometimes called "sleepy sickness" was certified during the month in the case of a Chinese living outside the Settlement. Several suspicious cases have occurred during the last few months. This is significant in view of the reported presence of the disease in Harbin.

The disease was first described in 1872 at Tubingen in South Germany, since when it has appeared in various parts of Europe, especially Italy, Vienna, and France in 1918, then England and the United States, and now the disease has spread pandemically throughout the world.

It is a communicable disease caused by a filtrable virus which enters the system through the throat and nose, and is found in the saliva. It has a special affinity for the central nervous system, and is characterized by progressive lethargy or stupor, by various paralyses and by fever.

It has resemblances to Cerebrospinal fever, to some forms of Influenza and to several other diseases.

There seemed at one time to be some connexion between Influenza and Epidemic Encephalitis, but the connexion, if any, remains obscure.

The severity of the disease varies considerably. Mild types occur, usually with prolonged symptoms.

In a severe wave of the disease that engulfed villages in Lapland the mortality varied from 7 to 45 per cent. The average is something over 25 per cent.

The disease is most prevalent in the winter months, but may occur at all seasons. The incubation period may be any time up to 2 weeks or longer. Infection may persist for many months and the disease may be transmitted by "carriers." As yet no method of specific prophylaxis is known, and in view of the prolonged infectivity, preventive isolation, even of known cases, is a matter of extreme difficulty.

As in all communicable diseases which are transmitted directly from person to person by infected spray from throat and nose, obvious preventive measures are the avoidance of crowded places, of indiscriminate coughing, sneezing and spitting, and careful toilet of the mouth, throat and nose—in a word—observance of the habits and practices of personal hygiene.

ABOLITION OF GREEK DYNASTY

Establishment of Republic Confirmed: Assembly's Vote of Confidence

Athens, Mar. 22.

A Republic will be proclaimed on March 25. A plebiscite will be held in April to sanction the abolition of the dynasty.—Reuter.

Athens, Mar. 25.

The negotiations with the Royalists proving unfruitful, the Government yesterday presented a motion to the Assembly proclaiming abolition of the dynasty, banishment of the members of the Royal Family and compulsory sale of their property and establishment of a Repulbic, provided the last-named is confirmed by a plebiscite.

The Assembly passed a vote of confidence in the Government by 250 votes to three amid great enthusiasm, thus foreshadowing adoption of the aforementioned motion to-day. The supporters of M. Cafandaris, the Premier, were absent from the sitting.—Reuer.

Athens, Mar. 25.

The Assembly has adopted the resolution in favour of the overthrow of the dynasty and the establishment of a Republic.—Reuter.

CALIPHATE DISPUTE

Moslems Throughout the World Preparing to Call Turkey to Order

Calcutta, Mar. 21.

The Caliphate Conference today passed a resolution favouring Turkey as the seat of the Caliphate as the "strongest Islamic Government, and declaring that, if the present Turkish Government desires to follow a course prejudicial to holding the Caliphate, the Moslems throughout the world must remind the Turks of the necessity of reforming and must take all steps to that end.—Reuter.

FRANCE'S FISCAL BILL

Passed with an Amendment

Paris, Mar. 22.

The Senate passed to-day the Government's fiscal bill with an amendment necessitating the return of the measure to the Chamber of Deputies. This is another stage of the shuttle-cocking between Senate and the Chamber, which has been proceeding for the past week and is povoking impatience on the part of M. Poincaré, who has several times intervened in the debates in both Houses urging expedition.

Mar. 21.

The Chamber of Deputies to-day passed by 374 votes to 175, with slight modifications, the Finance Bill which had been returned from the Senate.

Later.

The Chamber and the Senate sat late to dispose of the fiscal bill, which was passed by both Houses after being again returned to the Senate from the Chamber with a modified amendment.—Reuter.

FRANCE AND THE CZECHS

A Treaty Published in Berlin: the French Explanation

Paris, Mar. 21.

The "Berliner Tageblatt" has published the text of a so-called Franco-Czech Secret Treaty. Correspondents of French papers in Berlin point out that the text is merely a copy of the draft Austro-German Treaty drawn up in 1879, in which the names of M. Poincaré and Dr. Benes are substituted for those of Prince Bismarck and Count Andrassy. The document was handed to the "Berliner Tageblatt" by a big Austrian financier, who, threatened with bankruptcy by the boom in the franc, tried to turn world opinion against France.—Reuter.

RAILWAY FATALITY IN GERMANY

International Express in Collision with Goods Train: Eight Passengers Killed

Metz, Mar. 24.

The International Express, journeying from Ostend to Basle, collided with a goods train at Bensdorf during the night. The casualties reported up to the present number eight dead and 11 injured.

Later.

Owing to terrible mutilation, six out of the eight persons killed in the Express disaster are unidentifiable beyond the fact that two were soldiers, one a postman and one a woman.

It appears that the mail-van and two passenger coaches were telescoped. It is believed that there are other victims still beneath the wreckage.

Later.

The collision was due to a mistake at the points in switching the express to a side line, to which a goods train had previously been diverted. Heartrending scenes followed the express crashing into the goods train at full speed.—Reuter.

Metz, Mar. 25.

The signalman at Bensdorf has been arrested. It is alleged that he fell asleep after the goods train had passed without altering the signals and that he woke up after the accident had occurred.—Reuter.

SERIOUS COLLISION ON THE THAMES

British and American Steamers in Contact: Eight Sailors Killed in their Bunks

London, Mar. 24.

During the night a collision occurred on the Thames between the Shaw, Savill and Albion Co.'s cargo vessel Matatua and the United States Line cargo-vessel American Merchant, which resulted in eight of the crew of the Matatua being killed outright in their bunks and three being severely crushed and having to be sent to hospital.

It is believed that the American Merchant, which is a 7,500-ton vessel on her maiden voyage from New York, crashed into the Matatua broadside on off Holehaven, and struck her amidships in the engine-room. The Matatua filled quickly, but the captain managed to beach her. The American Merchant was damaged and proceeded to Tilbury with pieces of the Matatua's plates hanging on her bow and with her flag at half-mast.—Reuter.

ILLNESS OF THE POPE DENIED

An Irresponsible Report

Rome, Mar. 21.

Marshal Foch arrived to-day. He informed a representative of the "Tribuna" that he has no official mission.

The King and Queen of Rumania will visit Paris on April 10.

Vatican officials, who are in a position of daily approach to the Pope, to-day gave emphatic denial of the report published by a number of newspapers, particularly in England, that his Holiness was sick. Not only is the report untrue, they declare, but his health was never better. Pius XI. when elevated to the Pontificate at first suffered from the confinement within the Vatican. He missed his strenuous daily exercise in the olen air and his health suffered accordingly. He rapidly became accustomed to the new manner of life, and by hard daily walking in the Vatican gardens before breakfast regained his former robustness. — Italian Wireless through Reuter.

LIMITATION IN NAVAL ARMAMENTS

No New Conference Called

Washington, Mar. 22.

The House of Representatives has unanimously adopted an amendment to the Naval Appropriations Bill requesting President Coolidge to take steps for an international conference to consider further limitation of competition in naval armaments.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Mar. 25.

In connexion with despatches from Tokio reporting that Admiral Murakami, Minister for the Navy, approved in principle of the "American suggestions" for further reductions in naval armaments, the State Department denies that any suggestions have been made beyond the action by the House of Representatives in inserting an amendment in the Naval Appropriation Bill, asking President Coolidge to call an international conference for further limitation in naval armaments.

Officials at the White House added that they had not inquired of other Governments relative to a new disarmament conference.—Reuter's American Service.

AMERICAN OIL LEASES INVESTIGATION

Important Witness Declining to Give Evidence

Washington, Mar. 22.

Mr. Sinclair has refused to give evidence before the Senate Oil Committee on the ground that his answers might tend to incriminate him. He declares that any evidence he possesses should be reserved for the courts. The Committee has unanimously resolved on "certifying" Mr. Sinclair to the Senate for contempt. —Reuter's American Service.

Accusations Against Mr. Chase and Bitter Attacks Against Attorney-General

Washington, Mar. 25.

In the course of bitter attacks in the Senate to-day on Mr. Sinclair and Attorney-General Daugherty, Senator Heflin said that crooks were going unwhipped by justice and nothing was being done.

Senator Walsh, Chairman of the Oil Committee, presented a resolution demanding impeachment of Mr. Chase, who has refused to answer questions before the Oil Committee Feeling is strong against Mr. Chase owing to recent testimony that he acted as go-between on behalf of ex-Secretary Fall when the latter was alleged to have requested Senator McKinney to say that he had lent him $100,000.

America's Oil Giving out.

President Coolidge has announced the appointment of a commission to ascertain the best means of conserving the nation's oil supplies.

The statement explains that at the present rate of production it is estimated that there are only 20 years of oil supply within the United States and, when this is exhausted, the United States will be dependent on foreign sources, which during a war would certainly be jeopardized and possibly cut off.

It concludes that "unless, therefore, the Navy has conserved in this country sufficient oil with which to fight a war, our national security will be seriously endangered."—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Mar. 24.

With a view to having Mr. H. F. Sinclair adjudged guilty of contempt, the Senate has decided to certify to the United States Attorney his refusal to answer questions before the Oil Committee. Another witness who refused to be examined is Mr. Chase, son-in-law of Mr. Fall, ex-Secretary of the Interior.—Reuter's American Service.

Enthusiastic Send-off with Greetings from the King

London, Mar. 25.

Squadron-Leader MacLaren and his two companions left Calshott at noon to-day on the flying-boat Vulture on the first lap of their proposed world-flight. A large crowd witnessed the start.

The King telegraphed wishing the three aviators success. Mrs. MacLaren, with their two children, bade her husband farewell. Lord Thomson, Secretary of State for Air, bidding farewell to the aviators, said that they were all proud of them and knew that only superhuman obstacles would prevent their success.

Loud cheers greeted the start of the fliers, who, it is thought, may meet the American aviators, who are also flying around the world, somewhere in the region of Tokio.

Later.

Squadron-Leader A.S.C. MacLaren was compelled to descend during the first lap owing to fog, near Havre.—Reuter.

NEWFOUNDLAND SCANDALS

Charges of Corruption by Former Government

St. John's, Newfoundland, Mar. 21.

The Royal Commission investigating scandals in connexion with the former Squires Government has published its report, alleging irregularities in several Ministries and a waste of public funds in the period preceding the election in cases like "paying idlers for tasks they did not perform."

The report specially blames Sir Richard Squires himself and alleges that he received through his secretary $20,000 with tainted history from a Mr. Meaney, Liquor Controller, and that he similarly received $43,000 from the Dominion Steel Company when the latter were negotiating with the Government for renewal of an ore royalty contract.

In the course of the inquiry, the former Prime Minister unequivocally denied the allegations, although he admitted that monies had been put to the credit of his account for the use of the "Daily Star," a newspaper, while he was absent from the Colony between August and December, 1920.—Reuter's American Service

NEW REGIME IN NORTH RHODESIA

London, Mar. 20.

In the House of Lords to-day, Baron Arnold, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, outlined the new régime in Northern Rhodesia, which will be in force from April 1 in consequance of the transfer of the control of the territory to the Crown from the Chartered Company last year.

The Constitution will in general follow existing Colonial and Protectorate models, with a Governor, Commander-in-Chief, an Executive Council and a Legislative Council with official and unofficial Members. The unofficial Members for the present will not be elected, because it is thought desirable that local opinion should be consulted before a decision is taken with regard to electoral arrangements for the territory. Mr. Herbert James Stanley, Imperial Secretary for South Africa, will be appointed the first Governor.—Reuter.

BRAZIL'S OPENING FOR EX-SOLDIERS

London, Mar. 21.

Mr. E. S. Montagu, interviewed on his return from Brazil, stated incidentally that Brazil offered 6,000 acres of land for the settlement of British ex-soldiers.

Mr. Montagu, former Secretary of State for India, was a member of the British Financial Mission to Brazil to confer with the Brazilian Government in regard to economic questions connected with the investment of British capital in Brazil.—Reuter.

AMERICAN ROUND-WORLD FLIGHT

Seattle, Mar. 21.

Lieutenant Nelson, the fourth in the world flight, arrived today. The party, which is now complete, will rest for a few days before flying along the coast of British Columbia.—Reuter's American Service.

THE HONDURAS REVOLT

Washington, Mar. 23.

President Coolidge has placed an embargo on the sale or shipment of arms or ammunition for Honduras Reuter's American Service.

Mr. Ernest Bevin, Secretary of the Transport workers' Union, expressed the opinion that an increase of eight shillings a week could be granted by adopting traffic control.

Mr. Pick, of the London General Omnibus Co., stated that, owing to private omnibuses competing with trams in the suburbs, the Company were compelled to place their buses on the same routes with the result that there were three services where one service would be adequate. Some means of public control appeared to be the only remedy that would enable the tramway Companies to pay increased wages.

Baron Ashfield, President of the London General Omnibus Co., replying to Mr. Bevin, also expressed the opinion that the only remedy was complete co-ordination of all transport facilities in London under one traffic authority and the charging of only such fares as would enable the payment of good wages.—Reuter.

The Workers' Claims.

London, Mar. 24.

With extraordinary promptitude the Court of Inquiry into the London transport strike has issued an interim report stating, inter alia, that nobody seriously questioned the workers' claim for increased wages. The crisis had arisen owing to the inability of various undertakings to earn sufficient to meet the claim. The report concludes that the only present hope of reopening negotiations between the parties is an undertaking by the Government to press forward legislation which would place Metropolitan passenger traffic under co-ordinating control.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, accompanied by Mr. Harry Gosling, Parliamentary Secretary for the Ministry of Transport, and Mr. Tom Shaw, Minister of Labour, to-day met Baron Ashfield, President of the London General Omnibus Company, and Mr. Ernest Bevin, Secretary of the Transport workers' Union, at the House of Commons, after which it was announced that both sides in the transport dispute would resume negotiations at the Ministry of Labour to-morrow.

The Traffic Bill.

Later.

Replying to a question with regard to the tram strike, Mr. Harry Gosling, Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Transport, announced that the Government would introduce the London Traffic Bill to-morrow and pass it as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald emphasized that the Government were working very hard to end the dispute as speedily as they could.—Reuter.

Breakdown of Negotiations: Union Leaders' Refusal of Employers' Terms

London, Mar. 25.

A deadlock arose in to-day's tramway negotiations. The strike will continue.

The breakdown of negotiations followed an offer by the employers of an increase of five shillings a week, the remaining three shillings to be settled by arbitration. The Union leaders refused the offer.

Both sides agreed to attend a conference, if called by the Ministry of Transport, when the Government thinks it opportune.—Reuter.

BRITISH COAL AND SHIP DISPUTES

Prospect of Peace in Coal-fields Brighter: Owners More Conciliatory

London, Mar. 21

At a joint meeting of coal-mine owners' and miners' representatives, convened to-day by Mr. E. Shinwell, Secretary for the Mines, the points at issue were discussed.

Another meeting has been arranged for March 25 to enable the miners' representatives to report fully upon the situation to the delegate conference on March 26. Both parties expected to Mr. Shinwell what took place to-day. It is understood that the situation has taken a more hopeful turn.

Later.

The threatened lock-out in the ship-yards has been temporarily deferred as the outcome of to-day's meeting at Carlisle, the Employers' Federation having recognized that the Workers' Federation, is doing its best to persuade the Southampton strikers to resume and having agreed to adjourn until March 26 to enable further efforts to be made. The employers have also offered arbitration by the industrial court, failing a mutual agreement.

It is understood that at to-day's joint meeting of the coal-owners and miners, the latter pleaded with the owners to increase their offer. The owners promised to consider the matter. The meeting was adjourned until March 25.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 24.

Replying to questions in the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald said that the Government did not intend to introduce the Miners' Minimum Wage Bill in order to settle the present dispute, which he hoped would be settled by industrial methods.—Reuter

London, Mar. 25.

The coal-owners have declined to increase their offer to increase the minimum wage to 30 per cent. above the 1914 wage, creating a deadlock. Conferences yesterday evening did not advance matters towards a settlement.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 26.

SHAMEFUL OUTRAGE IN IRELAND

Unoffending British Soldiers Fired on at Queenstown by Free State Rebels

London, Mar. 21.

Four Free State soldiers fired with a machine-gun on British troops landing in Queenstown on leave to-day. One soldier was killed and 17 wounded, some of whom are civilians. Shots were fired on H. M. S. Scythe from a motor-car, the occupants shouting "Up Tobin I."

Mar. 22.

President Cosgrave telegraphed to Mr. Ramsay Macdonald saying that he was shocked to learn that British troops had been fired on and assuring him that this cowardly crime will arouse the same horror and detestation throughout Ireland as it caused himself and his colleagues and that no efforts will be spared to bring the criminals to account. The relatives of the victims can rely on the sympathy and justice of his Government. Whether the criminals were masquerading in Free State uniforms yet remains to be determined.—Reuter.

Queenstown, Mar. 22.

Fuller details of the outrage show that a large high-powered motor-car containing four men dressed as Free State officers drove to the pier-head at seven o'clock yesterday evening and without warning opened fire with machine guns on a party of about 50 people, mostly British soldiers just landed from a Spike Island military launch, centring their attention on the soldiers. The uninjured immediately scattered. Some of the soldiers helped their wounded comrades back to the launch, which returned immediately to Spike Island. The motor-car meanwhile raced out of town, firing as it went at the destroyer Scythe, but it is not believed that the vessel was hit.

Lorry-loads of Free State troops are scouring the district for the perpetrators of the outrage, who are generally believed to be some of the mutineers.

Four of those injured are not expected to recover.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 22.

A second British soldier wounded at Queenstown has succumbed to his injuries.

The War Office announces that one officer was seriously wounded and seven men were dangerously wounded, six seriously wounded and three slightly wounded. Five civilians, of whom two were women, were also wounded.

Major-General Liam Tobin has written to the Dublin papers disclaiming responsibility for the "cowardly act."

The Free State Government is offering a reward of £10,000 for the capture of the men concerned in the outrage.—Reuter.

Dublin, Mar. 22.

The eight officers arrested in the Parnell Street operations on Tuesday night have been released on parole, having accepted the Government's conditions regarding the surrender of arms taken during the mutiny.—Reuter.

Act of Irresponsible Individuals

London, Mar. 24.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to Mr. Neville Chamberlain (Conservative), Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, expressed the Government's deepest sympathy with the victims of the cowardly and brutal outrage at Queenstown (cheers) and with their relatives and friends.

He emphasized that the Government of every self-governing Dominion was solely responsible for the preservation of law within its own territories. He assured the relations of British troops that the inhabitants of Queenstown were always very friendly (cheers). There had not been the slightest complaint against the conduct of the troops.

The Government was completely confident that the Free State Government would bring to justice the perpetrators of the outrage and wipe out the blot on Irish honour. He was sure that an overwhelming majority of the Irish were behind the Government against the perpetrators of the crime, almost certainly the act of irresponsible individuals with the motive of causing the downfall of the Free State Government by embroiling it with Britain.—Reuter.

Stolen Arms Restored.

Dublin, Mar. 25.

It is announced that Mr. Joseph McGrath, the Minister for Industry and Commerce, has handed to General O'Duffy the arms and equipment which the mutineers took from Gormanstown and Daldonnel. It is expected that the remaining arms will be restored within 24 hours.—Reuter.

Some Ministerial Resignations Postponed: Improvement in the Outlook

London, Mar. 25.

The bewildering political situation in Ireland, resulting from the Army crisis, was somewhat relieved to-day by the announcement of Mr. Joseph McGrath, Minister of Industry and Commerce, that he had postponed his resignation from the Dail and that the other Deputies who had also threatened to resign were doing likewise.

The threat of resignation was made as a protest against the Government's alleged breach of an undertaking given to Mr. McGrath that the deserted officers who surrendered would be reinstated and the incident closed.—Reuter.

THE INDIAN BUDGET REJECTION

All Development Schemes Held Up: Ministers' Salaries Reduced to Rs. 2

Delhi, Mar. 20.

In the course of a lively discussion in the Legislative Assembly to-day on a motion urging the repeal of the repressive laws, which Indian members declared were used as a weapon to suppress political aspirations, Sir W. M. Hailey, defending the laws, said that he saw signs of a mass movement which the Government called by a more sinister name. There had been a serious increase of crime which was not connected with politics. He ridiculed the suggestion that a round-table conference would eradicate anarchical crime; the only remedy was preventive legislation. The resolution was carried by 68 votes to 44.—Reuter.

Nagpur, Mar. 24.

Consequent on the United Provinces Legislature's rejection of the supply measures on March 4, the Governor, Sir William Marris, has announced that he will certify the expenditure essential for carrying on the administration. He will restore practically all the supplies for the reserved department, while, with respect to the transferred department, he is authorized only to sanction the essential expenditure. All development schemes will, therefore, be held up.

He is unable to sanction a reasonable salary for the Ministers, which the Council reduced to two rupees, and is therefore obliged to take over the transferred administration himself. Sir William pointed out that the action of the Legislature deprived the province of urgent developments and a very important advance towards self-government.—Reuter.

Calcutta, Mar. 24.

The Bengal Legislative Council continues to reject Budget items. To-day it rejected votes aggregating 191½ lakhs, including the appropriation for the Ministers' salaries.—Reuter.

GERMAN REPARATIONS INQUIRY

Return of British Experts Due to Differences with Belgian and French Colleagues

London, Mar. 23.

Some uneasiness is felt in Paris owing to the return of the British experts, Dr. McKenna and Sir John Bradbury, to London, following persistent rumours of differences between them and their French and Belgian colleagues, especially with regard to what Germany would be able to pay during the two or three years' moratorium and the few years following it. It is believed that their sudden visit to London is due to the necessity of adjusting the opposing points of view.

Meanwhile it is reported that M. Poincaré has sent to the French Ambassador in London an important communication for the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, again discussing the question of the future security of France's eastern frontier. The opinion is expressed that M. Poincaré desires to make eventual agreement easier by broadening the grounds of discussion

A Difficult Situation.

Mar. 24.

The situation arising from the differences amongst the reparations experts, on which the British representatives have returned to report to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, is described here as extremely difficult, if not critical. It is understood that the British are of opinion that Germany should have a real moratorium, whereas the French and Belgians insist on substantial deliveries in kind and defrayal of the costs of occupation during the proposed moratorium. They contend that, if Germany is unable to finance such deliveries, they should be financed out of an international loan, which would mean indirect British financial assistance to countries already heavily indebted to us.

Germany's capacity to pay after a two or three years' moratorium has also been the subject of protracted discussion. Annuities ranging from £100,000,000 to £225,000,000 have been suggested.—Reuter.

London, Mar. 24.

Reuter's Agency understands that no special significance is attached to the visit of the British experts on the reparations committees to London. Mr. Reginald McKenna and Sir John Bradbury are merely continuing the policy of keeping in touch with the Government.

The expert committee dealing with the flight of German capital abroad has practically finished its labours, but the other committee is still dealing with the problem of stabilizing German currency and balancing the Budget.

Talk of new difficulties is not taken too seriously. Apparently it only relates to the question of drafting.

It is premature to say when the reports of the committees will be published, but they will be issued as speedily as possible.—Reuter.

MILITARY CONTROL IN GERMANY

Negotiations in Progress With German Government for Early Resumption

London, Mar. 26

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to a question, Mr. Ponsonby, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said that the Allies now proposed to resume military control in Germany, to which they were entitled by treaty. Negotiations were at present in progress with the German Government with regard to future proceedings.

The question of the arrest of the German Pacifist leader, Professor Quidde, at Munich on March 17 by order of the Public Prosecutor, in connexion with a letter he was alleged to have sent to General von Seeckt declaring that youths were in military training throughout Germany under Reichswehr supervision, was being considered.—Reuter.

ESPIONAGE OFFICER'S FATE

French Captain Sentenced to 12 Years' Imprisonment by Leipzig Court

Leipzig, Mar. 21.

The French Capt. Darmont, the alleged head of the present French espionage service at Bale, was tried at Leipzig by the Supreme Court yesterday and has been sentenced to 12 years' penal servitude and a fine of 5,000 gold marks.

The Swiss cinema manager, M. Bienz, who was sentenced on March 18 to 11 years' penal servitude for espionage on behalf of France, confessed that he had supplied Capt. Darmont with 62 reports on the German Reichswehr, for which during 1922 he obtained sums aggregating 1,000 000 marks.—Reuter.

REPUBLIC IN PERSIA

Another Oriental Parliament Bitten: Strong Objection Taken by People

Teheran, Mar. 21.

The long absences in Europe of the Shah have strengthened the movement in favour of a Republic in Persia. Even the Conservatives in the Mejliss are inclining towards a Republic, but there is still considerable Royalist sentiment among the population. An anti-Republican crowd, overcoming the resistance of the police, entered the Mejliss, pulled down flags and flagstaffs and beat the Republican speakers. The police were reinforced and restored order.

The leader of the Progressives in the Mejliss has submitted for urgency decision proposals with regard to change of régime and revision of the Constitutional laws.—Reuter.

Proposal to Depose the Shah

London, Mar. 24.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

THE DOCK STRIKE: A LABOUR VIEW

Where Reasonableness Might Have Won the Employers Lose Through Mussolini Tactics

From Our Trade Union Correspondent

Manchester, Mar. 24.

No part of the working community in Great Britain has done more to make industrial history than the dockers. Their famous strike in the late eighties is still a landmark in the annals of Labour. The Shaw Award of 1920 giving them 16 shillings a day, and a 44 hour, week, established a wage standard that all other trades fought to emulate with more or less success. And now the cost of living is creeping up again they are the first to strike for higher wages. What is more, they have won them. Their strike and its success will be the forerunner of many others. Resolutions asking the various executive committees to move for advances of wages are pouring into trades union headquarters from local branches all over the country. We are on the brink of another period of industrial turmoil.

In the dispute that has just finished the general public have been strong partisans of the dockers. Their conditions of labour in the docks have had a fairly good press since they were first described by journalists and social workers 40 years ago. It is casual labour at its worst; the most harsh contact of capital and labour in the world. Penned in enclosures like cattle, a crowd of miserable and half-starved men used to fight desperately for the metal checks that entitled them to a day's work at sixpence per hour. There were always twice as many men as there were jobs. There were always thousands who went empty and hungry away. The evil has never been remedied. During the later years of the war the general shortage of Labour relieved the pressure. But the old conditions came back with the trade depression. There were clauses in the Shaw Award recommending a system of registration and a guaranteed week. Both parties accepted the Shaw Agreement, but the employers subsequently refused to carry out the decasualization proposals. They said that the Unemployment Insurance Act was maintainence enough for the dockers, and as trade had by then fallen off it was considered inexpedient to insist upon that part of the agreement. Even the anti-labour press characterized this excuse as a mean and unworthy evasion.

A GRATUITOUS SNEER.

When Mr. Bevin, the docker's leader, last interviewed Lord Devonport, the employers' president, he brought up this question of maintenance. Lord Devonport sneered, "Maintenance! Maintenance is the hardy annual. You know that was put in there to make your men swallow the reduction." This gratuitous insult to a man of unimpeachable integrity did not a little to bring about the stoppage of work. Coupled with the summary way in which the same peer refused all the men's demands without troubling to discuss them with his colleagues, it made a strike inevitable. We will go further. It caused the strike. If the dockers had been offered the terms they were offered the day before they struck work,—a shilling advance, arbitration on the second shilling, and a new committee to consider a maintenance scheme, they would have jumped at them. But Lord Devonport put their backs up. Their slogan was changed to "2/- or nothing," and Bevin said he was not going to "auction the human" again. They would say what they wanted, and stop out until they got it.

The Shaw Award of 16/- a day came into operation in March, 1920. Sixteen months later there were agreed cuts bringing wages down to 14/- in the larger ports, and 13/- in the smaller ports. Five months later another shilling came off with another fall in the cost of living, and at subsequent dates in the same year two more shillings came off with no corresponding fall in the cost of living. The men's leaders persuaded their members to agree to these cuts as a worker's contribution towards trade recovery. In July 1923 another shilling came off, owing to a slight fall in the cost of living. This, the last reduction, was so resented by the dockers that in many ports they came out on strike. But their leaders stood by the agreement and persuaded them to return. Wages were now 10/- a day in the larger ports and 9/- in the smaller. There are many other workers whose wage rates are lower than this but their jobs are regular. The docker's job is not regular, and the average wage earned is round about 30/- a week. This is not enough to pay the rent and provide adequate food for a small family in any large British town.

A COMPLETE BLOCKADE.

The Shaw Agreement was due to expire on February 16. Two months before that date the men asked the employers to restore to them the two shilling cuts that were made without any corresponding fall in the cost of living. They claimed that these cuts were a sacrifice on their part to bring about a revival of trade, and that the employers had not passed them on to the public. They also claimed, and rightly, that there was a steady increase taking place in the cost of living. This is supported by the Board of Trade figures. Lastly, they called attention to the profits and huge reserves of the shipping companies. Their application was turned down without being considered.

When the day came the stoppage of work was complete. The submarine campaign at its worst fell far short of it as a blockade of this country. This, however, was not the distinguishing feature of the strike. Other strikes have created quite as much industrial havoc. Its unique feature was its success. For the first time since the period of trade depression commenced a trade union has won a contest with its employers. And it won it quickly. It won it because a Labour Government was in power.

Had the strike taken place last year the port authorities would have looked upon the million and a quarter unemployed as a reserve of black-leg labour on which they could draw. The Government would have curtailed unconvenanted unemployment benefits and provided adequate police and military protection for such of the workless as would consent to take the places of the strikers. The success of these tactics would have frightened the waverers among the strikers and they would have drifted back to work. The leaders would then have accepted the best terms they could get and the strike would be called off. That has been the procedure in the past. It was what Lord Devonport was counting on when he insulted Mr. Bevin and rejected all his proposals.

BLACK-LEG LABOUR IMPOSSIBLE.

The Labour Government first put the matter in the hands of the Minister of Labour, Mr. Tom Shaw. He did all he could to avert the strike and failed. The Government then rushed its Bill through Parliament to abolish the "gap" and put all the unemployed on insurance benefit. In the meantime the strike had started. Picketing was efficiently organized and the employers saw that it was impossible to import black-leg labour. It would have to be protected and there was no protection forthcoming. In less than 48 hours all the employers outside London were prepared to throw up the sponge and pay the 2/-, and the men could have made a number of local settlements They refused to do so.

Failing to avert the strike the Minister of Labour at once appointed a Court of Inquiry under part 2, of the Industrial Courts Act. It had power to call any witnesses, and for any information and documents it thought necessary, and was also empowered to take evidence on oath. Its Chairman was a noted barrister, Mr. Holman Gregory, K.C., and he was assisted by Sir Andrew Duncan, the Vice-President of the Shipbuilding Employer's Federation, and Mr. H. Boothman, Secretary of the Operative Cotton Spinners.

THE DOCKERS' K. C.

The establishment of this Court was the culminating blow to the employers. Mr. Bevin's genius for cross examination had won him the nickname of "The Docker's K. C." during the Shaw inquiry into the docker's conditions in 1920. His ability to state a case still shows no signs of falling off. He recounted all the negotiations before the crisis came; pointed out how faithfully the workers had kept the agreement and how they had given the employers an additional two shillings as their sacrifice towards a revival of trade. He compared the trouble which Labour has to get an increased price for its services, with the ease with which great monopolies can enforce a higher price for its commodities. Petrol companies, he said, had taxed the country to the tune of six and a quarter millions, but there was no Government action, no court of inquiry, and no protest in the city.

Sir Norman Hill stated the case for the employers. He began by admitting the truth of nearly all that Mr. Bevin said, and then went on to try to prove that the shareholders and their companies had also made great sacrifices. It was an unconvincing plea because the case of the companies up to that time had been entirely different. They had claimed that all increases were passed on to the public, and justified their resistance to the men's demands by posing as the defenders of the public against the rapacity of the dockers. Sir Norman practically admitted that there had been no reduction in dividends. He justified the low wages of the dockers by comparing them with other low wages in some other industries.

THE EMPLOYERS GIVE IN.

The manner of the speech was as unconvincing as its matter. It got a bad press, and completed the discomfiture of the employers. The more responsible newspapers advised them to accede to the docker's demands at once, and put an end to the Inquiry. They therefore held a meeting on the evening of the first day of the Inquiry and decided to offer the dockers the two shillings; the first to be paid at once; the second in three months time; and they also agreed to a decasualisation scheme. The men's leaders agreed to recommend these terms to their members. Several ports have refused them, and expressed their intention of standing out for the whole two shillings at once, but it is expected that they will modify their demand and agree to the compromise.

There is general agreement that the whole blame for the strike and all its consequences falls on the shoulders of Lord Devonport. His method of dealing with employees lies at the root of more than half of our industrial troubles. There are many men in the ranks of Labour of the same unaccommodating temper. They have, however, very little chance of rising to positions in trade unions where their destructive schemes can be carried out. British Labour is moderate, and it usually chooses leaders of moderate views. The same cannot be said of employer's federations. Employers in choosing a leader like a man who will "make a strong stand." These "strong" men are the bane of the British industrial world. They have little knowledge of, and no sympathy with, the point of view of the workers. It is to be hoped that other employers' federations will see the moral of this strike and keep their Mussolini's in strictly subordinate positions. The country has had enough of them. The era of the Larkins and Devonports has passed.

Few people ascribe the victory of the dockers to the excellent case they had. It is, either credited to the Labour Government now in power or to the Court of Inquiry. It is being asked why the Court was not set up before. The truth is, the public would have paid very little attention to it, or its findings, if it had been. The reason they hung breathless on the evidence given before it was the fact that it was the key expected to unlock all our ports again. It will have the same prestige in any strike in the future, but only when a strike is actually on. The factor of a Labour Government was more important. Neither the opponents nor the supporters of Labour had anticipated that its existence would have such an effect on an industrial dispute. It is now seen that the question of giving or withholding military protection to organized blacklegs may be the decisive factor in a national strike.

LONDON CRITICISMS OF CHINA

Peking's Impudent Reply on the Brigandage Question: The Bessell Outrage

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, Feb. 28.

Critiocisms with regard to Chinese politics continue unabated. Apparently the reply of the Prime Minister to Commander Bellairs on the subject of the precautions now being taken by the Chinese Government to ensure the protection of foreigners has not been well received in the Far East. The following are his exact words:

"The Chinese Government have assured the foreign representatives at Peking that they regard the whole matter of railway policing and protection as an urgent problem of China's internal administration, and are fully conscious of their responsibility for a practical solution, and it is understood that they have already taken steps to reorganize the railway police force. As regards the general question of the protection of foreigners against brigandage, the Chinese Government have despatched renewed orders to provincial authorities to redouble their efforts in the prosecution of this essential duty, and the matter was made the subject of especial reference by the President in his inaugural address on October 10 last."

There is a great dissatisfaction at the failure to punish the officer guilty of the assault on Mr. Bessell the railway employee. The "Telegraph" this week publishes the following:

"In consequence of the brutal assault recently committed by a Chinese officer and his men upon Mr. Bessell, an aged British railway official at Fengtai, the British Minister at Peking has made strong and repeated representations to the Peking Government for the apprehension and trial of the culprits, but, so far, without avail. The Chinese authorities are hedging, and plead that they are unable to trace the officer in question, who is doubtless being shielded by high military and political influences.

In view of this unsatisfactory state of affairs it has been decided, after consultation with London, to proceed to the re-establishment of a British military post at Fengtai station, for the future protection of the personnel. Should outrages occur elsewhere on the line, similar measures will no doubt be taken."

I believe that the statement is fully correct and that the British Government does think that the Chinese Government is remiss in taking action in the matter.

TSAO KUN UNDER A CLOUD.

It is an exceedingly stupid policy on the part of China because even among those who are friendly to that country especially with regard to extraterritoriality, such incidents cause a very bad impression. There is a series of rumours, in addition, that the President is protecting his own people even at the expense of Europeans, and that he is securing all the chief administrative posts for his own creatures. It is also rumoured here that one of the men to go is General Yen who controls the Province of Shansi. As he is regarded as one of the ablest men in China, to whom Sir John Jordan has always paid warm tributes, no more unfelicitous step could possibly be taken by any Chinese administration. The President has on his accession to office sent a message to King George expressing the hope that the good relations of the two countries will improve. They will only improve if there is better government and it is unfortunate that the Chinese President is already under a cloud here so far as expert public opinion is concerned.

THE TRADE MARKS QUESTION.

The Chinese Legation this week issued the following statement.

"With reference to the controversy of the New Trade Mark Regulations, the Doyen of the Diplomatic Corps in Peking has addressed several notes to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, requesting that the treaty rights enjoyed by the foreign merchants be not impaired by the new Regulations, that the preferential rights in regard to Customs [illegible] be reserved, and that [illegible] ports be employed to afford [illegible]. He further requested that the enforcement of the New Trade Mark Registration as being stipulated for six months be deferred until the date of recognition by the Powers, in order to allow more time for them to consider the question of recognition.

It is most likely that the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce will approve the above proposals; so the settlement of the question does not seem to be remote.

Experts are getting ready for the International Conference at Geneva in November next on the Anti drug campaign. They meet as a Committee on March 5, also in Geneva to prepare the programme, which will deal both with the growth of the opium poppy and the coca plant. They are appealing to the Government to give Sir John Jordan, our representative, the widest instructions. Evidently something needs to be done because the drug traffic here continues unabated.

A TOWER OF LONDON CEREMONIAL

Tribute to a Murdered King

Visitors to the Tower of London who go to the Wakefield Tower to see the Royal Regalia should turn aside to the recess where last year a tablet was let in to mark the reputed death-place of that gentle monarch Henry VI. Richard III., to whose record of dark villainies tradition adds that of the murder of Henry, is supposed to have found the ex-King praying in the oratory and stabbed him to death, "punching his anointed body full of deadly holes," as Shakespeare has it.

During January a beautifully illuminated vellum has been affixed to the wall "In the name of the Blessed Trinity, Father Son, and Holy Ghost, of our Lady Saint Mary, Mother of Christ, and All the Holy Company of Heaven." It reads as follows:—

"The Society of Blessed Mary of Eton gives Sir George Younghusband, the present Keeper of the Jewel House, and to his successors in that office, the sum of Ten Pounds Sterling, asking him and his successors each year on the 21st day of May, at 6 o'clock in the evening, either with his own hand, or by the hand of another chosen by him, to lay some white flowers on the floor of the oratory of the Wakefield Tower, the present Jewel House, this being the place where our Royal Founder, King Henry the Sixth of holy memory, is believed to have been kneeling at the close of his life here upon earth in the year of our Lord 1471."

This tribute of devotion has the approval of the Constable of the Tower and the sanction of His Majesty George the Fifth. The flowers are to be lilies of Eton tied together with a blue riband in correspondence with a similar offering made year by year on the Eve of the Feast of St. Nicholas by two of the King's Scholars at the grave in St. George's Chapel at Windsor. The Keeper of the Jewel House is asked to arrange for the removal of the flowers at the same hour on the following evening and for them to be burnt.

Two Eton King's Scholars attended in connexion with the fixing up of this illuminated notice, recording a ceremony carried out last May for the first time.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

THE SITUATION IN WESTERN EUROPE

French and Belgian Industrial Enterprises in Ruhr and Rhineland: Separatist Movements in the Palatinate: Security for Reparations and Special Pacts

GERMANY'S ADMISSION TO LEAGUE OF NATIONS

London, Mar. 27.

Mr. Asquith, in the House of Commons to-day, asked for information on the situation in Western Europe, especially with regard to the reports that French organizations were energetically perfecting a system of local agreements, which would convert the occupied territories into a special reparations preserve by methods which would practically ruin the industries concerned and seriously impair Germany's power to stabilize her currency. He expressed disquietude lest the Administration of the Saar might be exercising arbitrary powers unknown to democratic countries.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, replying, said that the British Government, after investigation, had come to the conclusion that the agreements hitherto concluded by French and Belgian industrial organizations in the Ruhr and Rhineland with German industrialists did not conflict with the Peace Treaty or the reparations settlement. There had, indeed, been attempts to make these agreements an occasion for a redistribution of reparations settlements, in which connexion the Government had hitherto made successful protests and would continue to protest. The British Government had insisted that the committees of the Reparations Commission, established by the Treaty of Versailles, should strictly confine themselves to their constitutional functions, particularly the committees of the Saar and the Palatinate. The difficulties in the Palatinate were especially great on account of the fact that "the Separatist movements were not supported merely from the inside." (Liberal Cheers.)

The Reparations Question.

Passing to the question of security, Mr. MacDonald emphasized his conviction that France would never get security by special pacts. The British Government aimed at securing a moral guarantee body like the League of Nations, but certain things must first be done. The question of reparations must be settled. The problem of security, in the event of a full agreement on reparations, presented very slight difficulties, but they would be very grave if there were merely an agreement between the Allies and a sulky Germany.

The Allies must make up their minds that Germany was bound to enter the League of Nations (Ministerial cheers). If the difficulties due to the occupation of the Ruhr were cleared up, Mr. MacDonald declared, then he woult like to see an invitation signed by France, America, Italy and Britain to all the nations of the world to consider the whole question of disarmament. That was no mere dream, because there was a stronger body of men in responsible positions throughout the world than ever before who were anxious to support a Government which was working to that end.

In conclusion, the Prime Minister declared that he was very anxious to have the question of Jubaland and the Dodecanese settled in order to remove a cause of irritation between Britain and Italy.

Mr. Lloyd George's Complaint.

Mr. Lloyd George complained of the vagueness of Mr. MacDonald's statement. He drew attention to M. Poincaré's declarations that French troops would remain in the Rhineland until reparations had been discharged. He declared that, if the committees of experts recommended a reduction of the assessment against Germany, abatement should be made all round. In conclusion he said that no people on earth gave away less for sentiment than the French.

Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, referring to the proposal to call an international disarmament conference, said that the Government had such a conference in view, but it did not signify much whether it was called by one or two Powers or by the League of Nations.—Reuter.

LONDON TRANSPORT DISPUTE

Resumption of Negotiations: Both Parties Anxious to Reach a Settlement

London, Mar. 27.

In the House of Commons to-day the Premier, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, announced the resumption of negotiations between the parties in the traffic dispute. To-night's conference had been adjourned until to-morrow. He found that both sides were very desirous of effecting a settlement.

The Premier bewailed the fact that since the beginning of the year a whole series of industrial disputes which have been maturing for months and even for years had come to a head. The Government would do their best to meet the public convenience while the dispute lasted and in the event of its spreading. The first step would be the issue of a proclamation of a state of emergency. Every hospital would be provided with facilities for bringing and taking away patients, the larger public services must be maintained and the Government must protect those engaged in their legal occupations. He emphasized that the Government would not merely act as a strike-breaking organization.

Quiet and Calm Action.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, after referring to various outside suggestions to cope with the strike, including flooding of the streets with soldiers, and commandeering of employers' property and material, declared that the only rule the Government would adopt was the rule of practical convenience. It was quiet and calm action that told in the end and the Government would do nothing to broaden and deepen the existing divisions.

Mr. Stanley Baldwin entirely approved of the Government's foresight in making the proclamation. He hoped that later on the Government and the House of Commons would consider what was possibly the most serious question the country had to face, namely, how to get some kind even of temporary peace in industry that would give the country a chance of recovering.

Mr. Lloyd George supported the suggestion as regards commandeering if there were insufficient voluntary assistance. He said that the Premier need not imagine that this was an extreme proposal, from which any section of the House would shrink if it was necessary.

Government Negotiations.

Later.

Amid Labour cries of "Oh!" and Opposition cheers, Viscount Curzon (Conservative) asked in the House of Commons to-day whether the emergency committee of Ministers, whose establishment Mr. Ramsay MacDonald foreshadowed yesterday, had made any proposals to mitigate the hardship resulting from the tram and bus strike in London, what the Government proposed to do to protect the public if the strike extended, as threatened, to other essential services, and whether the Government would give full protection to those who were prepared to maintain these services.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald replied that the committee had formulated proposals which, he hoped, were in the public interest.

The rest of the question was postponed, as he had arranged to see all the interests concerned to-night to negotiate a certain offer.—Reuter.

RUSSIA'S LIABILITIES TO BRITAIN

Riga, Mar. 27.

It is reported from Moscow that, in the course of his report to the Congress of Russian Engineers, M. Zinovieff stated that Britain had presented to Russia a claim of 10,390,000,000 gold roubles, excluding three milliards, representing the interest on loans since 1915. He added that Russia did not intend to make concessions in this respect and she had presented a counter-claim exceeding Britain's demands.—Reuter.

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

Money Borrowing: Mr. Hughes and Drifting: Resurrection of Middle-class Party: Successful Fruit Selling: Chinese Trade Commissioner Defended

From Our Own Correspondent.

Melbourne, Feb. 15.

My last letter had just started on its journey when the Loan Council, consisting of the Commonwealth and State Treasurers, met in response to an "S.O.S." call from Dr. Earle Page, the acting Prime Minister and Commonwealth Treasurer. Australia was generous to the returned soldiers and the relatives of those who did not return, and granted war gratuities, averaging about £100 apiece, bearing interest at 5½ per cent. and redeemable in this coming month of May. To meet special cases some thousands were at once redeemed, and the Commonwealth allowed banks and insurance companies to take over about £6,000,000. The result is to-day that there are about £13,000,000 of gratuity bonds which must be redeemed by the end of May, and a loan is necessary in order to raise the redemption money, and also to give the banks and others a new stock in place of that which they now hold. But the trouble Dr. Page had to face was that all the States want loan money, and, despite the fact that Australia has a huge trade balance in London, the exchanges are such that the money cannot be transferred to the Commonwealth except at inordinate expense. Therefore borrowing must take place in Australia, and with six States and the Commonwealth all scrambling for money, the prospects of paying usurious interest seemed imminent. Queensland said it must have £1,250,000 at once, and Western Australia could not be content with less than £750,000. In the end they were promised these sums on loan from the Commonwealth, and all six States, so far as the Council could bind them, undertook not to borrow in Australia until after the end of the financial year closing June 30 next. It was also agreed that the rate of interest should be 6 per cent., that the currency of loans should not exceed 10 years, and that the interest on loans in Australia should be subject to both Commonwealth and State income taxation. Western Australia at once celebrated this agreement by going to London and raising £2,000,000 at 5½ per cent., while the Commonwealth is calling for a loan of an indefinite amount bearing 6 per cent. interest, and with optional currencies of three, five or 10 years. While Dr. Page is disposed to say that his idea of a Loan Council is proving very fruitful, it is only right to point out that the body is purely advisory, and already there is some grumbling by State ministers as to the prospect of the curtailment of their borrowings, while the Federal Treasurer is saying that a good deal more restriction in spending loan money is necessary.

MR. HUGHES AS A LECTURER.

There have been some cheap gibes at Mr. W. M. Hughes, the late Prime Minister, on the occasion of his departure for the United States to deliver a series of lectures on Australia, but a very great deal of interest will be felt in what he says. Melbourne thought fit to ignore entirely his departure, but Sydney, possibly out of pure cussedness, gave him a series of send-off functions. Mr. Hughes did not let the opportunity slip of making some caustic remarks about the trend of Australian politics and parties. He said that the Nationalist party—that is the party he himself formed—is drifting apart, the Liberals one way and the Labour, or ex-Labour, the other. He claimed that this trend was noticeable not only in Federal, but also in the State politics of Victoria and New South Wales. After all, he was only reiterating what has been said must happen, if the Conservatives and Liberals have their way. They have driven nearly all Mr. Hughes' Labour followers in Parliament out of public life, but in New South Wales and Victoria the same ex-Labour members are driving the Nationalist Governments to the wall. In other words, parties are drifting into their original habitations, and Mr. Hughes realizes this. But there is another side, namely that of the Labour Party, which is also drifting. The war gave the Communists a chance to undermine craft unionism, and practically to go near to capturing the Labour Party. Now the militant and the craft wings are drifting apart, and the former accuse the latter of trying to form a middle-class party, which is of course no use to those who believe that man will never be happy until the gutters are running with gore. The lectures of Mr. Hughes will, it is supposed, tell the Americans what he knows about Australia and her problems, but one may expect that he will also find time to say things which will help to reconcile him with the "middle-class" Labour party and thus give him a very considerable following throughout the Commonwealth. In the Country organization which is at present supporting the Bruce-Page combination there is a very large section of ex-Labourite electors. Mr. Hughes may hope to detach these and if he does so his triumphant return to office is by no means beyond the realms of possibility.

A POLICY OF DRIFT.

When Mr. Hughes said the wings of the Nationalist party were drifting asunder he naturally had in mind not only the discontent of himself and his immediate followers in the Federal Parliament, but also the manner in which the ex-Labourites of the Country Party are hampering the Nationalist Government of New South Wales and have actually defeated a Government nominee in a by-election in Victoria. This last election showed quite clearly that the Nationalist Government, though in combination with the Country Party, was defeated by the preference votes of the Country candidate and also those given for an Independent who happened to be a grazier. The primary producers, therefore, actually defeated the Government in which they were represented. But Dr. Earle Page, acting Prime Minister in the absence of Mr. Bruce, and Federal leader of the whole Country organizations, is apparently determined not to see this. He replies to Mr. Hughes by the simple process of misquoting him. He says that if the Government is drifting, it is doing so with the tide, and expects to enter the haven where it would be. It requires little political gumption to realize that not only is this a poor reply, but it is a damnatory one. To declare that one's own Government is drifting, especially with a setting tide, can hardly raise enthusiasm, much less confidence. It is suggested by one writer than Dr. Page really means that his ship is in stays, and is merely waiting for the Captain—the Prime Minister—to come aboard. It may be noted as a possible sign of the early political future that the campaign of press criticism, which did much to defeat Mr. Hughes, appears now to have commenced against the present Government. Charges of gross extravagance have not yet been made, but we have reached the stage when Ministers are blamed for non-attendance at their offices, with touring the country in Commonwealth motor-cars, and even with having actually bought two new cars. Mr. Charlton, leader of the Labour Party, reminds us that the present Government has been in office for 14 months, and of that time it has been in recess for 11. One knows how this piling up of criticisms goes on, and unfortunately for the present Government it has no strong newspaper support. Mr. Hughes never had any, but then he was a whole newspaper in himself.

THE FRUIT HARVEST.

After all the complaints and prophecies of disaster, the fruit harvest is turning out satisfactorily, and the threatened failure of the returned soldier settlers in Victoria has given way to forecasts of their entire success. In Tasmania the great Jones Jam Company is making a feature of the fact that it is dumping nearly 100 tons of apricots, for which it has no use, but nowadays the average citizen places his finger alongside his nose and winks, when these stories are told. He has still more reason for scepticism when he reads on that the Company is paying the fruitgrowers for their unwanted fruit. But then Sir Henry Jones, who has his factories in Australia, South Africa and America, not so many months ago advised the growers to reduce their orchards, and naturally if he desires to be justified, his company must do some dumping on the plea of over-supply. Probably the latest and most interesting feature is the success attending fruit trains, in Victoria and New South Wales. In such a country as this there are thousands of homesteads and townships where fruit is neither grown nor readily obtainable. The plan is to attach a suitable truck to a train, pack it with about 10 tons of fruit in cases and half-cases, and send it in charge of a salesman who will dispose of it for cash at the various stations. Remarkable to relate the system has proved eminently practicable and satisfactory, and so far at least the supply has not been equal to the demand. It sounds a simple and unimportant thing, but it is enabling the growers to get rid of a lot of their fruit, thus stabilizing the city markets which suffer alternately from starvation or repletion. Tasmanian apples this year are suffering from black spot. It is a purely skin disease, and does not apparently affect the fruit itself. The Tasmanians have asked the Customs department for permission to export these to London, and this has been given to send away about 400,000 cases. Tasmania produces about 3,000,000 cases of apples yearly, and exports about two-thirds of this. It is argued that the 400,000 spotted cases might be slipped on to the market without danger of getting Australian apples a bad name. There is great controversy proceeding on this subject, and even the Inter-State Conference of the Farmers' Unions has entered a protest against such permission being granted.

AN EPIDEMIC OF SHOOTING.

Crime of a sensational nature often appears to come in epidemic form. It is only a fortnight ago since I recorded the shooting of five persons—four of whom died—in the Melbourne Botanical Gardens, for no apparent reason. The murderer in this case threw away his rifle and bolted down to the coast in order to stow away on an outward-bound ship. Failing to find a vessel, he made inland into the roughest country amongst the mountains lying close to Melbourne. A settler wandering into a mass of man-high bracken to get some fern noticed a sudden swarm of insects, and thinking them bees, pushed his way to the spot. The man List was lying dead, and in a state of decomposition. The inquest has not yet been held, but it is stated that the police found a safety razor blade in his pocket, and it is thought that he opened an artery and bled himself to death. Two days ago news came through from a sparsely settled part of New South Wales, about 100 miles from the Victorian border, that a picnic party had been fired upon and four persons wounded, one fatally. In this case the man is quite well known, and had that morning borrowed his employer's rifle and cartridges, saying he was going to shoot foxes. The rifle was a service weapon, and the clips of cartridges were carried in a bandolier. He approached the picnic party within about 30 yards and then opened fire. One of the men received no fewer than four shots, and hurried to his house, no great distance away, returning with a rifle. Meanwhile the others hustled the women under cover, and dragged the wounded away. The man hung about for a bit, but bolted when the wounded man with his rifle began to shoot ineffectively. The police and armed settlers are searching for him, and already he has fired additional shots at his pursuers. The country in which he is lurking is very rough, with dense patches of scrub. Two women claim that he held them up as they were driving home, and compelled them to drive him to their own house and supply him with food. He was still carrying his rifle. He seems to have been a quiet, though unintelligent farm worker. Unlike the man List, much learning had not made him mad, but it is possible that the story of the Melbourne shooting turned what little brain he had.

FARES AND FREIGHTS.

At last the combined shipping companies which have practically a monopoly of the Australian coastal trade, being protected by the Navigation Act from foreign competition, have been obliged to reduce their charges along the eastern coast. Their change of policy may be due to one of many things, but probably to a combination of all. The report of the Commission on the operations of the Navigation Act is soon to be prepared; several witnesses have given most damaging evidence against the companies; the Commonwealth Shipping Line is becoming an active competitor along the coast; the Patrick Steamship Company is successfully extending its trade at cut rates; the Queensland State railway is now opened along the eastern coast at far as Townsville and by charging reasonably has compelled the companies to reduce fares and freights in the neighbouring waters; and as a consequence of this last there is a growing demand that all the railways doing Inter-State trade should lower their charges in order to bring the shipping companies to heel. This is a somewhat formidable array of reasons, and as I have said a combination of them all may have had influence. But the point that is worth noting is that the reduction in charges is not due to a reduction in wages, and the high level of the latter has always been the excuse of the combine for its excessive charges.

THE SEARCH FOR OIL.

Within the next few weeks the business of oil refining will have commenced in Australia at a place called Laverton in Victoria, and further refineries in other States will follow in due course. For the moment the oil to be refined will be the crude stuff taken from the Anglo-Persian wells in Mesopotamia. As to the oil-refining business in Australia it is managed by the Anglo-Persian Company and the Commonwealth; the latter have one share more than the former, and consequently the final word in matters of policy. But we are busy seeking all over Australia for oil, and, of course, there are many exploration companies full of enthusiasm and optimism. But of the many there are likely to be but few whose hopes will be realized. In Queensland near Roma, in the Great Western Downs, where artesian water is a commonplace and where several small towns are lit by natural gas coming from below the surface, a combination of gas and petroleum has been struck, at about 2,000 feet. It will be some weeks before the necessary fortification of the shaft will make it possible safely to go on with the work and ascertain whether the supply of oil can be obtained profitably. Yet there is great rejoicing and confidence, and a stimulus is given to other explorers. Dr. F. G. Clapp, a New York oil expert, has just arrived in Australia under engagement with a Western Australian oil company. He is apparently to talk about all Australia. He has already greatly offended those interested in oil in Victoria by writing to the press and stating his opinion that the chances of oil in that State are so trifling that he does not propose to waste time in examination. However, when he does get to work, with his large staff of geologists and others it is expected he will employ, we may find some very useful work done. Boring operations are, I understand, being carried out at Elcho Island, which is in the extreme north-west of the Gulf of Carpentaria, and there are said to be promising signs. However, with a total area of 3,000,000 square miles, of which 602,000 square miles are comprised within what is known as the great Australian basin, whence artesian water is obtainable, and also in places natural gas, it seems impossible to imagine that natural oil will not sooner or later be found. Victoria and Western Australia are outside the basin, but the other mainland States have artesian areas, the biggest being in Queensland with 372,000 square miles, and 1,236 artesian flows yielding over 300,000,000 gallons of water daily. Meanwhile hardly a day passes but the coalminers are told that yet another steamer is bunkering foreign oil and not Australian coal.

THE CASE OF MR. E. S. LITTLE.

It cannot be said that Mr. E. S. Little, for two and a half years Australian Trade Commissioner at Shanghai, has accused the Australian Government of being guilty of repudiation of contract, such as that which is being made a cabled monstrosity by the London moneylenders to Queensland, but the extraordinary treatment of Mr. Little seems bound to yet become a cause célèbre. In the mildest language possible Mr. Little has asked members of the Commonwealth Parliament to see that his case is fully considered. He has sent along a booklet, covering correspondence and the text of his agreement with Australia. As an Australian, one must admit that it is most unpleasant reading. As a member of Parliament remarked to me, "We appear to have either been fools or rogues." There was one Australian daily paper, which seems to have been given the earliest information, and which promptly decided that no-one wanted to hear any more about Mr. Little, but this sort of thing left out the fact that in the name of common justice and the reputation of Australia more must be heard, before the terms of a contract can be broken and some-one butchered to make an Australian holiday. Possibly the most important fact, with which the average member of Parliament is unacquainted, is that of the special report made by the semi-Chinese member of the Senate, the late Senator T. J. K. Bakhap, Australian born, a brilliant scholar and, from 1909 to the day of his death in August last year, a more than ordinarily respected member of Parliament, State or Federal. It was my privilege to meet Senator Bakhap on his return from the special inquiry into the accusations against Mr. Little, and his honest indignation, spoken in the privacy of the Commonwealth Library, has now been fully revealed in the report published by himself in his letters to members. The whole business has been "beastly" from the point of view of the gentleman, which Bakhap undoubtedly was; my own view is that it is even more beastly from the point of view that Australia regards it as gentlemanly. Mr. Chapman, Minister for Trade and Customs, has yet to answer the unspoken challenge of both Mr. Little and those who believe in fair and clean dealing. He may have to plead "peccavi," and admit that he cabled in haste what he repented at leisure, but this is not sufficient. Mr. Little says that he asked for the text of charges; and these were not supplied. It is quite likely, from what I hear, that the matter will be discussed when Parliament reassembles.

REAL FILM DRAMA

Actor Killed by a Lioness

A terribly realistic touch was given recently to a scene from "Quo Vadis" when a lion seized one of the actors and tore him to pieces.

The scene was being staged by the Palatine Film Company, and a number of lions had been released into an arena wherein, on a platform, were grouped 50 actors and actresses dressed in Roman clothing and enacting the part of the Christians.

Suddenly a lioness sprang up on to the platform, and seizing one of the actors with her paws dragged him down to the ground and commenced to maul him. His head was bitten off.

The rest of the people on the platform were terror stricken, and the other lions commenced to spring viciously towards them, trying to tear others down. The keepers rushed to the rescue, but the beasts were so infuriated that a desperate encounter ensued. The lioness which had killed one of the actors was slain.

SCOTTISH LETTER

The Office of Lord Advocate: A Wise Precedent Established

From Our Own Correspondent.

Edinburgh, Feb. 13.

Mr Ramsay MacDonald has taken a wise course in making the office of Lord Advocate for Scotland a non-political one. He cannot be given the whole credit for the course taken; he was not at first inclined to make the precedent; it was in some respects forced upon him. But his action has a good deal of courage behind it, and it has received unstinted praise from the Conservative, Liberal, and Radical press of Scotland. The only objectors are found in the weekly organs of the extreme Reds. The new Lord Advocate is Mr. H. P. Macmillan, K.C., a Unionist, at one time a candidate for East Lothian and from the correspondence published, the Prime Minister proposed to Mr. Macmillan the acceptance of the post "on a basis entirely non-political." On this understanding Mr. Macmillan undertakes "to discharge the duties and enjoy the rights of the office without participation in politics and, of course, without a seat in the House." As I have said, this action required courage on the part of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. It must be borne in mind that during the past fortnight he has been subjected to a raucous clamour by extremist members of his party in Scotland urging him, almost with threats, to a very different course. These so-called idealists from the Clyde have been preaching the crudest doctrine of party spoils and jobs. Nothing would satisfy them but that the Law Officerships should be bestowed upon members of their own party. Their vapourings have been characteristic of men who find their precedents at Moscow, where Lenin appointed to the highest legal office men innocent of legal knowledge and of education of any sort.

This appointment sets up a new precedent which may be well worth the consideration of future Governments. If it is not, after all, necessary that a Lord Advocate should be an active supporter of the Government in power, is it desirable to resume the old practice of making the appointment a political one? Would it not be worth while to examine the whole business of making political or semi-political appointments to non-political positions? And in England as well as in Scotland would it not be better to have a good lawyer instead of an active politician in such an office?

HOW THE OLD SYSTEM WORKED.

For at least a century and a half the Scottish Law Officers have been drawn from the most prominent partisans of the party in office to be found at the Scottish Bar. Throughout the greater part of the time this was made inevitable by the nature of the offices themselves, for they were not less political than legal. Till 30 years ago the Lord-Advocate was virtually the head of the Administration in Scotland, and strong men in the office were the virtual rulers of Scotland. The inevitableness ceased, however, when the office of Secretary for Scotland was created and the distinctively political duties of administration passed to it. A great objection to the practice is that with hardly an exception the Law Officers become the Judges of the High Court. In fact, if not in theory and form, they hold the right of nomination to the Bench, and nominate themselves. Rarely troubled with modesty, a grace which does not flourish much in the ranks of politics, they have hardly ever failed to nominate themselves to the highest posts—those of Lord Justice-General and Lord Justice-Clerk—when those offices fell vacant during their term, as well as to the Scottish vacancies in the House of Lords. Thus our Judges have been selected in the first instance not because they were the greatest authorities on law, but because they had approved themselves to one or other of the political parties as good party men.

MR. H. P. MACMILLAN.

The new Lord Advocate, Mr. H. P. Macmillan, K.C., has held an outstanding position at the Scottish Bar, and also at Westminster. He, like many other successful Scottish lawyers, is a son of the manse, and has fought his way without any outside backing and purely by merit. It is an open secret that it is largely to the indefatigable energy which he has brought to bear on the matter that the country is indebted for the successful issue of the scheme for the conversion of the Advocates' Library into a National Library for Scotland.

HOME RULE FOR SCOTLAND

It is understood that Scottish Socialist members of the House of Commons propose to demand from the Government a measure to secure self-government upon Scotland. Scottish Home Rule is an item in the Socialists' programme, which is proved by the fact that when the members of the party balloted for precedence to introduce bills this session Mr. Buchanan, the member for Gorbals, who secured a favourable place, was instructed by the officials of the party to take up the "Government of Scotland Bill." The Government is committed on the question, and the Scottish group, while willing to take the chance of making progress with the bill now before the House, evidently wish to make assurance doubly sure by inviting the Government to table a bill of its own at once. The state of Parliamentary business might justifably be pleaded by the Prime Minister as a reason for his inability to accede to this demand, and in any case a bill of such importance would occupy more time than the Government is likely to be able to spare. The Scottish group last year asked the Unionist Government to set up a Convention on the Irish model to examine the question and frame a Home Rule scheme. The Government declined to do so, but the new Government in the circumstances might be prepared to throw this crumb to their Scottish supporters. That would probably be the full extent of the Government's sympathy with the project this session.

CONCERNING MR. ADAMSON.

Patriotic pride is expressed by the organ of St. Columba's, the well known Scots Church in Pont Street, London, that the two highest secular offices in the State—those of Prime Minister and Lord Chancellor—are again held by Scotsmen. The magazine also congratulates Scotland on the appointment of Mr. Adamson as the successor to the popular and trusted Viscount Novar in the Scottish Secretaryship. "Mr. Adamson is held in merited respect by all, independently of party opinion," adds the magazine, "and it was an indication of the spirit of Scottish union which lies deeper than all sectional differences that on the same Sunday both the old and new Scottish Secretaries worshipped at St. Columba's—a church on whose walls is a memorial to one of the greatest Secretaries for Scotland, the late Lord Balfour of Burleigh." For Lord Burleigh, in spite of all political cleavages, Mr. Adamson cherished through long years a deep respect which was reciprocated.

A FAMOUS GOLF CLUB.

This is the ter-jubilee year of the Royal Musselburgh Golf Club. That is to say, there is definite evidence that the club has been in existence for 150 years, though it is reputed to have been formed 14 years earlier. At any rate, the club possesses "The Silver Cup" among many trophies of all sorts—dating from 1774. The Silver Cup is one of the oldest golf trophies in existence, for the Royal Musselburgh stands sixth in order of seniority among the tens of thousands of golf clubs now to be found all over the world. Hung about the cover of the cup and round its sides are a wealth of gold and silver medals, many engraved with armorial bearings, placed there by the men who have won it, with given dates and scores.

NEW MINISTER AND PERMANENT OFFICIALS.

A Scot who occupies an important post in the Civil Service makes some interesting revelations about the new Cabinet Ministers and their staffs. He says: The last thing which I expected was that Mr. Snowden, the apostle of the Capital Levy, would find favour with Treasury officials. Yet he has. Of course, there is no question of a Capital Levy with the present House of Commons. It is on general lines of existing policy that the Treasury potentates pore—and Mr. Snowden as if they were his long lost cats. It is astonishing. There is only one serious complaint against the new Ministers. They are much too formal and polite. They will address their private secretaries as "Mr." This is one of those things not done in the Service. They knock upon doors, too, before entering the offices of their subordinates. This is not done either. The tradition of the Service is that of the English Universities, where men who know one another never use prefixes to names and never knock on one another's doors. The situation is difficult. It needs tact to tell a Minister—when he knocks upon one's door, waits for word of admission, and then says, "Please, Mr. Brown, will you do me the favour to lunch with me to-day?" it needs tact, I say, to tell him that he ought to open the door abruptly and call out, "Brown, come to lunch." Another complaint—a small one, because the Civil Service works very hard indeed—is that Ministers will stay in their offices until the hour is too late for a comfortable dinner. The dodge to get over this bad habit is to fill up a Minister with "papers" at about 7.30 and then go to dinner at one's club. He is much too polite to ask next morning why one did not remain in attendance. On the whole, after full consideration, I begin to wonder whether they are not teaching us quite a lot of things which are good for us to learn.

THE NEW STYLE OF CHURCH MAGAZINE.

The Church press has of late years taken a new and more "popular" tone. To take an example: among various sprightly contributions in the bright little magazine of Pollokshields Congregational Church in Glasgow is a parody on the Ten Little Nigger Boys. It deals with ten broken resolutions, some of which are—

Ninth resolution—will not stay up late;
"New York calling"—1 a.m.—
then there were eight.

Eight resolutions pave the way to heaven;
Lost a train and mutter
. . . . . ."—then there were seven.

Six resolutions, very much alive!
Got a gift of "P. D. Scotch"— then there were five.

Two resolutions still to have a run;
Dinner late and groused like ——; then there was one.

Readers who have broken any or all of the resolutions are consoled with the final reflexion:—
'Tis better to resolve and quite than not resolve at all.

SIR JOHN M. MACLEOD, BT.

Sir John M. Macleod, whose name appears on the Resignation Honours List, is among those prominent in the public life of Glasgow who are popular, not so much because of what they have done, but because they have that enviable gift of the gods, "an attractive personality." Possibly "J. M." inherits his from his genial father, the late Dr. Norman Macleod, of the Barony, but wherever it came from he has it. It is seen at its brightest and best in the post prandial hour, when in grace of phrase and happy humour it finds outlet, say, in a speech. But many friends like the evidence of his sense of fun that he gives in his sermon parody on "Little Jack Horner." He can hit off the heavy clerical manner in great style.

A £1,000 BANK NOTES.

Sir John H. Stewart of Fingask, who was found shot dead in his house in Perthshire, was known as "the best dressed man in Dundee." In London he was reputed to be a millionaire, and on one occasion had to borrow money to pay for a dinner at a restaurant because the proprietor could not change a thousand pound bank note for him.

FAMOUS CLYDE STEAMER.

In the Japanese paddle steamer Tenri Maru, which has just changed hands, few will recognise one of the well-known Clyde packets of some five-and-twenty years ago. She was originally the Windsor Castle, was built at Southampton to run a pleasure service from Bournemouth, and when she came out with her tonnage of nearly 800 and a speed of 18 knots she was considered a wonderful ship. Five years later she was bought by the Glasgow, Ayrshire, and Campbeltown Company, and placed on the run that their name suggests, proving herself remarkably popular by her size and comfort, even in those days of keen competition, with the one disadvantage that she was frequently breaking down. After a short time on the service she was renamed Culzean Castle, and in 1899 was rechristened Carrick Castle, when she was transferred to excursion work on the upper part of the Firth. Within a few months, however, she was sold to the Russian-Chinese Eastern Railway, who took her out to Port Arthur. When they evacuated Dalny they blew her up in order to prevent the Japanese making use of her as a despatch vessel, but some years after the victors repaired her, and have been using her ever since on the various local passenger services by which communication between the Japanese islands is maintained.

MAH-JONGG.

(This game, at present so popular, was originally played in China 2000 years ago.)

In the cool dimness girt with shimmering glow,
In dignity inscrutable they sit,
Two thousand years ago.
The buttons of their office faintly gleam,
Glow-worms of sapphire, opal, ruby, gold;
And vestments rich of flowing silken sheen
Their stately forms enfold.
Around them bamboos quiver slenderly,
The rose-tree scatters all her largesse down;
The breeze wafts faint sweet treasures to the sense;
Near by stone dragons frown.
But all in vain! With earnest eyes downbent
They gaze on Nature's lifeless counterfeit,
Pictures inscribed upon a row of tiles,
Mere scrolls upon a sheet!
Grave Mandarins! What charm is in these signs,
To bind their fancy thus with magic thong?
"In loco dulce est desipere."
They only play Mah-Jongg!

JUDGES AND COUNSEL

Rule as to Sons Practising Before Their Fathers

In the Bar Council's statement published in the "Morning Post" with regard to counsel appearing in cases before Judges who are their fathers or near relatives, it was declared that the Council adhered to their decision of 1895-6 concerning the practice in County Courts. That report stated:

In August, 1895, a complaint was made to the council with reference to the son of a County Court Judge practising before his father, and the Council have, therefore, considered the question of members of the Bar practising before their fathers in local Courts. The Council find that there have been several cases in which members of the Bar, being sons of County Court Judges, have for a time practised habitually in their fathers' Courts, but in most of the cases the gentlemen in question, in deference to propractise.

The Bar Committee in 1891 passed a resolution discouraging the practice, in consequence of which a barrister requested the advice of Sir Richard Webster, the Attorney-General, as to his practising in his father's Courts, and in deference to the Attorney-General's advice the barrister discontinued such practice.

The Council entirely agree with the course thus taken. They are of opinion that, whilst it is unobjectionable for a barrister in the ordinary course of a general practice to accept a brief in a Court of which his father or other near relative is a Judge, it is not right for such a barrister specially to devote himself to practice in that Court. It is almost inevitable that partially he will be suspected, although there may be no real ground for such suspicion. The practice might even lead to briefs being delivered to the barrister, because it was believed that his client would have an unfair advantage over his opponent.

A RECOGNIZED RESTRAINT.

The Council are of opinion that in future it should be recognized as a Rule of the Profession that no barrister should habitually practise in any County Court of which his father or any near relative is the Judge.

The Council cited an analogous case some years ago in the Chancery Courts, in which a Q.C., having at first selected as the Court in which he would practise the Court of which his father-in-law was Judge, afterwards changed his Court in deference to the opinion of the Bar. As regards Quarter Sessions and other local courts of criminal jurisdiction the objection to sons practising before their fathers or other near relations is not so serious.

CONDEMNED NURSE

New Statements to be Laid Before Home Secretary

In the Court of Criminal Appeal recently the Lord Chief Justice and Justices Shearman and Acton dismissed an application on behalf of Dora Martha Sparling Sadler for leave to appeal against her conviction for murder. At the Central Criminal Court on January 16 Sadler was sentenced to death for the murder of the two young children of Mr. and Mrs. Katzmann. The applicant also asked for leave to call further evidence. She appeared in the dock accompanied by a wardress.

Mr. Claude Grundy, for the appellant, said the only defence at the trial was that of insanity—that Sadler was labouring from such a defect of mind that she did not know that what she was doing was wrong. It was upon that issue that the present appeal was raised. The only evidence available at the trial with regard to insanity was that of Dr. Parsons and a sister of the accused woman. The latter witness said that some years ago the appellant tried to commit suicide, but there was no history of insanity in the family.

Since the trial the appellant's advisers had received a letter from a man named Halpin, who said that Sadler's mother was his sister, and that there was no doubt that there was insanity in the family. The writer gave several instances. Counsel suggested that if this evidence had been available it would materially have affected the minds of the jury, and he asked their Lordships to exercise the powers they possessed to substitute a special verdict for that of the jury on the fresh evidence.

The Lord Chief Justice said the Home Secretary had power to order an examination of the accused, and that power was not in any way interfered with by that Court. The functions of that Court were quite different from the functions of the Home Secretary, and it did not in the least follow that because that Court found itself unable to reverse the verdict of the jury the Home Secretary would not be able to take a certain course. Nothing prevented Sadler's advisers from putting the material at their disposal fully before the Home Secretary.

Counsel said that in his submission the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence. The proper verdict would have been "Guilty, but insane."

Without calling on counsel for the Crown, the Court dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said the proper and convenient course was for matters of this kind to be brought to the attention of the Home Office and their decision was upon a totally different plane from the decision which that Court, concerned only with the legal aspect of the matter, was bound to take. So far as that tribunal was concerned it was not possible to do otherwise than dismiss the appeal.

A SHORT CREED

Notes of a Sermon preached by the Rev. C. E. Darwent in Union Church, Tientsin, on Sunday Morning, February 17

Text: St. John, VI 28 and 29: "They say, therefore, unto him, What must we do that we may work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent."

Dr. Van Dyke is an eminent American. He is an excellent preacher as well as the writer of a number of charming books that have had a large sale. He is a man of many parts; a student of bird lore, and, I believe, a writer on birds; he is also a fisherman; he has also served his country in its diplomatic service. Altogether he has had a good time of it, and is a man, who knows human nature, which piece of knowledge is almost as important for a minister as knowledge of the divine nature. Our Lord "knew what was in man."

Dr. Van Dyke has been much troubled at what is called "the prevailing unbelief," as to what the Gospel is, and the unsettlement of faith, and the everlastingly discussed "state of the churches." I do not believe things are half as bad as people say they are. Christian people are easily scared and unbelievers are too apt to crow over the spread of unbelief, when they have no reason to do so. The church ought to have been extinct years ago if half the things they say are true. They only wish they were. Various reasons are given for what is called the "decay of religion," as if it was a cheese, or one of those old timbers that they have taken out of our Bund foreshore. One reason is that ministers cannot preach, and that if they do, they are dry or behind the times. Some may be, but so are some business men. If not, why did the Prince of Wales once get applauded for telling the British business world to wake up? Yet not one proposed to give up all business because some business men are behind the time. Some say it is because the people in the churches are cold. I don't know; but are we expected to fall on the necks of the odd droppers in? Then there is the music, the tunes, the times of service. Everything would be right if all these things were altered.

However, it appears, that the really dreadful handicap in the way of the success of the churches is that all churches have spoiled the Gospel by their creeds. They are the monsters that scare away all the really religious and pious people from the house of God, and compel them reluctantly to spend Sunday morning on the golf course. They are really sorry to have to shoulder their clubs, or make a coolie shoulder them. They would love to sit in church, or help the choir, if it were not for those awful creeds. When the late Lord Sherbrooke was the famous Robert Lowe, as Gladstone's Chancellor of the Exchequer he brought in a match tax. The prospect of this so got on the nerves of one of those men who use up their matches quicker than they smoke their tobacco, that he committed suicide and left a note explaining how he came to do it, "This is all along o' Bob Lo." And so it appears that all the neglect of religion and of church attendance is "all along o' creeds." Get rid of them; better still, do not have any at all; above all, no dogmas; then the happy day will dawn and rise quickly to noontide splendour, when the pews will all be full, and enlargement of churches will make the contractors busy.

DEFINITION OF "CREED."

It seems a bit queer, does all this, though we are assured that it is the case. Creeds have such a shocking bad name that one hardly likes to ask what the word means. If, however, we do summon up courage to inquire as to the monster's meaning, we find that there is quite a sensible sort of idea in it. It means, "a set of opinions on any subject." That is the Oxford Dictionary's account of it. It is something we believe. Unless we belong to the thoroughgoing philosophic sceptics, who doubt everything, even their own foolish selves and their own existence, there doesn't seem anything very terrible about it We all have creeds. There are the fresh-air people, who will sleep on verandahs; there are the men who bathe in the Serpentine all the winter and are cold water believers. They have the creeds of fresh air and cold water. There is the Shanghai Municipal Council. I used to read its health creed every summer. It was quite a long and very intimate document: "Don't wear a cholera-belt. Never eat uncooked vegetables. See that your spouts have no standing water in them." I should think that this modern hygiene has a whole lot of dogmas in it. You have a lot of things in the health creed. Human nature is weak. It does not always dip its strawberries in boiling syrup" as, I think, the Health creed orders, but it admits that this article of the creed is good. There is physical science. At the present day we actually boast, that no preceding age has had so many truths in its scientific creed as has ours. There is gravity, the conservation of energy, the undulatory theory of light, the electric nature of matter. I don't find that storms of objections are raised against these articles of the creed of science. We believe them, and are proud to have them to believe. If we have scientific minds we live on them. There are also moral creeds. If Smith owes you money and will not pay, your creed is that an honest man ought to pay. There are fixed moral canons as well as fived physical facts. Why then should there be so much pother about the creeds of the Christian Church? Of course, it has a creed and requires all its members to believe it. What would have been the sense in the Apostles setting out to tell the world what they had nothing to tell it. Absurd! The fact is that they were simply bursting with the wealth of glorious truths that God had revealed to them in Jesus Christ. If there is one thing that is certain, it is that it was the Christian creed that "turned the world upside down," and as the late Mr. Grant Duff finely said, "with its face towards God," whom it saw "in the face of Jesus Christ." The Apostles were absolutely certain of their ground; men eagerly accepted the truth they taught and so we have B. C. and A. D. to mark our chronology. That creeds are a reasonable and necessary and natural element in the religious life of man is further shown by the plain fact that the churches which have the most definite Christian creed are the most successful, while the one which has whittled its beliefs down to nothing or next to nothing has not a missionary to its name, for the obvious reason that it has no divine Saviour to preach. It is a foolish and vain idea, if any hold it, that the church is going to win the world by being an "Old Mother Hubbard" with a cupboard that hasn't a single bone in it for the poor hungry sinner.

DR. VAN DYKE'S STATEMENT OF THE GOSPEL.

This being incontestable, the thing is to find out what is the Gospel stated in the shortest possible creed. Now here comes in Dr. Van Dyke again. He has been pondering deeply this matter of the creeds of Christendom. And he has been much disturbed by the accusation that our creeds are too long, and also too complicated. This is an age that will have short, "snappy," statements; short paragraphs rather than long leaders in the papers. And so, in deference to "the spirit of the age," that wonderful thing that we hear so much about, Dr. Van Dyke has produced a model statement of the Gospel in what he considers the shortest of possible creeds. Here it is, "The vital Christian creed is short: (1) That God created man of dust and spirit, with a free will, and that man has acquired a tendency to sin; (2) That God loves man in spite of all, and has sent his divine Son, Jesus Christ, to live with us, die for us, and save everyone who is willing; (3) That the Holy Spirit moves through the whole world, making love to all sorts and conditions of men, and wooing them to turn from darkness to light (4) That the experience of this is recorded in the Bible in such a way as to make that book (rightly understood only through the Spirit) the Word of God to our souls."

Now, what are we to say about that as a statement of the Gospel? I might say that it is not much shorter than some of the creeds. Is it any improvement on the Apostles Creed as a statement of the Gospel? Then it fairly bristles with moot points. That one about the Holy Spirit moving about the world is not exactly easy to understand. I wonder what the five thousand who were converted on the Day of Pentecost would have made of it, or the Ethiopian eunuch! They would have been a bit puzzled. Then there is No. 4, that one about the Bible, with its saving clause, would have been rather a tough morsel for the Philippian gaolor, when the earthquake made him rush in wanting to know what he was to do to be saved.

"GOSPEL AND TRUTH."

Then there are surely, statements in it that are not Gospel at all. There is the fact mentioned that we "have acquired a tendency to sin." How can that be called "Gospel" What is the meaning of Gospel? It is "Good news." But we can hardly call a statement that we have "a tendency to sin," Good News. It is surely bad news, very bad news indeed. To tell a man that his failing is lying is hardly breaking good news to him. It may be true, but on that account he may resent it very forcibly. The Bible is most emphatic about our tendency to sin. Even "the imagination of man's heart is evil continually;" We have all sinned. One has only to read any copy of a daily paper to know that that is a fact. Murders, thefts, lies, hatreds, jealousies abound everywhere. It is true enough and sad enough that we still have this "tendency to sin" in spite of law and Gospel. But it is hardly "good news." Therefore we see that a statement may be true but by no means "Gospel," that is, "Good News." There are other doctrines often included in definitions of the Gospel that may be true enough, but are not Gospel. Such a one is the doctrine of the severe punishment of sinners in the next world.

The upshot of all this is that even Dr. Van Dyke's account of the Gospel is too long. It seems to me that we have all got wrong in this; in not making a clear distinction between the Gospel and theology, or general religious truth. There are a great many religious truths of the utmost importance, but they are not the Gospel. That God is almighty and holy, that man is sinful, that there is a Holy Spirit are true enough. But there is a great advantage in having one word for one thing. It makes for clearness of mind, and if we adopted one word for one thing, as the New Testament mostly does, the mind of the public would be less muddled than it is.

GOD THE GREAT REPAIRER.

Now Gospel means one glorious thing, and that is in the text: "Jesus answered and said to them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." That is Christianity; that is the Gospel. A great many other precious truths go to make religion, but it is just as well to keep them clear of the word Gospel. The Gospel is that God is our Redeemer through "Him whom he hath sent," Jesus Christ the Son of God. It is true enough that God is the ruler of the universe, that He is holy, that we shall all be brought "before the judgment seat of Christ," that we are to serve Christ and our fellow men. These are truths; they have to be taught, but they are not the Gospel. The Gospel always has the urgent note of saving in it; that God is the great repairer, repairer of all the wastes of human nature and society. All the words beginning with re give the spirit of the Gospel; redemption, regeneration, renewing. That is the "Good News" for a world like this. God has given His Son to be a mighty loving energy to heal all the wounds of man, to repair the broken places in his moral life, to reconcile all things and men to God. It is no Gospel, though true, that men are sinners; but this is Gospel, "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." It is no Gospel, though true, that Judas "went to his own place," but this is Gospel, "Good News" indeed, that a poor wretch of a thief on a cross, with all his wicked life ebbing out of his veins, had only to cry to be remembered by Jesus, who hung there by him, and he heard the most wonderful words ever uttered, "This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." That is Good News. You cannot find that our Lord says much by way of "rubbing it in," that we are sinners. He is always on the key of repairing, bringing us back, forgiving us. That is the Gospel. Other doctrines may be true enough, but the first, the main, the all-inclusive thing in Christianity is that God in Christ is reconciling the world to Himself, is ridding it of all the evils that fill the world with misery. The angels gave the keynote of the Gospel to the shepherds, "For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." There are teachers of all kinds of very deep and necessary truths in the world, but there is no one else who can claim this title, Saviour. That is the Gospel, that He "will have all men to be saved; having obtained eternal redemption for us." That is why it is "the work of God, to believe on Him, whom He hath sent."

This is why Christians are incurably optimistic, because that in Jesus Christ God has the world in hand, not to judge us, nor to criticize, nor condemn us, but to save us. That is the short Christian creed, that includes everything else. And that is the only thing worth preaching. We ministers are not discoursers on truth in general, however true and spiritual: our business is to call attention to one side of God's nature: that He is yearning to redeem the world, and repair the world, and in this stupendous effort of eternal love He has given His Son to carry out His gracious purpose.

UNMORAL TALES FOR WORTHLESS INFANTS

By C. F. Green.

I.—On Being Careful of One's Appearance

Janie had a new frock. She knew she looked very nice in it. Mabel had a new frock also, but Mabel never thought how she looked. One day Mamma said: "You are to go to tea this afternoon with kind Mr. and Mrs. Smart. I shall be out when you go, so tell Nurse to have you ready at four o'clock and to take you to their house, and don't wear your best frocks as you are to play in the garden."

When the time came to get ready, Janie told Nurse to put on her new frock. But good little Mabel told Nurse to put on her third best frock. Janie looked sweet in her white net with blue ribbons. Mabel looked rather dull in a brown serge frock smocked with green.

They had a very nice tea at Mr. and Mrs. Smart's, then they had strawberries and cream—but alas, Mabel clumsily upset the cream jug, and all the cream spilt on to the children's frocks.

"Oh dear, my new frock!" sobbed Janie.

Mabel said: "You should not have put it on."

But kind Mrs. Smart quickly slipped off the frock, washed it clean and it was ironed and on again, all nice and fresh, before you could say "Jack Robinson." But Mabel's frock was spoilt, and it was her school one—the cream never came out.

"What a pity you did not put on a nice net frock like Janie's," said Mrs. Smart, "then it would not have mattered. Now you've spoilt that frock."

And Mamma was very angry with Mabel.

II.—On Looking After No. 1

In a hole in a bank lived Mr. and Mrs. Rabbit and four little rabbits, whose names were Hubert, Rosalind, Rupert and Buzz. Near their home was an orchard, and in the orchard grew apple trees.

"May we have stewed apples for dinner?" they asked their mother.

"Yes dears, run and pick some," she answered. So they picked quite a lot, and Mrs. Rabbit cooked them for dinner.

Now Mrs. Rabbit had always told the little ones to be careful not to waste food, and never to take too much sugar or butter. When the stewed apples came in, Mummy gave them all a little sugar and then they started to eat them, but Rupert tasted his and said: "Ginger! These are sour. I want some more sugar."

"No, dear," said his Mother, "I put enough sugar on."

"You did not," rudely replied Rupert, and he picked up the bowl and put a lot of sugar on his apples and gobbled them up.

"I am ashamed of you, you wasteful child," said his father.

After dinner the four little rabbits went out to play, but very soon Hubert said: "I've a pain. I'm going home to bed."

Then Buzz said: "I've a pain. I'm going home to bed."

Then Rosalind said: "I've a pain. I'm going home to bed."

At tea time Rupert ran home, and there he found that Daddie and Mummie were in bed also. "It was those sour apples," he told them, but they only groaned. And Rupert did not have a pain. And he did not have to take nasty medicine. And he did not have to stay in bed.

III.—On the Disadvantages of Being Unselfish

Once upon a time there were three little mice called Bobbie, Pimple, and Squeak, and they lived in a mud hut with their Mummie. Bobbie had a hobby horse, but he was very unkind, he would not let Pimple or Squeak ride on it. So Mummie went out for a walk, and when she came back she had a little hazel switch in her hand. "Guess, Bobbie, what this is for," she said.

"To make my hobby horse go faster," Bobbie answered.

"No," said Mummie, "it is for a naughty, unkind little mouse."

Just then Pimple came in, "May I ride on your hobby horse?" he asked Bobbie.

"Yes, you may," said Bobbie, "just once round the table." So Pimple got on, and started round the table. As he got to the door Squeak came running in and they bumped against each other and fell down. They hurt themselves and cried. Mummie Mouse picked up the switch, but before she could smack any of them, "Yah!" cried Bobbie, jumping up and down with joy. "That comes of being selfish and taking my hobby horse."

SOOCHOW

If I were wise with a grown-up's eyes
And saw what my eyes see now,
I'd live in a town where the stone walls frown
And be just a lad in Soochow.

In the gutter canal with my one true pal
I'd sail in a paper junk,
And the food I'd eat would be queer but a treat,
And I'd worship with rockets and punk.

On the streets all day in the mud I'd play
And build me a tower tall—
A pagoda high, that would reach to the sky
With my wishes both great and small.

I'd hark to the spell of the ricsha's bell
That tinkles an endless song,
And I'd love old Soo as to manhood I grew
And mixed in the busy throng.

Till with labour and pain, 'mid blue skies and rain,
I'd come to old age and its joy.
If I had my way in the mud I'd play,
And be just a Soochow boy.

THE LATE SIR JAMES DEWAR

An Appreciation of His Scientific Work

It was appropriate that the first evening discourse of the Royal Institution session, which the late Sir James Dewar had for so many years opened as Fullerian Professor of Chemistry (1877 to 1923), should have been devoted to an in memoriam lecture on "The Scientific Work of Professor Sir James Dewar." The task was entrusted, not to his successor in that chair, Sir William Bragg, but to Professor Henry F. Armstrong, F.R.S.

Professor Armstrong did not limit himself to the scientific work, and he did not consider that an in memoriam lecturer should discard criticism. He spoke of the moral grandeur of the man, who was only known probably, and incompletely, to one person, his wife, and who, ever chivalrous to women, could be irascible—"a sign of inward force"—and had been called cantankerous. Weakened by illness in his 10th year. Professor Armstrong said, Dewar took up joinery and made fiddles. At Edinburgh University he found sympathetic teachers in Lindsay, Forbes, Playfair and John Brown; the dour respectability of Cambridge, where experimental skill was not appreciated, disappointed him, but he completed his education by meeting his collaborator in spectroscopic work there, Professor Livein—now 97 years old and still hale.

At the Royal Institution Dewar found himself free from red-tape obligations and control, in a Bohemian atmosphere—Faraday was a Bohemian to Professor Armstrong—full of the ghosts of scientific heroes and with an appreciative audience. The object of Dewar's "hyper-arctic explorations," so full of danger often, which made the Royal Institution the focus-point of scientific advance, was not only to liquefy gases. He was not the mere artificer, but the philosopher seeking to penetrate into the far-distant region of the absolute zero of temperature.

THE VACUUM FLASK.

In the course of those researches, he discovered the vacuum flask in 1893; made in 1905 the still more important discovery of the high absorptive power of charcoal; showed that, at the temperature of liquid hydrogen, the curve of the atomic heats of the elements differed entirely from that at ordinary temperature and became strikingly similar to that of Lothar Meyer's atomic volume curve; devised extraordinarily delicate means of studying heat radiation at very low temperature; and showed by his soap-film studies how well beauty and science harmonize. Dr. Armstrong stated that he did not regard charcoal and graphite as pure carbon; they were probably hydrogen compounds, and if the X-ray analyses of Bragg and others indicated that the fourth carbon atom of the graphite crystal was farther away from the centre than the three others, that fourth corner was probably occupied by a hydrogen compound.

We mention a few of Sir James's experiments which Dr. Armstrong repeated to exemplify their ingenuity, simplicity and directness. An electric discharge tube was combined with a Crookes radiometer and a charcoal tube; as the gas in the tube was absorbed by the charcoal, the discharge ceased, but the unabsorbed helium still kept the radiometer spinning. When two flasks, the one containing bromine vapour, the other chlorine gas, were cooled by pouring liquid air on them, the vapour solidified much more quickly than the gas. A vertical jet of air, sucked through a cylinder enclosing the metal electrodes of an electro arc into the vacuum of a high cylinder of glass, became visible as a thin beam of faint light. Various solids, horn, a stearin candle, etc., became fluorescent after having been dipped into liquid air and then exposed to the lantern beam; but of two test tubes, the one containing distilled water, the other tap water, only the former fluoresced; the water froze, of course. Professor Armstrong had found that this was in accordance with an observation of Faraday's of 1843, that water free of electrolytes could not be electrified.—"Engineering."

ART OF THE EAST

Need for Representation in National Gallery

Presiding at a meeting of the India Society Sir Charles Holmes, the Director of the National Gallery, said that, speaking quite unofficially, he was eager to see the great paintings of India and Persia, of China and Japan, represented in our National Gallery, by the side of the great paintings of Europe. In saying that he must not be thought, for one instant, to disparage or to be competing with what has been done for Oriental art by the British Museum and the Victoria and Albert Museum. That was beyond all praise. But there was a function which those Museums could not perform.

Only by exhibiting the great painters of the East in juxtaposition with the great painters of Europe could we properly estimate, proclaim, and emhasize the place of the East in the vital artistic achievement of the world. Our knowledge of art was not complete until we could include the paintings of India and Persia, of China and Japan, in the same comprehensive vision with which we surveyed the arts of Northern and Southern Europe. If the India Society could strengthen these bonds they would not only be doing good work in educating the public to a proper appreciation of the interest and the value of Oriental art, but they would be pioneers in a larger advance which was bound one day to be triumphant.

TO DARKNESS

Hail, thou most sacred, venerable thing
What muse is worthy thee to sing—
Thee, from whose pregnant, universal womb
All things, even Light, thy rival, first did come?
What dare she not attempt that sings of thee,
Thou first and greatest mystery?
Who can the secrets of thy essence tell?
Thou, like the light of God, are inaccessible.

Before great Love this monument did raise,
This ample theatre of praise;
Before the folding circles of the sky
Were tuned by Him who is all harmony;
Before the morning stars their hymn began,
Before the council held for man,
Before the birth of either time or place,
Thou reign'st unquestioned monarch in the empty space.

Thy native lot thou didst to Light resign,
But still half of the globe is thine.
Here, with a quiet but yet awful hand,
Like the best emperors thou dost command.
To thee the stars above their brightness owe,
And mortals their repose below;
To thy protection fear and sorrow flee,
And those that weary are of Light find rest in thee.

Though Light and glory be thy Almighty's throne,
Darkness is His pavilion:
From that His radiant beauty, but from thee
He has His terror and His majesty:
Thus, when He first proclaimed His sacred law,
And would His rebel subjects awe,
Like princes on some great solemnity,
He appeared in His robes of state, and clad Himself with thee.

"NOTHING FAILS LIKE SUCCESS"

Dean Inge on Revolutions

"The French Revolution caused as much alarm in Europe as the first outbreak of cholera," said Dean Inge in a lecture on "Revolutions" at the Royalty Theatre recently. It was a new disease, and nobody knew how far it would spread. Now we looked upon it as an epidemic malady, with periodical acute epidemic outbreaks. Historians would try to explain revolution by expiating on the misery of the people who made them, but historians had a power, not claimed even by the Deity, of altering the past. The legend of the misery of the French peasantry was probably too deeply rooted to be disturbed, but, in fact, France was the richest country in Europe, and prosperity was widely distributed. Russia was happy and prosperous in the years after the war with Japan. The country was getting richer, and the peasants were more comfortable than ever before. Ireland—rich through the war—had no grievances. Other excuses might be found, but they were justified in saying that social misery was not the cause of revolution. It had always happened hitherto that civilization had been upheld by a small part of a nation—those who, by virtue of some qualities that led to social success, had more wealth and more education that the majority. And it had always happened that ruling classes ended by ruling themselves out. Nothing failed like success. Nearly all the "Red" leaders in Russia, said Dean Inge, diagnosed by some medical professors who escaped, were of unsound mind, most of them alcoholics and diseased, and many addicted to drugs. Russia would soon become a State of peasantry governed by a military tyranny which would call itself something else.

EXIT

The day goes faltering toward the tumbled west,
Ragged and old and muttering, in his thought,
Of grievous wrongs, and crippled and oppressed,
He wears the ruin that the storm has wrought.
The prowling wind will never let him be,
The blinking stars lean out to stare at him;
The old man is too bitter-blind to see:
His wits are wandering and his eyes are dim.

The hills have opened for his going out,
Where gaunt trees mock him with grotesque goodbys,
In a great wind that gathers to a shout
And sends him tottering down the angry skies—
Gone, with his mumbling and his tattered pack,
And none cares whither. . . . . He will not come back.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

REMINISCENCES

By Peter Pan

This story begins some months ago, when a young aspirant to racing honours complained that the young idea never got a chance to ride a decent mount. He said that it was impossible to make good jockeys unless they had an opportunity of riding ponies of quality and that such chances were very few. He and a lot of others, similarly situated, were compelled to ride third-rate cattle and the sort of animal which their own slender purse allowed them to buy, and all that and so forth.

Let Peter, who never grows up, tell your friend, that such has ever been the experience of amateur jockeys in Shanghai and that it is difficult to see how it could be otherwise. A racing man owns a likely animal or perhaps a first-class race pony. The idea of the sport is of course for men to have fun, but not at the expense of the animal. The pony ought to have the best chance to show what he can do, and it would not be fair to him to put an inexperienced rider on his back. It has been done, of course, but it is doubtful whether good sport results from such a course, unless it so happens that the novice reveals himself as an artist in the saddle.

These reflexions lead Peter to an incident that happened about 20 years ago, but it is not the story he set out to tell. That may come afterwards if there is space enough and anybody to listen.

THE DUN AND THE UNDONE.

Peter, who was always a child—in fact a sort of enfant terrible—owned two ponies, a grey and a dun. They were expensive animals, but the grey was useless as a race pony whereas the dun shaped well. They were bought at auction a few days before the autumn meeting of that year, too late for showing off their talents in November. But as the paper hunt season opened shortly afterwards, Peter mounted his dun at the start, which was where M. Madier's residence now stands. The dun flew with the speed of the north wind, which was against him, and Peter pulled for all he was worth at the reins. But it was of no use: the dun was out for enjoying himself and he insisted on covering as many furrows in as short a time as possible. Being a raw hand at the game (his rider had been raw for many years) the dun rather shied at some of the larger ditches and he eventually stopped in front of an ugly looking mud pool that required some jumping. Perhaps it was Peter's fault, for the dun must have felt his master's heart changing its place of abode and lodging itself in his throat, enough to make any pony nervous. Anyway, he couldn't be persuaded to make the jump, not even with the gentle assistence of a nine dollar whip, and there he stood, fidgety, and nervously pawing the ground.

"Get out of this! what are you messing about here for? Give a fellow a chance, will you?"

Peter knew the voice and trembled. It was the voice of the promier jock at the time, so you know who it was. There was no time to apologize or to move, for the caller boldly made for the abyss in front of him and let his willing mount jump. But in doing so he just glanced the side of the dun, and this had the effect of upsetting the equilibrium of his mount which with the premier jock went rolling in the mud below, to the great consternation and grief of Peter, who nearly fell off himself out of sheer sympathy. But our premier jock never said a word, picked himself and his mount up and flew away again. Peter got over too, later. And away the dun went at a rattling pace. But not for long. Presently a hard piece of upturned soil met his off front hoof and down he came with a tremendous crash, sending Peter swiftly over his head. When they had picked themselves up it was found that the dun limped badly and Peter could hardly crawl. What to do? The dun stood as still as a rock while Peter laboriously and painfully climbed on his back, and the two walked home together wiser but sadder paper hunters.

THE AMBITIOUS JOCK.

At that time there was a young ambitious jockey endowed with a biblical name, who was reputed not to be able to ride for nuts. This young gentleman volunteered to take charge of the dun and to nurse him back to the proper use of his legs, leaving Peter to recover the best way he could. It was a fair proposition, for to tell the truth Peter knew nothing about horseflesh, although he had been buying it for years. However, when the spring training was approaching both he and the dun were again in first rate condition, and the ambitious young jockey was naturally very proud of his success as a vet, but Peter was mean enough to believe that nature had done its work in both cases. Be that as it may, it was only right that this young man, who had gone to so much trouble, should also have the pleasure of riding the dun at the races if the anatomy of said dun would hang together till then. And so it was agreed by owner and jockey.

But the wise men sitting round the coffee table said that Peter was a fool as usual. It was alleged that the dun was likely to catch the judge's eye if that gentleman looked carefully for him when the mob came clattering up the straight, but that his chances were nil if such a jockey were to steer him. "You ought to put a decent rider on him," the knowing ones said, "or you'll spoil his chances." "Whose chances," Peter quizzically asked. "Oh," they said, "you can't spoil the jock's chances, for he can never win a race even on a giraffe."

On a bright spring day of the races the dun, loaded with lead, (for the old testament after which the jockey was named was much too light for coming up to weight for inches) made his début with silk on his back. He started with a bunch of 22 other quadrupeds and came in a good fourth. "Didn't I tell you so," the wise ones said, the chap can't ride! If he had had a decent Jockey up he would at least have been placed."

Peter shook his head mournfully and said it was very possibly true. But how on earth could he make a change at this stage? The biblical one had nursed the dun for nearly six months and he couldn't possibly dismiss him now. So the next day the dun was sent out again for a mile with the same rider up alongside of a large bunch of rivals. Peter can still hear the clatter as they were coming up the straight led by his own dun. And he kept the lead right past the judge's box so that there should be no mistake. And the jockey! He died many years ago, but Peter can still see the smile that wreathed that fine young chap's features as he rode in through the gate. It was like the smile that one may imagine a fellow wears when the portals of paradise are thrown wide open for him to enter. May be he is still smiling, poor chap, for he gained further honours. That the dun and his jock had not found a single backer and that all the money went into the coffers of the Race Club is a detail that does not affect the story.

SELLINN LOTTERIES.

In those days all the sports in town went to the old German Club in Canton Road where the China Mutual now insures people. There tremendous selling lotteries were held amidst great fun. Naturally Peter went there too, for the dun was now a candidate for the champions and one never knew. Why not? And so when the "Yarman Broker" who acted as auctioneer called the dun's name, his owner bought him for $150, which really means $300, besides refreshments.

During the preliminary canter, while the auctioneer had been selling common cattle in less important races. Peter had been entertaining his neighbour with a lengthy discourse on the folly of paying thousands for a favourite. The favourite might get colic, he argued, might injure a leg or die overnight. There was cordial agreement between the two on this point. At last the great moment arrived when the favourite for the champions, the unbeatable Slummerum, was trotted out by the perspiring auctioneer.

"Now gentlemen, here is the pony! The great Slummerum! You all know him! How much shall we say for him? How much?"

The auctioneer was purple in the face owing to the exertions he had put into his arduous work during the night. Now he looked wistfully through the smoke at the crowd below him, trying to catch somebody's eye. He paused for breath and wiped his perspiring brow, but nobody responded to his vociferous invitations to make a bid. Then he began again "How much shall I say, gentlemen for this magnificent animal? As good as ever! Come on, gentlemen come on now, don't be shy!"

But nobody said a word. A certain gentleman, who was then a young and aspiring jockey, had drawn this unbeatable favourite for the champions and he as well as everybody else knew perfectly well that if he wanted to keep Slummerum he would have to pay a stiff price.

THE MOMENT'S MADNESS.

And now one of those unaccountable things happened which defies the sense of reasoning man. Peter had just given a long and successful lecture to his neighbour on the folly of paying big money for an animal that was judged to be a dead certainty, deducing among other reasons for his aversion to such a course that the dead certainty might die overnight. And what do you think Peter did? He deliberately held up three fingers!

"What! Three hundred for Slummerum!" the Yarman Broker shouted derisively. "No ,no, My dear sir, we want a little more than that."

"Thousands," Peter shouted.

"Ah well, that is more like it. That is better. Three thousand is bid, gentlemen! Three thousand ...three thonsand... three thousand only... come on now... only three thousand for the great Slummerum...?"

A dead silence met the passionate shouting of the perspiring auctioneer who looked indignantly at the passive crowd in front of him.

"No more bidding, gentlemen? No more bidding for this splendid pony?... First time... no more?... no other bid...?"

His hammer fell with a tremendous crash on the table in front of him, followed by the three words "Mr. Peter Pan."

Peter's neighbour glared incredulously at him. "Why," he said, I thought you just mentioned that it was stupid to spend thousands on a favourite and now you have bought one for six thousand! How do you explain that?"

"Because I am stupid," Peter responded. "I never meant to buy him at all. I thought I would give them a lead in order to save time and now I've got him myself! well, maskee, he is good enough anyway."

THE UNREMOVABLE SMILE.

Peter now possessed the favourite and his own dun, the latter of which might or might not start in the champions. But in the second race on champions day he again let the dun try conclusions with an aristocratic crowd of sprinters and with seven pounds of heavy lead extra on the poor dun's back. Besides the premier jock there were other finished riders disputing his biblical jockey's rights, but the latter looked quite unconcerned probably in remembrance of yesterday's glorious victory. And in spite of the seven pounds extra. At last they were sent on their fast journey down at Loongfei. The dun put his best foot forward at once, took the lead and was wise enough to keep it till the winning post had been passed.

And the jockey? With seven pounds extra, beating the premier and other capable jocks was something to brag about! His smile? It reached nearly over to Probst's corner, so there is not room enough in this paper to describe it. He was the hero of the day and no mistake about it. The biblical one had come into his own, for he did not hear the whispers that "anybody could win on the dun if he can only stick on." At any rate, he did stick on right up to the chapter which is not finished yet.

For now comes a sad ending to this tale. There were four or five races before the Champions was to be run, and in the interval between one of these a gentleman who years afterwards became the principal citizen of Muddy Flat knocked up against the owner of the dun.

"Are you going to start the dun in the champions," he asked.

"No, he can't last the distance. Besides, he has already had a severe race to-day."

"You ought to send him out. He is a splendid pony. You never can tell."

That was true. One never can tell. If one could tell beforehand lots of ponies would not be started, and there wouldn't be so much fun in the world. If we all knew beforehand!

THE BITTER END.

Of course Peter started the dun in the champions. He leapt forward with a tremendous jump and flew like a rocket towards Loongfei. There he changed to greased lightning and at the three-quarter mile post he was scores and scores of lengths ahead, a lead which was maintained for a long time yet.

"He is going to do the trick again," somebody shouted. "Look at him, he is still going great guns."

He was. And Peter began to turn over in his mind whether he would rather win with the dun or with Slummerum, his six thousand dollar purchase of the previous evening. Finally he decided that he would like to see the smile of the biblical one once more.

He saw it 62 seconds later, but it looked older. For the fact is that when the jockey of the famous Slummerum saw the dun so far ahead he became uneasy and let Slummerum burn the grass under his feet. But he let him go too early. They said he should have kept his matches in his pocket for the supreme effort up the straight. He and another caught the dun just after turning into the straight, but a third overtook them both a few lengths before the winning post and beat the great Slummerum by a length. The dun was nowhere.

The question now is: Would the dun have won the champions if he had been ridden by an experienced jockey, and would Peter have had more money in the bank now if he had not inadvertently invested in the great Slummerum?

This was not the story Peter set out to tell. But he may tell the other one if you care to hear it.

A REUTER telegram from Hongkong says that Mr. A. G. M. Fletcher, the Assistant Colonial Secretary, left for London on March 22 by the P. & O. S. Naldera to represent Hongkong at the League of Nations Opium Conference at Geneva.

PARTICULARLY sad circumstances surround the death of Mrs. Jarvis, wife of Mr. William Jarvis of the Chinese Maritime Customs, who died a week ago from small-pox, says the "Hongkong Daily Press." Mr. Jarvis and the late Mrs. Jarvis had only been married 19 days. The deceased lady came out to Hongkong on February 22 by the City of New York and the marriage took place the same day at St. Joseph's Church. The honeymoon was spent in Hongkong and six days later the newly married couple took up quarters on Lin Tin Island where Mr. Jarvis was stationed for duty. Mrs. Jarvis was taken ill on March 5 and two days later she was removed to hospital in Hongkong where her case was diagnosed as small-pox, death later supervening. The late Mrs. Jarvis was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Read, who are well-known residents of Stratford, London. She was just 25 years of age.

"TOGETHER THOUGHTS"

(From The Chinese)

I.

Together to think of the beautiful sky,
Of the grass with its banners green—
When a hundred small flags from the fresh earth fly,
And the willows like smoke are seen!
Does the mirror that sleeps in the dell's still pond
No sympathy hold for the maid
That waits with a heart both gentle and fond
For a lover more precious than jade?
Thy love, has it vanished away like the snow?
What need, then, my hair to arrange—
If not on one reed the twin lily-buds blow?
If the heart of a youth can change?

II.

Together to wander, as clouds in a dream—
Alas, when the clouds go black!
The lotus that drifts with the will of the stream
Finds never the tide to flow back.
The cataract waters of rushing Siang
Not faster, not fiercelier fall
Than the tears that arise from each sorrow-born pang
For the bird that is fled from my call.
What need then to sit and embroider with care
The lovebirds' sweet pattern of bliss,
If Heaven divorces an innocent pair?
If the end of true love be this?

III.

"Tsih! Tsih!" cry the crickets—O pitiful birds!
The peony flowers bloom,
And the rain cannot cease from its weary words
That speak to the heart of gloom.
And "Tsih!" cry the pitiful crickets, alone,
Though ox-boy and spinning-maid meet
By the bridge in the forest and tender in tone
Discourse of their love so sweet.
But high overhead the wild goose flies
O'er blossoming meadows of tea,
And I yearn to give voice to my love that cries
With the pitiful cricket's "Tsih!"

IV.

The roses of winter are spreading their leaves,
The swan's white feathers abound,
But my soul lies dead, and my body grieves
For the warmth of its funeral mound.
And thou in the night hast forsaken the way
That my love would have gladdened for thee,
While the dusk and the dark and the cold and the gray
Alone share their bosoms with me.
Mad love and mad thoughts are my friends and my foes,
One solace alone hath my heart—
The sky shineth blue over thee and thy woes,
Though faithless, wherever thou art

V.

But sure, when the months on their courses have flown
I'll hear, with a knock at the gate,
Thy voice, O Beloved!—the voice of mine own,
Whose steps have been swifter than Fate.
Then joyous with happiness bursting its banks
We'll stand at our ancestors' shrine,
And gladden the altar with incense-thanks,
And hallow our joy with wine.
With friends and with mirth at the wedding feast
Kind Heaven our love shall blend,
As I place my hand in thy toil-worn breast
And the pain and the anguish end.

LESSONS IN GOLF

III.—The Art of Mashie Play

(By Harry Vardon—Six Times Open Champion)

Pursuing our policy of studying first the simpler shots in the game, there is a thing that we must do immediately, seeing that we have already considered the principles by which successful drives and mid-iron shots are accomplished.

We must address ourselves to the mashie. It is not far from being the most important club in the bag, for an approach laid within holding distance is often more valuable than a very long drive, and it is a favourite club for practice among those golfers who possess the inclination to go out for an occasional half-hour of quiet experimentation. The trouble is that many of them practise with it in the wrong way.

If I had to pick out the faults that are made most frequently in the methods of playing mashie shots, I would select two.

One is a perpetuation of the principle of lifting the left heel from the ground and poising on the inside of the tread of the left foot and taking the club, a process that is necessary where the full drive is concerned and also, though in a slightly lesser degree, in the case of the iron shot.

The other common error in the use of the mashie is that of trying to scoop the ball into the air as though the player were trying to shovel it up to the hole instead of hitting it in just as straight forward a way as he would for a drive.

I am aware that this latter point has been advanced times without number as a warning against the wrong manner of wielding the mashie, but that it is very frequently forgotten is proved by the frequency with which one sees golfers on every course endeavouring to scoop their mashie shots on to the green, instead of hitting boldly at the ball and trusting to the left of the club to do the work for which it is specially designed—that of producing a shot with a high trajectory.

HIP CONTROL.

Let us consider first the stance. The body should be turned appreciably more towards the hole than for the iron shots. So definite must be this increased "open-ness" of the body towards the hole that the right foot should be at absolute right-angles to the intended line of the shot, and the toes of the left foot should be pointing well outwards and several inches farther behind the right than they have been hitherto. Also, the ball should be about opposite the left heel.

It will thus be seen that the player is standing with his body turned so definitely towards the hole as to militate against the same free pivoting at the hips as for longer shots, and this is precisely the condition that is desirable. The mashie shot is one calling essentially for stability of stance and control of club, so that the body does not need to screw round at the hips to the same extent as for shots with the clubs of longer range.

At the same time, a great many players—one might fairly say the majority—make it do so, and the reason is simple. As they take the club back, they raise the left heel from the ground and more or less pirouette on the inside of the big joint of that foot.

It is of vital importance to guard against this tendency. It usually throws the mashie shot completely out of gear.

In the ordinary way, a half swing with this club is as much as the golfer should attempt, because mashie play is the very essence of the art of approaching and there ought to be nothing in the nature of death-or-glory slogging about it.

Now and again, it may be necessary to play a three-quarter or even a full shot with this club, but to render such a procedure desirable, the circumstances ought to be very exceptional, seeing that other clubs built for longer-range shots are available.

PIVOTING FROM THE KNEES.

The player having taken up the stance I have already indicated, and made sure that he is sufficiently close to the ball that he can ground the entire sole of the mashie behind it without straining to do so, he should first pay attention to the right knee.

Let that joint be in a bent position—relaxed and easy. Almost more than any other part of the physical constitution is it the governing factor in the mashie shot.

We will assume that the player is going to try and accomplish an ordinary pitch—and—run shot, which is sufficient to satisfy 98 golfers out of every 100. As the club goes back, the right knee stiffens and the body turns slightly at the hips. As a natural consequence, the left knee bends inwards towards the right.

What the player must be careful about at this stage is not to raise the left heel from the ground and pivot on the inside of the left-foot, big toe joints. If he succumbs to the temptation to allow himself this freedom, the swing will, in most cases, get out of control.

As the left knee bends inwards in response to the straightening of the right, he should be conscious that the left leg is supporting most of his weight, and supporting it without the heel being raised from the ground.

For a half, or almost a three-quarter swing, this is all the pivoting that is necessary. Most of it is conducted at the knees. The hips and the feet are really controlled by the movements of the knees.

The down swing is, to all intents and purposes, the up-swing reversed. As the club starts to come down, the left knee returns to its original straightness and the right knee returns to its original relaxed and bent position. Strike the ball a firm blow, without any effort to scoop it into the air, and as the club goes through with the shot, turn on to the inside of the right foot so as to facilitate the finish.

IV.—Bunker Shots

In our previous lessons we have been studying—and, I hope, practising—full drives from the tee and shots up to the hole with the mid-iron and the mashie, so by now the chances are that we have been bunkered.

Consequently, it is high time to consider how to act when this check presents itself. Bunker shots are of many kinds. By great good fortune the ball may be teed up in the hazard. Much more likely, however, is it to be lying heavily—even half-buried—in the sand or whatever the nature of the substance that forms the foundation of this place of retribution. The player may have to execute his shot from close to the face of the bunker, in which case he must make the ball rise sharply, or he may be so far from the face as to simplify the shot considerably.

THE ETERNAL PROBLEM.

It will thus be seen that each bunker shot has to be tackled in accordance with its own individual circumstances, and the first thing that the player must decide when he enters the hazard is as to whether he is going to try for distance out of it or be content merely to extricate himself from it and place his ball on the fairway.

I have long since come to the conclusion that, unless the situation is so desperate that you must hole out from the bunker if you are to obtain a half, it is a wise thing never to attempt death-or-glory shots in a hazard. As a rule, it pays in the end to play a stroke that will deposit the ball on the course again without much gain of distance, and trust to the approach or the putt to retrieve the set-back.

Naturally, when the ball is sitting up in a bunker very much as one would expect to find it on the fairway, there is a temptation to make the most of the dispensation. Obviously, the player will attempt pretty much the ordinary kind of shot in these circumstances, but he will be well advised to remember even now that his first duty is to get the ball out of the hazard.

REGULATING THE SWING.

He is not allowed to ground the club in the address. In most cases, he swings the club-head to and fro over the ball—perhaps an inch and a half or two inches above it.

Therefore, as the club is ascending and descending, he has to go down to the ball and when he tries a full swing, he does not always get down to it with the correct rhythm. The result may be either a sudden dropping of the right shoulder as the club nears the ball—which is most likely to produce a complete bungle—or a topped shot which drives the ball into the face of the hazard.

There is what we may term an average, everybody kind of bunker shot. The ball is lying closely—perhaps not even a quarter buried but still snugly—in the sand or other soil two or three feet short of a bunker-face of ordinary height.

This is an occasion when the "safety first" principle should be allowed to prevail. The player needs to concentrate solely and wholly on getting out of the bunker; not on trying a feat of daring.

THE RIGHT KIND OF NIBBICK.

I am assuming that he has a niblick with the stiffest possible shaft and a heavy head. This latter consideration is no less important than the former. Even the lady golfer needs a niblick with a heavy head, for, in connexion with the shot which we are now about to play, this is a club with which we want to hit for all we are worth, and its weight helps in the work.

We need to stand well over the ball—the stance fairly open—and fix our vision on a spot about an inch and a half behind the ball. This typical bunker shot is as nearly as possible a straight-up-and-down stroke as distinct from the swing which we practise for other shots.

In length it can be what we ordinarily term a full swing, but it should be distinctly more upright than for any other shot, because our object is not to sweep the ball forward with any semblance of a follow-through of the clubhead.

We want to bring the club down as nearly straight as we can—naturally, its track will be that of a shallow-arc—and delve its head into the soil at the spot on which we have fixed our vision, about an inch and a half behind the ball.

WHEN "PRESSING" HELPS.

That will be the end of its work so far as that particular stroke is concerned, and the consequence will be such a disturbance of the soil behind the ball that the latter rises from its ensconced position and flies—however sluggishly—over the face of the hazard to come to rest on the fairway.

As we bring the club down we should allow most of the weight of the body to go on to the left leg. Every degree of force that we can put into the blow behind the ball is desirable. In short, we may "press" to the limit of our capacity, and this throwing forward of the weight during the down swing helps us to force the club-head into the soil and dislodge the ball.

On a great many inland courses, the substance in the hazards—it may be gravel or undisguised clay—is so firm at most seasons of the year that the ball always more or less sits up on it. In these circumstances, the player is often tempted to try and take it cleanly, and—conscious of the face of the hazard just in front of him—his interpretation of the best means to the end is frequently to make a scooping stroke.

It is bad policy in the extreme and it very rarely succeeds. In clay or gravel, it is nearly always possible to make the ball rise by delving the club-head into the soil behind the ball, although, in the case of a hard surface, one would not aim so far behind as in sand.

Taking the ball cleanly in a hazard is a shot for very rare circumstances. Scooping at it is an almost sure step to disaster.

JAPANESE papers of recent date reported an attempted suicide by Edith Waller, aged 20, wife of Alfred Frank Waller, aged 26, British subjects living at Fukiai. There were the usual exaggerations and gratuitously invented romances, says the "Japan Chronicle." The young couple appear to have been very badly off, the husband trying to make a living by teaching English. The wife took a narcotic, whether in desperation or not is not quite clear. It was not a very powerful one, however, and she soon recovered.

CONFUCIUS CONFOUNDED

Or The Doctrine of the Perfect Kuan

By Lu Teh.

CHAPTER I.—The great sage, the Master Hu Shuo, called for another pint of samshu and, turning to his favorite disciple, Pa Tao, spake saying:

"Confucius hath said that the perfect man knoweth whence the wind bloweth. Doth this suffice, thinkest thou Pa Tao, for the perfect Kuan?"

"Nay," said Pa Tao. "Only he who raiseth the wind hath all praise."

The Master said: "Truly, here is wisdom. Thou art worthy of me Pa Tao."

CHAPTER II.—There came to the Master's house a certain Hsü, but lately returned from abroad who, wishing preferment in a yamen, sought the philosopher Hu Shuo. While he abode at the door a servant brought the Master his card whereon was writ in the English language: "Q.B. Muddleby Shoo."

"Ha!" exclaimed the Master," there is promise here. Drag it in."

When the youth stood before him the Master again examined the card and said:

"Muddleby, thou hast made a claim upon my esteem and I would fain help thee."

"Wherein have I won the Master's favour?" inquired the youth.

"Through progress in that kind of asininity which is coming to be associated with the sort of roguery that adorns the perfect Kuan," said the Master.

The youth paled, seized his hat and fled; whereupon the Master Hu Shuo turned to Pa Tao and said:

"What aileth him Pa Tao?"

Pa Tao replied: "He hath mistaken a compliment for a rebuke, as is the way with small, mean men."

"Bonehead!" quoth Hu Shuo, lighting his opium lamp, "my interest was misplaced."

CHAPTER III.—One day the Master set forth with Luan Ch'i, Pa Tsao and Hua T'ou, his disciples, to call ceremoniously upon the adopted brother of the second cousin of a Tuchun's number one boy, from whom he sought advice upon a matter of investments. His Bols-Joyce carried the usual guards, three on each running board, and achieved the customary speed of forty miles an hour down the alley way. But to the sage's annoyance his car overturned a cart, ran over the mule and stalled, failing, in spite of the chauffeur's efforts to forge ahead, to make further progress.

"The foreigner hath hoaxed me," quoth the sage. "The rascal said this chariot had power. Thou must seek elsewhere, Luan Ch'i, and learn if there be not smoke wagons that surmount such obstacles."

Thereupon the guards, seeing the master wroth, slew the cartman and brained the chauffeur, as was fitting. Then came forth from his shelter a traffic policeman, who cried out:

"Is it not Hu Shou, the sage?"

"It is, fool," said Hu Shuo." Where wert thou when we were forced to waste ammunition upon yon muddy carter?"

"Dreaming that I had received 30 per cent. of my pay for this month last year," quoth the policeman.

"Blessed is sleep to the people!" remarked the Master. "Policeman, knowest thou tha distinction between the wise guy and the perfect Kuan?"

"Truly," said the traffic man, "the wise guy knoweth it all; but the perfect Kuan hoggeth it all."

Hu Shuo descended in haste to have further converse, but the man was already gone, for the sun had come forth from behind a cloud; and when sought in his shelter he was sleeping quietly. Hua T'ou would have kicked him but the master stayed him.

CHAPTER IV.—Again, on another day, came the youth named Hsü with the card whereon was writ: "Q.B. Muddleby Shoo." The Master turned his face from him and asked impatiently:

"Muddleby, what hast thou learned since I saw thee last?"

"A modicum of wisdom," said the youth. "The yamen is a hard master to the dullard."

"Hast aught to split with me?" inquired the sage.

"Naught but a share of the love I bear my country," replied the youth. Whereat the Master rolled over on the kang with a sigh and fell into a profound slumber. When he awoke the youth still stood there and Hu Shuo asked him patiently, as was his wont before violence:

"What did'st thou learn abroad that serves thee here?"

"Patriotism," answered the youth. The true meaning of patriotism, O Sage."

"Expound it," demanded Hu Shuo, tenderly thumbing the opium pill over the flame.

"It is to hold one job honestly and labour to earn what it yields before seeking promotion."

When the bodyguards had hurled the impertinent youth into the drain before the door, the Master said to Pa Tao:

"What hath bitten this youth?"

"Truly Master, he is unfit to be thy disciple. He readeth the classics and yet hath morals. He professeth religion and yet hath faith therein. He speaketh words and yet hath the folly to say what he thinketh and to mean what he saith."

"It sorrows me," quoth the sage. "Let not such simplicity distract me again."

And yet one day, past all the guards, this Muddleby charged into the Master's presence and, prostrating himself, cried:

"Sage, I am thy pupil. I now have five jobs and work at none of them."

"Good! But not good enough," quoth Hu Shuo. "Dost thou attend thy duties and dost thou go in person to collect thy salaries?"

"In sooth, Master, I attend office, but I stay not long; and I read theatrical journals, smoke cigarettes and do no useful work. I collect my salaries in person because otherwise my chief would collect them for me and then forget that there lived one so small as I."

"A long way from perfection still," remarked the sage, "but I say again there is promise here." What didst thou study abroad, Muddleby?

"Physics, my Master," replied the youth.

"And how dost thou profit by this learning here?"

"Technically, in the Ministry of Communications, the Ministry of Agriculture, the railways and elsewhere."

"Wrong! Wrong!" exclaimed Hu Shuo. "Pa Tao, have an pupil made a professor in the medical college and a surgeon general in the army. At once my pupil!"

"But Master," crieth this Muddleby, "thy pupil knoweth naught of medicine nor doth he dare assume such responsibilities."

"Into the ditch with the fool!" saith the Master.

Heartened by the ensuing splash, Hu Shuo turned to Pa Tao and Hua T'ou and asked:

"How liveth the perfect Kuan, my children, and what are jobs to him?"

"By graft alone," replied Pa Tao.

"He seeketh jobs that he may announce them on his cards," said Hua T'ou. And the Master was pleased and called for another pint of samshu.

"Bring the cards," the Master ordered. "This night'twill be jack pot, my children. The perfect Kuan skinneth his very kith and kin at poker, Pa Tao; but bear in mind this bit of wisdom, young man: The wise disciple who would retain his shirt trifleth not with the adept."

MUCH interest is being shown in Hongkong in a musical prodigy, Emil Charles Danenberg, a boy six and a half years of age. Last week he gave a recital to over 300 people in St. Andrew's Hall, playing from memory 31 pieces. These included the works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven among the older school, and Poldini, Massenet, Godowsky, MacDowell, Tschaikowsky and Moore Park among the modern composers selected.

SHANGHAI MOTHER GOOSE

CRYING NEEDS.

"There was a young woman who lived in Shanghai.
Im rearing her children she often would sigh:
I need a museum, an art gallery, too.
Without a good library, what can we do?"

DISILLUSIONMENT.

When I was a bachelor I lived in a Mess,
And did we have a jolly time? Well I should rather guess.
But cocktails and highballs led me such a life
I thought I'd better settle down and get myself a wife.
Rents were so high and my salary so meagre
We really couldn't get a house though we were eager.
We lived in a boarding house, romance had a fall;
Down tumbled homelife, happiness and all.

SINGLES AND BOBS.

Little Bo-Peep has lost her curls
And can't tell where to find them;
But so have all the other girls
And so she doesn't mind them.

RELATIVITY

By Elizabeth Pepys

"The best of all ways
To lengthen our days
Is to steal a few hours from the night, my dear."—Moore.

Although I am not one of the Einsteins of the world and abstract philosophy is to me a meaningless maze, there are occasions upon which I ponder upon the relativity of time. Daphne is one of the causes for this mental activity. Were it not for waiting for her to keep her appointments I should have little time to think but as things are there are many opportunities given me to wonder why Daphne's time concepts are so different from others.

Daphne's very watches are worth considering. Sir Walter Raleigh declared that nothing but History and Eternity could triumph over Time, but he had not seen Daphne adjust the hands of her watch at the door before entering with: "Why how early you all are, it's only just the hour!" or again surreptitiously tinker with her time-piece during a boring interview to break in: "Who could have guessed the hour! So sorry but it's so late I really must be running." Time has no terrors for Daphne as long as her watches—and her friends—prove amenable.

LONG AND SHORT HOURS.

Of course we are all more or less aware that an hour in a dentist's chair is considerably longer than the same number of minutes spent dancing and that we can live hours or so in a dream minute. What happens to time when we are no longer awake to check up on it is a matter of more or less concern. How are we to know when we lay our wearied head on the pillow at night whether we get a full long sixty minutes' worth of refreshment or are put off with scant measure Certainly the sleep of crisp, cool nights seems a much better investment of time than the feverish broken tossings of hot summer.

TEMPERAMENTAL HOSTESSES.

Another branch of practical relativity is the interpretation of dinner hours. One hostess says "eight o'clock" and is frankly unprepared if you come before 8.30. Another says "about half-past eight" and seems annoyed at your tardiness when you enter at 8.25. We once confused a prompt hostess with one who could be counted upon for an hour's extension of time, and when at last we entered we found that searching parties had been sent out for us. Had we realized the situation we should have allowed ourselves to be run over or have suffered other bodily injury which would have excused our defection rather than to have entered that chilling atmosphere three-quarters of an hour late.

Meetings and entertainments, too. One fixture which we frequently attend is never called to order till at least 15 minutes past the hour. We are sorry for the prompt members who have to wait, but we refuse to be among them. Another is conducted by an energetic Chairman who keeps her watch ahead of time and is preternaturally prompt, so much so that we have been known to miss the affair altogether. It used to be a maxim with us in Russia that no entertainment opened till at least half an hour after the advertised time and the Chinese are even more dilatory. Yes indeed, time is very relative.

"THE LONG MAJESTIC MARCH"

—"Daffodils
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty."
—Shakespeare.

By Elizabeth Pepys.

March is not a favoured month whether among poets or plain people and we might as well confess that we wrenched our title out of its reasonable context in order to get any title at all. No poet can be restrained from writing about spring, but March—well March seems to be no better than a door mat on the portals of that joyous season.

Still, since it is undeniably a part of the year, it seems only decent to allude to it in passing and in that we have not already referred to its coming in like a lion to go out presumably like a a lamb, and have not mentioned the mad March hare we apologize to the defrauded public.

THE NEXT BEST THING.

As the first spring month, according to the calendar, but seldom in harmony with the facts in the case, this season has acquired the merit accruing to one on the fringes of good society. If it has not entirely cast off winter and all its works, it has at least many premonitory promises of spring. Indeed as one poet has sung:

O March, we know thou are kind hearted,
Spite of storms and frets,
And, out of sight, nurse April's violets

—or something to that effect. Not having access to a real reference library we cannot verify the quotation; but for that matter, neither can the reader.

Then there is a breeziness and informality about this tempestuous month which takes one's fancy. One can imagine a tidy housekeeper indulging in a brisk spasm of spring housecleaning, an attack which in itself is rather harrassing but without which no properly conducted household could exist, a fitting prelude to the real spring

—"The sweet spring, is the year's pleasant king;
Then blooms each thing, then maids dance in a ring,
Cold doth not sting, the pretty birds do sing,
Cuckoo, jug-jug, pu-we, to-witta-woo!"

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Educational Value of a Museum Building

The editorial comment upon the proposal to raise money by a Municipal loan for a public museum, art gallery and adequate reference library for Shanghai which appeared in the N.-C. D. N. of March 15 raises again a most important question. The plan suggested calls for an initial outlay of Tls. 400,000 which includes the cost of land and Tls. 50,000 for the yearly running expenses. Interest on the payments would demand another Tls. 50,000. This being a public institution its expenses would properly be placed on the Municipal Budget and would add only one-third of one per cent. to the rates, for which trifling increase an almost necessary public institution would eventually be acquired.

So much for the hard business, dollars and cents side of it. As an investment its merit is obvious. As a much needed cultural agency for adults of the Settlement its utility admits of no debate. But the strongest argument of all is that children cannot be properly educatted in Shanghai without it. Not all parents can send their children Home for their schooling. Most children have at least some part of their education in Shanghai and in their impressionable years when illustration means so much there is no museum where they may see Chinese art or become acquainted with the flora and fauna of the country in which they are living.

Grown-ups can shift for themselves, to an extent, but the formative years of childhood should have every advantage. Drawbacks to life abroad there must be, but when special privileges for children are so near our grasp it is culpable not to reach out for them.

LEAP YEAR LEGALITIES

In 1288 the following law was enacted in Scotland:

"It is statur and ordaint that during the rein of hir maist blissit Megeste, for ilk yeare knowne as lepe yeare, ilk mayden ladye of baithe highe and lowe estait shall hae liberte to bespeke ye man she likes, albeit he refusses to taik hir to be his lawful wyte, he shall be mulcted in ye sum an pundis or less, as his estait may be; except and awis gif he can make it appeare that he is betrothit ane ither woman he then shall be free.

FOR SPRING AND EARLY SUMMER

Suggestions for Travellers

White! That's to be the colour scheme in brief. White and black will be very good; white and yellow—very good, too; white and green—good, but not quite so often seen. Simplicity that just clears the verge of affectation will be the key-note as to line. Sleeves will be either long or short; skirts, ten or twelve inches from the ground. Uncrushable silks will rule the day. Silk alpaca is the newest material of all—almost as soft as crêpe de Chine, but with the alpaca weave. Printed fabrics are slated for afternoon wear. Coats are to be white and furred; woollen materials for them are soft, with a cashmere touch. One dances in lace and tulle, frequently over a flesh or peach satin slip.

For the morning, one takes out any of a dozen dresses: of silk alpaca, either white or in a pastel shade, of which one also possesses a suit; of the uncrushable pussy willow; of the faithful crêpe de Chine that washes like a handkerchief. All of these are one-piece frocks. Pleats are almost the only allowable trimming except a bit of drawn-work—or that most decorative and original thing the season decrees, the scarf.

THE CHEERY SCARF.

Here comes the colour note. Sometimes, the brilliance creeps into the girdle, too, but its stronghold is in the versatile scarf attached to the dress itself or worn separately. Scarfs are legion: the sports scarfs; the scarf to be worn with the winter sports costume or the golfing costume or inside the motor coat, of striped knitted silk or of a heavenly shade of crêpe de Chine that throws a pleasant glow over soft greys and beiges; the evening scarf of tulle—yards and yards of tulle, full width, black, matching the dress, or contrasting with it.

The subject of scarfs has led us all round the clock, back to the morning, with the remark that alpaca and crêpe de Chine are not the only materials for those multitudinous straight morning frocks. There is the flannel dress, replacing, to some extent, the familiar jersey. For more formal occasions, there are frocks of French voile with an all-over application of suède. Once in a while, an embroidered voile or batiste shows its demurely pretty self. And there are costumes of the middy blouse of crêpe de Chine and skirt to match or of fine white woollen material. There is the coat and skirt tailleur, severe, one-buttoned of silk alpaca or one of the silk-like white woollens.

One wears a white coat. The materials most frequently used are soft and quite lustreless. Knitted fabrics are much in demand as well. A Monjaret model in white is trimmed with fox fur, while another, also designed by Monjaret, creates a variation by its patterned surface of tan knitted silk and wool. A stylish model is of diagonally woven white rep with a collar of Russian kit fox. A coat lavishly trimmed with white fox and more suitable for afternoon than sports wear, is made of heavy white silk jersey with applications of white suède. A Chéruit model of white marokolaine with a slightly flaring bottom has a trimming of American opossum.

For motoring and travelling, there are a very few top-coats made in a fabric called "half and half," woven all in one. The upper part, perhaps, may be in grey, the lower part in Oxford, in which case the fur would be an in-between shade blending with both. The beige and brown combinations with brown fur are also good.

The simplest frocks are made of a new silk material much like a man's shirting, in stripes, in hair-line checks of average size, or in tiny checks that seem to throw a fine screen of colour over the white ground. Such dresses are often given trim, narrow belts of coloured leather. More formal than these slim tub frocks are those of printed silk. Some silks are very gay; there are lovely black and white ones: blue and white carries the town revival of blue into the country season. The silk voile frock is seen in lovely colours, and there are printed chiffons. Over these dresses, if one needs a wrap, the white coat of the morning is still quite right.—"Vogue."

THE "STRAIGHT AND NARROW" IN ITS VARIED ADAPTATIONS

HELPFUL HINTS

FOR THE LAUNDRY.

When sprinkling table linen, use a sugar sifter in which is placed one quart of water mixed with a tablespoonful of cold starch. When ironed the linen looks like new.

FINDING THE NEEDLE.

A magnet on a string should be kept in the sewing basket or drawer of the sewing machine. Should a needle be dropped, swing the magnet close to the floor over and around the spot, and magnet and needle will find each other with little loss of time.

FOR THE COOK.

If small cakes and tarts, cooked in small patty pans, are placed on a wet cloth for a few minutes, they will readily leave the tins.

If a line is made round the centre of apples with a sharp knife before they are baked they will not burst.

Before cutting new bread, dip the knife into boiling water. By this means the thinnest slices of bread may be cut without trouble from a new loaf.

If a china funnel, used for raising pies, is put in the middle of a saucepan while boiling milk, it will be found that the milk will not boil over, as it will boil up the funnel instead of over the sides.

Cheese, particularly if stale, is improved by wrapping, before it is laid away for future use, in a piece of cloth wet with vinegar. It will become soft and creamy, like new cheese, and remain so.

If hot stewed fruit is to be served in a glass dish, place the dish on a damp cloth, and it will not crack when the hot fruit is poured into it.

MARKING LINEN.

In marking articles of linen or cotton, this is rendered simpler if the part is moistened with cold water starch dabbed on, and ironed to obtain a smooth surface, on which it is easy to write.

A TWO PURPOSE POUFFE.

Two purpose things are becoming more and more popular. The newest addition to the already long list of household articles which belong to this category is the up-to-date floor pouffe. Made of rich ruched silks or the more humble but decidedly effective chintz or cretonne this novel pouffe has the usual padded top which makes it quite comfortable as a seat, while the lower half instead of being fashioned in the usual enclosed style has this part formed into a compact cupboard with neat-fitting little doors. This small cupboard is just the very thing for a slipper store or will make an excellent resting place for knitting or needle work which might otherwise be left lying about and give an air of untidiness to the sitting-room.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

Did Patrick Branwell Brontë write the greater part of "Wuthering Heights"? This claim is made for him in a book by Miss Alice Law, which is appearing with Philpot. We are asked to regard it as "a startling refutation of the accumulative prejudices against the character and achievements of a neglected genius."

A new study of Walt Whitman has been completed and will be published later in the year. It is by Mr. Gerald Bullett, author of "The Street of the Eye" and "The Innocence of G. K. Chesterton."

The Duke of Northumberland has written a preface to a new edition of the late Mr. W. H. Mallock's "Limits of Pure Democracy." It is being issued as a timely book because it is thought to be as suggestive and informing as anything ever written on democracy. To bring it down to a democratic level, as it were, it has been "cut" to about a third of its original length, for Mallock gave years to write it and endless pains and thought.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has a way of giving pet names to people he likes. He likes his American publisher, Mr. F. N. Doubleday, who writes an introduction to a new edition of Mr. Walter H. Page's "A Publishor's Confessions." To his friends Mr. Doubleday is known as "Effendi," a Turkish title which Mr. Kipling conferred upon him by simply using his initials, "F.N.D."

Ever so long ago Mr. Fisher Unwin started what he called, from want of a better name, a "First Novel Library." The first story to appear in it was "The Winstons," and it was written by Millicent Cobden, a daughter of the famous Free Trade champion and a sister of Mrs. Fisher Unwin. Miss Ethel M. Dell's "Flight of an Eagle" appeared in the "First Novel Library," and so have many other stories which have been successful. Now it celebrates its jubilee, for a tale called "The Road Royal," by Miss Carola Oman, will be the fiftieth volume in it. She is a daughter of Sir Charles Oman, the well-known Oxford don and historian.

Machiavelli, the Italian statesman and writer of the 15th century, has given us through his name two words—Machiavellism, or devilish sagacity, and Old Nick, from his name, Niccolo. In 1818 one Bowdler published an expurgated edition of Shakespeare; hence arose the verb "to bowdlerize." In old books we come across the word negus, for hot, spiced wine; it is from the name of Colonel Francis Negus, of Queen Anne's day, the day of the six-bottle men. The story of the word tectotal is that it was first used by a temperance advocate in 1833, and arose from his inability to pronounce, without stammering, the word "total." Nicotine commemorates Jean Nicot, French ambassador to Portugal in the 16th century.

If you keep track of new novels, you may remember one which appeared some years ago called "The Canon in Residence." It was by the Rev. Years ago Mr. Eden Phillpotts worked hard on a series of novels dealing with life human, animal, and natural, on Dartmoor. His stories won great praise from the reviewers, but they did not attract the attention of the public as they should have done. Since then, however, he has slowly been coming into recognition with other novels, and a new one from his pen is ready with Heinemann.

DR. OSSENDOWSKI'S NEW BOOK OF THRILLS

Man and Mystery in Asia—by Ferdinand Ossendowski. In collaboration with Lewis Stanton Palen. Dutton & Co. New York

Those who read that extraordinarily vivid and absorbing book "Beasts, Men and Gods" will eagerly receive Dr. Ossendowski's latest volume. And it would certainly be difficult to overrate the thrilling interest and originality of "Man and Mystery." Not only has Dr. Ossendowski visited the wildest places and seen the most weird and terrible things, but he has a genius for describing them. Hunting scenes, dead dreary lakes, forests teeming with every sort of creature, the strange habits of primitive peoples, the fearful stricken lives of Saghalien convicts—all these are described with a fine economy of words, a simplicity and the cold impartiality of a scientific mind which give them intense reality and vividness All praise too should be given to Mr. Palen for his translation (at least one supposes that was principally his work) if only he would not use the abominable "nearby." No higher praise can be paid than to say that the book reads as if it had been written originally in English.

Before war and Bolshevism had wrecked Russia Dr. Ossendowski held a high place in her scientific world as chemist, botanist and scientist. From the year 1899 onwards he was frequently employed by the Russian Government in scientific research in Central and Eastern Asia and it is of these journeys that the present book deals. It opens with a description of the country about the upper reaches of the river Yenisei particularly the holy lake Szira.

> Taking from the bottom of the lake samples of ooze, we remarked a strange phenomenon. After an exposure of some time in the open air, long movable grasses of pale yellow colour grew from this ooze, only to disappear leaving no traces. It looked as though some being living in the ooze extended its feelers and then withdrew them. And really this was exactly what happened, as these were colonies of Beggiatoae bacilli, those precursors of the death of sea and lakes which appear when some of the salts are decomposing and forming the hydrogen-sulphide which kills all life in these reservoirs.

And in the end after killing every creature and plant, the Beggiatoae destroy themselves.

> This is the sad and gruesome process of the death of great water basins which are metamorphosed into lifeless reservoirs of salt water smelling of hydrogen-sulphide. The Dead Sea in Palestine has long since been such a reservoir and great numbers of similar ones are scattered over the immense plains of Asia.

There is an uncanny story of how Lake Szira very nearly killed the author and his companion by an apparently causeless storm—great waves with no wind. Szira is not called the "holy lake" (in shuddering propitiation) for nothing.

Contrast with this the Ussuri district, "the pearl of the East," which includes the flora and fauna of both hemispheres and all climates and great wealth in minerals. Here is Lake Hanka where game is (or was) so plentiful that the native hunters who accompanied Dr. Ossendowski took 5,000 cartridges each for a three days' hunt, besides powder and shot. But where every prospect pleases, man is assuredly vile. The game included at one time "white swans" which were really Koreans making their way home from the gold diggings further north; and these the Cossacks of the Ussuri used to consider themselves fully entitled to kill and deprive of their treasure. Koreans, they said, had no souls, they were just animals. The degenerate state of most of the white colonists as described by Dr. Ossendowski is really appalling. At Novokiyevsk, a dreary little frontier station on Possiet Bay, the Russian officers invented what was called the Tiger Club In a pitch dark barn, two men would be chosen one of whom had a revolver the other a bell. The former would then stalk the latter:

> Suddenly a sharp ringing of the bell would be heard, then a shot. Sometimes a dull sound of a falling body answered the shot, when the tiger was killed or wounded, sometimes a triumphant cry: "You missed, now you take the bell." Often after such a night in the Tiger Club the morning patrols found on the shores of the bay tragic evidence of this incredible pastime. Although everybody knew exactly what befell these members of the club, the official reports always read:—"An officer was found killed through careless handling of firearms."

The accounts given of the customs of primitive tribes are all so interesting that it is difficult to choose between them. That of a Gold funeral is not the least interesting. The Golds bury their dead by wrapping them in bark and hanging them in trees. An elaborate dance having been performed by the priest or wizard, > he took two small boards with a layer of white birch back thin as tissue paper between them and slowly moved in the direction of the new coffin. He stood there in silence, as though in deep meditation. Then we heard a sound as light as the singing of a gnat. It seemed to come from afar but was in reality issuing from the thin boards which the shaman had raised to his mouth.

> But the sound gradually swelled in volume until it became a continuous bass roar which awoke the whole forest from the thick grass to the top of the oaks and filled the ears, the heart and the mind, giving at times a feeling as though it would shatter the skull. Surely this shaman could drive a man mad with only the help of two wooden boards and bits of bark. Finally the roar diminished and melted away again into scarcely audible tones. At the same time the shaman advanced into the shadow made by the trees and then in several places in this darkness, small phosphorescent flames appeared.
> At this the Golds whispered in awe among themselves and with terror stared into the dense shadow. "A rich, a decent burial," they whispered.

But the most absorbing part of the book is that which deals with Saghalien. For sheer horror we have read nothing like it. Saghalien is, by nature, richly dowered and should be an abode of happiness and prosperity. The Russian Government made of it a convict station of indescribable cruelty and terror. The convicts were shipped out from Odessa two or three times a year, chained together, men and women, below deck, never allowed out in the air. In conditions of hideous dirt and disease many died on the voyage. Prisoners were frequently drowned in landing as there was no dock or pier in Saghalien. But this saved the Government money. The soldiers put to guard the prisoners were the most brutal of their kind, who had themselves been sent to the accursed island as a punishment. Flogging, the invariable penalty for any offence, was of unheard of severity:

> The condemned received from fifteen to three hundred strokes with willow rods boiled before use in sea water. The fifteenth stroke was supposed always to cut the skin and draw blood. If no blood appeared, the official overseeing the execution accused the executioner of indulgence and sentenced him to a beating.

Deaths, it need hardly be said, were common. But nobody thought anything of that. Convicts were regarded as worse than beasts, whose disappearance from the world was a blessing. In contrast with these horrors the beautiful story of the Black Monk of Cape Maria is a most welcome relief, lovely in incident and telling.

The book ends on a note of comedy. A grateful Kirghiz presented Dr. Ossendowski with his sister as a wife and he had the greatest difficulty in getting rid of her without giving bitter offence. The task was not made easier by the fact that the lady was of most attractive appearance.

TWO GENTLEMEN OF CHINA

A Pleasing Study of Official and Family Life

"Two Gentlemen of China." By Lady Hosie pp 316, with many illustrations, price 21/- nett, published by Seeley, Service & Co. London.

Lady Hosie might be described as the Margot Asquith of China, with a difference. The egotism is entirely left out; but there is vivid portraiture of two officials and the various members of their families, the one Chinese the other Manchu, based upon long visits to their homes. The complete sincerity and sympathy of the authoress have enabled her to accomplish this delicate task without offending the sensibilities of those who are pourtrayed and yet without obscuring the details that give value to a descriptive book. The interior life of the unwesternized Chinese is as remote from general knowledge as the highlands of Tibet. The courtesies of diplomacy and commerce stop short at the boundary of sex. "It is entirely against Chinese taste, etiquette or wish for one gentleman calling on another to see the ladies of the household." But this book of Lady Hosie represents the work of Miss Soothill, the missionary, and apart from her disinterested service was only made possible by the charm of her personality.

This book of portraits etched with Boswellian thoroughness should take a place of its now among the many studies of China that deal with matters in the large. There is a temptation to read the Chinese as a mere type made up of the various "characteristics" which have been found by analysis. It is refreshing as well as corrective to learn what an individual Chinese gentleman is like, and how his wife and daughter look out upon the world, to catch them as it were in the atmosphere of family jokes. Here is a vignette of King Ta Jan, the judge of the province. "There seemed little of the gross earth in his composition. He was discerning in spirit, quick in repartee, open-hearted, tolerant, responsive and alive to the fact that the foreign guest in his city meant no guile. A Chinese, whether gentleman or coolie, can, if he so wish, present a most mulish, impassive, blank countenance to his interlocutor, not unlike that of the schoolboy taxed with the sins of his friend, determined to reveal nothing." (p. 79).

But it is the woman's life that is chiefly revealed in this book, and there are chapters that will have a strong appeal for lady readers. "The very freedom of a modern woman's dress, its looseness, its infinite variety of colouring, and the fact that for us the days of whalebone are ended, we owe to Oriental lands." Surely there will be many a whispered comment "For this relief, much thanks!" Here is another bit from the thimble standpoint. "After tea we worked until dark at our sewing. We agreed that, though a foreign woman may not take so long as a Chinese with her hair-dressing, she must certainly take longer putting on her clothes. They were amused by my thimble, for theirs is a band round the second joint of the middle finger, which is necessary seeing that they push the needle away from themselves to sew. They laughed, and laughed again, at seeing my European method of sewing towards myself." (p. 152). The Chinese gentleman, one imagines, shaves with an upward, stroke, but the authoress does not enlighten us.

There was sometimes frank conversations on the subject of religion and Li Cheng, a young man of 19 years old and a good Confucian remarked. "For at least a hundred years, not one of us has entered into a temple to worship idols, and probably before that, for we have no record. We have only done official worship. Even our women would scorn to go to the temples. Yet it is not Taoism itself that is wicked, but what these superstitious, ignorant priests have made of it with their demons and witches' broths and incantations," (p. 199).

This young man had one source of fun in listening to the English guest when trapped in one of the pitfalls of his complicated language. She was attempting one day to praise the courage of "Uncle" King, over whose face she thought that a flicker of surprise and even amusement had passed. "Oh my sister," laughed Li Cheng, "do you know what you have just said to my father? You told him that his wincpot truly was great."

These extracts will serve to show the excellent style and spirit of this readable and commendable book.

A SWEDISH SAVANT ON CHINESE SCRIPT

Analytic Dictionary of Chinese and Sino-Japanese, by Bernhard Karlgren, ph. d. Professor in the University of Goteborg, Paris, Libraire Orientaliste Paul Geuthner 13 Rue Jacob 6e.

This is rather a remarkable book in that it is a written by a Swedish savant, printed in Vienna and published by a Parisian booksell. One is struck at once with the excellence of the printer's work. Here is a book written in Chinese characters and romaniztd letters and explained in English; both of these languages foreign to the printer as well as the author and yet errors are surprisingly few. The author's aim is to facilitate "a systematic study—scientific and practical of the Chinese script."

He commences with an elaborate introduction elucidating the development of the Chinese character from early to modern times and explains that the part that is novel in his own work is that he devotes himself to illustrating the principles on which the phonetic half of the Chinese character came to be written. He says: "The point on which Chinese philologists as well as their western followers have entirely failed is the phonetic side of the study of Chinese script." Every student of Chinese must have wished that the sages who devised the characters of which Chinese script is composed had followed some method, or any method, in composing what are called the phonetic characters in the language.

Here is a phonetic, say, wang, a king. Add the radical for water. It becomes wang an ocean. Add, instead, the radical for wood. It becomes wang, a stick. Now, why could not all phonetics be as regular as this. Instead you get hsien, meaning, all. Add the water radical and it becomes chien, to diminish. Change to the radical for mouth and it becomes han, to call out. Try again and put in the radical for heart and it becomes kan, to influence. Why those erratic changes of sound with the same phonetic? Is there any rule by which the learner would be able to tell how the cat is going to jump or what sound the phonetic will change to with different radicals? It is safe to say that if anyone devised a dictionary that would answer this question satisfactorily he would be hailed as a benefactor by every student of the Chinese language.

Well, this is the problem which Professor Karlgren sets out to solve. He fails to do it in 28 pages of his introduction filled with technical terms such as monophthongized, supradental affricatives, etc., which only a trained phoneticist could understand. His spellings of Chinese are fearful and wonderful. There are words spelled with an inverted e or a w raised above the line. There are not only aspirate and tone marks but there is an abundance of diacritical, dieresis and umlaut signs that make the Chinese character look simple in comparison with the romanized spelling.

Readers who get past the terrifying introduction will find the dictionary itself easy and interesting. It is compiled on the ordinary alphabetical plan a, ai, an, etc. The pronounciation is given in modern and archaic Chinese, Cantonese and Japanese. The explanations are clear and often new light is thrown on the derivation or construction of the characters. At the end of the book there is a radical index from which any character in the dictionary can be readily found and also a copious English key from which the Chinese equivalent of the English word may be readily discovered

Good work has been put into the dictionary but the author has not succeeded in his main aim—to show the principle on which the phonetic compounds of the Chinese characters are based. He has failed because, in the present writer's opinion, no such principle ever existed. But it is just possible that had this review been written by a trained philologist he might have seen order where I can only see chaos
